was held in the upper schoolroom, Mr. JOHN DENDY, B.A., president of the association, in the chair. Among those present at this and the evening meeting were—Mr. E. H. Grundy, treasurer of the association, and Messrs. Jesse Pilcher and J. Reynolds, secretaries; Rev. C. C. Coe, of Leicester, deputation from the North Midland Association; Messrs. I. M. Wade and R. Bartram, from the London Sunday School Association; Rev. Richard Pilcher, B.A., from the West Riding Association; Revs. H. E. Dowson, B.A. (Gee Cross), J. Wright, B.A. (Bury), J. T. Whitehead (Ainsworth), J. Fox (Heywood), Lindsey Taplin, M.A. (Tadmorden), J. Worthington (Bolton), T. E. Poynting (Monton), J. Entwistle (Bolton), J. K. Smith (Newchurch), W. C. Squier (Stand), H. Williamson (Dundee), G. Fox (Park-lane), James Drummond, B.A., W. H. Herford, B.A., S. A. Steinthal, Brooke Herford, B. Walker (Manchester), J. Freeston (Rochdale), J. Black, M.A. (Stockport); Messrs. John Grundy (Bury), Harold Lees (Sale), G. B. Dalby (Preston), J. Armstrong, J. Heys, Geo. Smith (Manchester), Alex. Mackie (Burnley), Thos. Holland (Padibham), Joseph Lee (Barnard Castle), J. Jones (Hindley), D. Howarth (Rochdale), J. Macfarlane (Oldham), John Hargreaves (Rawtenstall), and Dr. Marcus (Manchester).

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the meeting, said he wished he could find something novel and striking to say on the question of Sunday schools. He should be heartily glad if he could strike out some new light, or a new form of expressing an old light, so as to carry a new conviction and renewed earnestness to the minds of the audience, and give a new impetus to the work. The present meeting brought to his mind the great change which had come over the aspects not only of Sunday schools, but of the whole educational question, since he first attended a meeting of that Association in Bury twenty-four years before. In what little he had to say, therefore, he would confine himself to this view. At the present moment they were standing upon the verge of an entirely new educational epoch. Twenty years ago Sunday schools were really to a large extent the centres of all the intellectual culture that was then attainable for the working classes. He believed it was to the Sunday-school system we owed what little education was now given to the working classes. The misfortune had been that the educational system commenced thus, and those men who were interested in religious, or rather theological, opinions were exceedingly unwilling to allow it to go beyond their own control. This, he thought, was what, after 20 years' experience, we had arrived at—we were about to have a thorough investigation of the educational condition of England. For his own part he welcomed the approach of it; he should like to know fully and fairly what was the real position of our working classes, especially that of the young people of the present generation. His own opinion was that when the statistics were published people would be struck with horror at what would there be displayed. People had no idea, living as they did a quiet life in respectable neighbourhoods, of the scenes of ignorance and brutality which were constantly occurring not far from them. It was one of the features of our time, whether for good or evil, that each class of the population grew together and coalesced into large masses in certain districts of each town; and one of these districts was always ignorant, criminal, and thievish. Such were the people the association most wanted to get at, and such were the people whom he believed it was the duty of the State at any cost to lay hold of, take by the hand, and say, "These must and shall be educated." (Hear, hear, and applause.) He feared, however, that they were further from obtaining this than the preacher of that morning seemed to think they were. He believed they would be met by the whole army of Churchmen and Catholics, and by many of the orthodox Dissenters; for he believed the denominational system was felt to be so necessary for the success of the theological tenets of the Church of England, that men would rather sacrifice the whole intelligence of the rising generation than give way one foot to what they called a godless system of education. This was the point they would have to combat. He hoped it would be taken up, not theoretically, but practically, and that men would try to work out in their own minds a system which should be secular and still not godless. The religious teacher should take up the question where the secular education ended, and the two should work harmoniously together. This really was the point to be considered. So far from thinking the time was coming when theological, religious, or moral teaching should be at an end, he believed there never was a time when it was more needed; for he believed a great nation was never more at sea as to what ought to be believed, and what ought not, than England was to-day. It was a natural result of the struggle through which the nation had passed; it was the natural outcome of the general expression there had been from the extreme Catholic on the one hand to the extreme Rationalist on the other. Where everyone was expressing his own opinion it was natural there should be some confusion of thought. Out of it they should try to pick, if not certainty, at least a guide, and obtain a faith such as was believed in by Christ and his apostles, so that they might all worship God together. (Cheers.)

The SECRETARY (Mr. J. Reynolds) read the twenty-fourth annual report. It stated that the Association was founded for the improvement of schools in and about Manchester, to aid in the establishment of new ones, and give help and encouragement to all persons engaged in Sunday-school work. These ends were to be attained by annual gatherings of teachers, by a system of school visiting, by the collection and diffusion of information on Sunday-school matters, by occasional grants of books to poor schools, and by the publication of books and tracts likely to promote the objects of the Association. During the past year the Association had done much useful work, and had, as far as its means and opportunities allowed, rendered great assistance to the Sunday schools connected with it. The number of schools in connection with the Association was 57. The Astley-street (Dukinfield) and the Blackburn school had been re-opened. The Parsonage-street school (Macclesfield) had been closed. In 53 of these schools, from which returns had been received, there were 1,394 teachers, 728 classes, 8,993 scholars, 2,000 adults, an average morning attendance of 590 teachers and of 5,464 scholars; an average afternoon attendance of 638 teachers and 6,430 scholars. These figures showed an apparent increase of 21 teachers, 21 classes, and 147 scholars; an increase in the average of 9 teachers in the morning, and 8 in the afternoon, and a decrease of 26 scholars in the morning and six in the afternoon. Upon making a comparison between those schools only which furnished statistics this year and last, the figures showed a decrease of 4 teachers and 17 adults. The average attendance of scholars had fallen by 84 in the morning, and 110 in the afternoon; and notwithstanding that the classes had been increased by ten, the average attendance of teachers was only greater by eight in the morning and six in the afternoon. The attendance of scholars per cent. in the morning was 61, against 60 in last year's report; in the afternoon 72, against 74 last year. The committee regretted to have to report a diminution, no matter how small. During the past year the "Penny Magazine" had maintained its high character. The committee regretted that the sale of the magazine was still almost entirely confined to the members of their schools, the members of their congregations, as a rule, not giving the publication their support. The committee adopted the advice of its predecessors to consider some practicable and simple means of improving school registration. After much careful deliberation as to the means to be adopted, the committee drew up a summary calculated to secure a more accurate and regular record of attendance, and to afford a basis upon which to found statistics worthy of trust. The committee had continued a system of week-night lectures to the Sunday-school teachers. They were glad to have to report that, with one exception, the local unions were in a vigorous condition, and continued to do much useful work.

E. H. GRUNDY, Esq., read the financial report, which showed that the total amount in hand at the beginning of the year was £75. 2s. 0d., the year's subscriptions amounting to £90. 1s., and contributions from Sunday-schools £27. 18s.; the total being £193. 0s. 0d. The expenditure had been as follows: Expenses for lectures, &c., £67. 5s. 3d.; ditto for books and grants for books, £26; printing and stationery, £16. 11s.; sundry items, £32. 5s. 6d.; and these with the balance in hand (£50. 18s. 3d.) make up the total of £193. 0s. 0d.

Mr. JOHN CHADWICK, the Sunday-school visitor to the Association, then read his report, of which the following are some of the principal features:

He had visited at intervals Gee Cross, Accrington, Stockport, Rawtenstall, Stalybridge, Park-lane (Wigan), Astley, Glodwick, Swinton, Ford-street (Salford), Congleton, Bollington, Heywood, Padibham, Bank-street (Bolton), Newchurch, Chowbent, Commission-street (Bolton), and Mottram.

In connection with these nineteen schools, more or less numerous, are valuable institutions or meetings designed to supplement and perpetuate the influence of the Sunday school. Four schools circulate tracts, ten have a singing class, four a mutual improvement society, six a savings' bank, four a clothing fund, five a teachers' religious improvement society, one a band of hope, and most of them have evening classes for various miscellaneous studies, besides gatherings for recreation and amusement. Stalybridge has a singing class with over 100 pupils, and I can bear testimony to the precision and marked intelligence and feeling that accompanied the tunes they sang. Sick and burial societies are also much prized—that at Park-lane, for instance, has 100 members, with a fund amounting to £400.

Out of these schools there are 16 libraries—11 of them are in active use, 5 of them are temporarily closed, and 3 schools are deprived of this excellent means of spreading knowledge. In 7 of these schools a children's special service is conducted either weekly, monthly, or quarterly. Absent scholars are visited, either by specially appointed or voluntary teachers, in 7 of them. In a few cases absentee papers are sent out after the lapse of two or three weeks. Eleven schools are favourable to the distribution of prizes for regular and punctual attendance. The rest partially ignore them, or rely mainly upon a love of duty, a sense of honour, and attentive teaching to make the school progressive.

Several of these schools are steadily improving in the number of teachers and scholars, and in some cases, as at Padibham, Newchurch, Bury, and Stalybridge, they are literally crammed. At the two latter places additional room has been provided to draw off the youngest portion of scholars, while even further improvements are contemplated.

The organisation and superintendence of the majority of the schools are admirable, and the appearance and bearing of the scholars satisfactory. During my last visits I have been most anxious in looking after successful results, and have endeavoured to find the causes from which those results may be supposed to spring. Of the foremost of these is the reverent conduct of the scholars during divine service. At Heywood, success he believed in this instance was owing to a distribution of a large portion of the scholars into various parts of the chapel, where their behaviour would at all times be noticed, and any unseemly conduct at once checked by the adult congregation near. At Astley, Padibham, and Newchurch the same plan was in operation, and the results equally pleasing. Chowbent has tried the voluntary principle of attending or not attending divine service one part of the day, but the results are unsatisfactory. At Stalybridge there is an average attendance of scholars of 80 per cent. per Sunday, which is attributed mainly to the rigid system of keeping the registration and reporting the average attendance at the monthly committee meetings. At Bank-street (Bolton) and Commission-street, where an attendance of 74 per cent. can be reached, no prizes are given, yet there was more life and vigour in these schools than I had witnessed for some time. At Gee Cross I was glad to observe the salutary power of the religious teaching, especially in the higher classes of girls. At Stockport and Heywood, though to a lesser extent, a similar plan was adopted in some of the female classes. It is very cheering to see, more or less marked, in all these schools a very earnest devotion to school work, and in some instances almost a complete self-devotion to it. The report referred to the quality of lessons given in the various schools referred to, which it stated consisted mainly of reading, writing, and spelling.

Our smaller schools, at Accrington, Rawtenstall, Park Lane, Astley, Glodwick, Ford-street, Congleton, and Bollington, are struggling on in their spheres of usefulness, some with pinching means, others without a minister to guide them, others without much external sympathy and help, and almost all of them in painful isolation; yet their influence in the formation of character is priceless. After referring to the wants of the schools, such for instance as a deficiency of funds for their adequate support, &c., the report offered a few suggestions for increasing their efficiency, and concluded by acknowledging the grateful sense of the kindness which the visitor had received and the assistance given him by the superintendents of the different schools.

Rev. J. WRIGHT, B.A., moved that the reports be adopted, printed, and circulated. It was impossible to judge of the various matters contained in them from simply hearing them, and he was sure there was much in them that deserved very careful and serious consideration. He sympathised with the feeling expressed by the chairman, that the history of the association reminded them of the great changes which take place in a comparatively short period of time. It was 21 years since the first meeting of the association was held in Bury; and scarcely one of those who took an active part in its management then (except himself) was now found among its committee and officers. But as those former labourers had passed away, others equally active and efficient had been found to take their places; and as one generation succeeds another, we may hope that the great stream of earnest, philanthropic, self-sacrificing, Christian effort is ever deepening and widening, as it brings us nearer and nearer to the boundless sea of eternity. If the various means employed by the committee to assist and improve our Sunday schools produce no good effect, the only conclusion must be that these institutions are incapable of being so benefited. But there is no reason thus to despair. Even though the returns show that the numbers do not increase, yet those who can compare the present state of things with that which prevailed some 25 years ago, must discern many points of manifest improvement in our schools, and instead of being disheartened we may persevere, and aim at constant progress, convinced that the association has done good, and will continue to be an important means of raising the standard and improving the condition of the Sunday schools of the district.

The Rev. J. BLACK, M.A., seconded the resolution. The officers for the next year were appointed on the motion of the Rev. GEORGE FOX, seconded by HAROLD LEES, Esq.

Mr. JESSE PILCHER announced that the association had been increased during the last two days by Sale School and the new school at Rochdale joining the union.

Mr. E. H. GRUNDY, Bury, moved, and Rev. T. E. POYNTING seconded, a vote of thanks to the Rev. H. E. Dowson for his services in the chapel that morning, paying a warm tribute to the ability and thorough-going character of his remarks upon the education question.

The Rev. H. E. Dowson briefly acknowledged the vote. What he said in the morning he said because he was convinced that the time was not far distant when we should have in this country a complete system of secular education. They were told that the clergy of the Church of England and the Catholics would oppose it; but when he thought of recent legislation he felt the matter was not in the hands of any clergy to decide the question of separating secular and dogmatic education. The matter was in the hands of the people, who would sweep away the religious bugbear. (Applause.) Such opposition therefore would be entirely useless. (Hear, hear.) The people will demand a complete system of secular education. They see that sectarian rivalry is the great obstacle in the way, and that sectarianism is the curse of the country; and he quite agreed with them. (Hear, hear.) That being so, they will demand that the question shall be taken out of the hands of sectaries, and that public money shall be spent in the public interest, which is not the interest of any church or sect. He had noticed that whenever a speaker had come out heartily on that subject he had been cheered to the echo by the masses, and he felt, therefore, not the slightest doubt as to the issue.

Dr. MARCUS, in moving a cordial welcome to the deputation present, bore his testimony to the heartiness with which, at a recent meeting at Leeds, presided over by Mr. Carter, M.P., the subject of secular education was accepted.

Mr. JOHN JACKSON (Stalybridge) briefly seconded the motion.

Mr. PILCHER said a long and cordial letter had been received from the association in the north of Ireland, and a hope was expressed that on a future occasion a deputation would be sent.

Mr. WADE, in acknowledging the welcome, said he had now visited them so long that he was beginning to think himself an established institution, and in London he had spoken so well of them that he had persuaded his friend, Mr. Bartram to come with him and strengthen his weakness. Mr. Pilcher had warned them that he had come down to hawk his wares. (Laughter.) He did not seek to come in competition with the books published by their association—they did not aim at anything like their little book "Quiet Thoughts," which was fit to lie upon the drawing-room table. What they aimed to do was to send out a good series of class books. The good qualities of those books were admitted, but then it was said they wanted them at a less price. Well, the answer to that was that they did not buy them in sufficient numbers—instead of doing so he was afraid they ran off to other publishers—which was a little unfair. He was going now, he feared, to be disagreeable. In London it was his vocation to show people the black spots, and he did not object to this because there were so many to show up the cheery side of things. Was it not a matter of regret to see year after year that there is no increase, but a serious decrease in the number of their scholars? Take the Manchester Association during the last four years. In 1863 he found the total number of teachers on the books was 89 more than in the present year; that the number of morning attendances of those teachers was 34 more than in the present year; that the number of classes then was 11 more than now; that the number of scholars on the books was 647 more than now; that of scholars above 16 there were 254 more than now, and that the number of attendances in the afternoon was 976 more than now. Surely facts like these every teacher should take to heart. He held that no congregation or minister could be doing their duty unless they had the religious welfare of the young at heart, and did their best to meet every want of the Sunday school. That being his position, what are we doing? Listen to our talk, and you find no body, in theory at least, advocates religious education more than we do; but look to our results, and you find no body that shows so little results. Why was this? Partly, because of the indifference of their newspapers. He knew in whose presence he was speaking, but nevertheless he would tell them what he thought. He had noticed that at some place they had lately had a Sunday-school Teachers' Conference, and the subject of discussion was, "How to make our Sunday schools successful." But he had not been able to learn what was done at that meeting. He did not think they had a paper which represented them, or it would have told them. Respecting that conference, he had bent his mind to find out what was said on the subject. Surely, if it was worth while for an association to come together and listen to speeches on the subject, it was worth while for their paper to have told what was suggested and recommended. Comparing ourselves with the orthodox, he found that they had much the same wants as we had; and that when they went to their congregations they did not seem to succeed better than we did. Some of them had been speaking of appointing watchers over their congregations in this matter. Now, fancy some half-dozen watchers of that kind over one of our congregations? Still, he thought a good idea might come out of that thought. He was sure there might be more united action among teachers, ministers, and congregations, and that there must be, before any good could be done; and until it was so we should still go down.

Mr. RICHARD BARTRAM, the Rev. C. C. COB, and the Rev. RICHARD PILCHER also said a few words, after which

The business meeting closed by Mr. JESSE PILCHER and Mr. GEORGE SMITH expressing the thanks of the Association to the members of the Bank-street Chapel for their hospitality that day.

About 800 friends then took tea together in the lower school-room, after which

THE EVENING CONFERENCE was held in the Upper School, which was crowded in every part. Mr. HERBERT GRUNDY, the treasurer, presided. After a hymn had been sung,

The CHAIRMAN urged upon the friends of the institution the necessity of keeping up the income as one of the best means of helping them to increased usefulness. As to the subject of the paper to be read by Mr. Pilcher, he thought they hardly could test by examination the result of religious teaching, but secular teaching they could. He fully agreed, however, with Mr. Dowson—they ought to have less secular and more religious teaching. True, there was an evil arising out of the half-time system, and it was this—that while up to thirteen years of age they could reach them in their day schools, after that, if they did not see fit to go to school, they could not reach them. He thought, therefore, the system should be carried further, and then Sunday schools could be left more at liberty for religious teaching. (Hear, hear.) A friend of his had urged upon him that education was not a panacea for all things. Perhaps not, but it would put us in a better position than at present. We have a work before us to do in our day schools, which it is our duty to do, and we ought to do it as a means of assisting the work of our Sunday schools.

Mr. JESSE PILCHER then read a paper on "Examinations in our Sunday Schools," of which the following is a very careful extract:

At a conference of Sunday-school teachers held in Manchester, under the auspices of this association, in November last, Mr. Jackson, of Stalybridge, read a most able paper on this subject. As he stated that the desirability of holding such examinations was first suggested to him by witnessing an examination conducted under the auspices of the "Union of Lancashire and Cheshire Institutes," it may be useful if I give a sketch of the mode of operation adopted by that Union. First, the very small annual subscription of 5s. was sufficient to entitle the scholars and teachers in attendance on the classes to all the benefits arising from a connection with the union. The subjects in which examinations were held were arithmetic, geography, English history, gospel history, English grammar, and needlework. In each of these subjects, first, second, and third class certificates of proficiency were given, as well as valuable books and money prizes, for those who particularly distinguished themselves. Without entering into details, I may state that the examinations were conducted by means of printed questions, one given out to each pupil, who answers them in writing. It will at once be seen that no objection can be raised to such examinations in connection with week evening classes. But it by no means follows that to introduce such a system into our Sunday-schools is possible or even desirable. Let us now ask what is implied by an examination? Clearly the desirability of testing work done. This in turn implies a work that can be tested. Here then the question arises—Is the work done in our Sunday-schools of such a kind as can be measured? Probably we shall all agree that the special work of Sunday-schools is the giving of religious instruction, and that if they fail in this, let the scholars make never so great progress in so-called secular studies, our schools fall short of their true aim. If this be the case, can such introduction be tested? Our Sunday-school work seems naturally to divide itself into two parts. First, we have the spiritual influence, e.g., thoughts concerning God; the sense of communion with God; personal holiness, &c.; while, closely allied to these, are the moral associations, such as our sense of duty to each other, our sense of personal responsibility. And, secondly, we have the extent of information gained by our scholars as to scripture facts and forms of doctrine. It seems to me that such results of our teaching as come under the first division cannot be tested or measured, and that a spirit of competition would not be likely to advance such influences, if it be not directly adverse to their existence. But on the other side of our teaching, viz., the extent of information gained as to scripture facts and forms of doctrine, it seems to me our work can and should be tested. To this end we need in our schools—1st, a regular system of teaching, with a gradation both of subjects and books; 2nd, a gradation of capabilities of scholars—that is classification; 3rd, a regularity which can only be attained by paid officials over whom we have control, or by very rare devotion; and lastly, a teacher who knows how to prepare for examinations—a work not so easy as it seems. How far, then, are these conditions to be found in our Sunday-schools? Those who know them will admit that if there be one defect more palpable than another it is the want of system in the teaching. Too often the choice of subjects and of books is left to the whim of the teachers or scholars. Again, the lessons are often taken hap-hazard, and consequently no connection exists with any lessons given before. Often the most easy text books are to be found in what are the most advanced classes, and not seldom books requiring much cultivation are to be found in the junior classes. These defects are further aggravated by the want of system in the classification of our scholars. Many teachers, too, however willing, are not able always to be at their posts. Added to this we have the great irregularity in the attendance of the scholars. We have not, therefore, the means of preparing our scholars for a test so searching as a competitive examination. We must, therefore, modify our plans. I will now endeavour to sketch a modified scheme such as I think might attain these ends. Let the Association urge upon its associated schools the adoption of a systematised course of instruction, to be periodically tested by examinations. The minister often does not take part in the work of the Sabbath-school simply because he has not a definite work therein. Make him examiner-in-chief, if you like to call him so, and at once you give him a definite work, one that does not tie his hands too much, and one for which he has special capabilities. I would add in passing that this need not exclude anyone else who desires, and is competent. In order to meet the needs of those schools not connected with chapels, or where there is no resident minister, I would have the association appoint a duly qualified person for the work, who should be sent free of expense to any such school upon application. The course would be as follows:—Upon application being made for the examiner's services, the gentleman should pay a visit to the school, and after careful consultation with the teachers, arrange the course of lessons to be given. Such a consultation would in itself be of great practical value. In many of our smaller and more isolated schools the teachers have few or no means of learning what are the best and cheapest text books, and other aids in teaching, such as maps, &c., or how and where such can be obtained. The possession of such knowledge would not seldom lead a teacher to take up a given subject with far greater interest, and far greater hope of success than before. "Well begun is half done." The association should provide, free of charge, the best books, maps, &c., for any school where the means of providing such do not exist. Books, &c., so provided to be returned when done with. The association should also be prepared to place in the hands of the teachers a systematic course of outline lessons upon gospel history, &c., fitted for Sunday-school instruction. Such outline lessons could, when desirable, be fitted in by the examiner, or one of the lecturers, of the association before the teachers of their classes, and then a practical lesson how to teach would be given. The time over which the study of any subject fixed upon is to extend, would naturally be determined by the material of which the class was composed, and by the subject to be taught; but it should be clearly understood that any course of lessons is to extend over the time agreed upon—from Sunday to Sunday, and for a certain time on each Sunday, allowing, of course, for unavoidable breaks in the teaching. At the end of the time fixed the examiner should visit the school and examine the class or classes. Such examinations should be oral or written, as might be deemed most desirable by the teacher and examiner. Mr. Pilcher concluded by saying that he had attempted to treat the subject from the practical point of view of a Sunday-school teacher, and had not sought to write a merely theoretical essay upon the subject.

The Rev. JOHN WRIGHT expressed his thanks to Mr. Pilcher for the moderate and thoughtful manner in which he had introduced a subject as to which there were very strong opinions opposed to one another. His own opinion was that examinations are good in a Sunday school, but that competitive examinations are bad. If the plan were carried out of having examinations on the model of those conducted by the "Union of Cheshire Institutes," very lamentable results might follow. As the number of scholars from one school who succeeded would be compared with the number from another school, a feeling of competition and invidious comparison would be produced, which might easily be carried beyond friendly emulation: Nor would such a comparison be any fair test of the relative merits of the schools. For one school might consist principally of scholars who have day-school instruction, while in another the scholars come in a state of ignorance which precludes the communication of any advanced instruction. The latter school might have really done more work than the former and yet be unable to send any of its scholars to pass a competitive examination. Again, it was admitted that the test could only apply to the intellectual side of education, not to the moral and spiritual, which was the peculiar and appropriate work of the Sunday school. But if the teacher knew that the reputation of the school depended on the number of scholars who could be prepared to pass the examination in intellectual knowledge, there would be a temptation to him to ignore the moral and religious part of teaching, or at least to make it second to the other, and thus the growing tendency to make the Sunday school truly a religious institution would be discouraged. (Hear, hear.) Then how was it possible to have a central examination in scripture history and religious doctrine, without coming into collision with varieties of opinion, and trenching on that freedom of thought which they made their proudest boast? An examiner could not frame a paper of questions on such subjects without some reference to his own views, and thus giving a colour, on the one side or the other, as to opinion on critical or doctrinal questions. His satisfaction with the answers must to some extent depend on their agreement with his own views; at any rate there would be a temptation for the pupils to fall in with the opinions of the examiner. For instance, take one of the questions suggested in this essay, "Who were the writers of the four gospels?" The answers would be very various, if the class examined even consisted of well-read scholars and theologians. (Hear, hear.) For these reasons he thought Mr. Pilcher had judged wisely in only advocating a modified plan, and he agreed with the general idea of that plan the more heartily because he had seen something like it tried, and with good results. It was carried out thus: In each class a certain separate text book of religious teaching, suited to the age and capacity of the scholars, was given as the foundation of the work of the class for a year. At the end of the year the class was orally examined in that book by an examiner not belonging to the school. Those scholars in each class who showed they had mastered the leading points in that book were recommended for promotion to a higher class, but those who had not so mastered the subject were left in the class for another year. If the gradation of books was properly arranged, this system would secure that the scholars should learn something at each step of their progress, and would prevent those lamentable cases now often seen, in which scholars rose to the highest class of a school and were at last deplorably ignorant of the simple facts they should have learned at the outset. Certainly there would be some practical difficulties; some classes would get very large and others very small; some scholars would remain a long time in a low class and would become disheartened; but all these obstacles might be overcome by determination on the part of superintendents and teachers, if they believed that by the course suggested they would be raising the character of their school, and making the instruction more really efficient and more permanently useful to those entrusted to their care.

Mr. JOHN CHADWICK, the district visitor, strongly advocated competitive examinations. He believed the effect of examinations generally had been most beneficial; and he thought they should not relax in their efforts, but throw more energy and vigour into their Sunday-school work by instituting examinations which would show results in the kind of knowledge which was imparted in Sunday-schools. He read a passage from a letter he had received from an inspector of Church of England Sunday-schools, in which the results of these examinations were highly praised. If they were found practicable and useful in the church schools, why should they not be tried in ours? They wanted a mode of teaching that would give the scholars a clear knowledge of Bible history. They should be also examined upon subjects pertaining to Christian virtue and the Christian graces. Competitive examinations upon such subjects would throw a deeper interest into the Sunday-school work.

The Rev. BROOKE HERFORD suggested that it might be as well to begin with the examination of teachers, which would be a fine spectacle if they were to be examined in Christian virtue and Christian graces! (Laughter.) Were they not going altogether too fast in talking about examinations in their Sunday-schools? (Hear.) Such examinations would tend to raise the class of scholars in their schools in such a manner as to eliminate those for whom Sunday-schools were more especially instituted—the poor and the most ignorant. (Hear.) This would be a great calamity. As it was, they had already gone too far in this direction. The modern tendency of Sunday-schools had resembled that of Mechanics' Institutes, which instead of being for those for whom they were originally intended—the working classes—had come to be mere clubs for a class above them. They ought rather to try to go deeper down into the strata of society with all their Christian work.

Mr. J. E. BENSON was much opposed to the suggestions of Mr. Chadwick. If teachers did their proper work in the Sunday school it was a work that could not be measured. Mr. Chadwick thought they might examine the children as to their growth in the moral virtues and Christian graces. If so, let not only the teachers but the congregations also be examined. (Cheers and laughter.) They wanted in the Sunday school more of the kind of training examination in which was impossible. Secular instruction was much less efficiently given in the Sunday than in the day school, because the Sunday teachers were not specially trained for the work, and those who could and who ought to come and help in the work, because they had more education and leisure, were too idle. It was easier to loll on the sofa reading a book, no doubt; but if any one had need of rest and time for self-culture it was those who were now the chief workers in Sunday schools; but he was of Mr. Herford's opinion, that they should go deeper down into the lower strata of human society. If they did so, they would find jewels if they did not find gold. He felt it was a stigma resting upon the whole Unitarian body that there was (so far as he was aware) not a single ragged school in connection with any Unitarian chapel. The present race of teachers could do some good with this class of children—the lost, the outcast, and the destitute—if they would; and the only examinations needed were of that kind which any teacher would put his scholars through every Sunday. But in these proposed examinations there was a danger that the whole thought and scope and bearing of the instruction given in the schools would be diverted into an intellectual rather than a moral and religious direction. He was utterly opposed to them.

Mr. J. DENBY was thankful they had got a better class connected with their schools than they had 20 years ago, and they owed that improvement to the influence of Sunday-school teaching. He could not consent, however, to turn them out and fetch in those out of the streets in their places. (Cries of "Question.") Of course they must not seek to exclude the poorer and more ignorant from their schools, but he thought they might with advantage adopt some system of examination, but not a competitive system, which introduced an element which was not in harmony with the objects of Sunday-schools.

The Rev. L. TAPLIN, M.A., said Sunday schools in small towns usually represented the congregations, but that in large towns the reverse was the case, except so far as the teachers were concerned, and their systems should be adapted to this difference. He should like to see some kind of examination introduced in Sunday schools, but not competitive examinations. He wanted an examination that would show some results, but not merely intellectual results, the latter not being the great object of a Sunday school. A Sunday school was not a place for teaching the three R's.

The Rev. W. H. HERFORD spoke against competitive examinations; the idea of competitive examinations as tests of progress was becoming obsolete throughout the educated world, except in England, and it was certainly out of date to propose them for Sunday schools, where the work most of all needed was the work in the heart and conscience.

Mr. WADE asked how examinations of a few scholars could possibly be a test of a school's efficiency upon any particular subject?

Mr. GEORGE SMITH considered competitive examinations between the various schools of the association, or even between the pupils of any individual school, to be entirely inconsistent with the true work of the Sunday school. He maintained the highest aim of the Sunday-school teacher should be, not simply to give a number of historical and geographical facts, even from the Gospels, but rather to call forth their affection for what was good, true, and holy; to arm them against the social temptations by which they were surrounded, and, by incidental teaching, to give lessons of wisdom and guidance from the occurrences of every-day life. At the same time that he considered that the religious teaching should be of that kind which would elevate their tastes and purify their desires, and cause a strong attachment for their school; yet he would never hesitate to give to all the scholars the fundamental and essential doctrines of a positive Unitarian faith. Competitive examinations in our Sunday schools also presented insuperable difficulties in their accomplishment, owing to want of higher teaching power, and the intellectual status of the children who come to us for instruction. The teaching power of our schools consists largely of those who, having felt the benefits of Sunday-school instruction themselves, are willing to render help to others; but the members of the congregation possessing greater intellectual qualifications and a higher social position, withhold themselves from this highly important means of Christian usefulness.

Dr. MARCUS considered the question of competitive examination to be entirely unnecessary, chiefly because of the teachers' educational status being not sufficiently high for any such work. He spoke at some length in disparagement of the notion of competitive examinations. Even when the subject was most intellectual, it was very difficult to get the scholars to any point at which such examinations could come in. He had himself tried teaching French, having been willing to give a trial to Mr. Sharpe's suggestions as to the value set by scholars upon instruction in a new language. But though such teaching was his occupation, and he might be supposed to be able to make the best of it, he had found the result unsatisfactory.

As the meeting was rapidly dissolving, owing to many having to go away early, the discussion was brought to a rather abrupt close, Mr. Pilcher having to forego any reply to the objections advanced to the theory propounded in his paper. The meeting was closed with singing and prayer at half-past eight o'clock.

NORTH MIDLAND SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting was held at Nottingham, on Tuesday, March 30th. The friends from the various schools of the district met in the infants' school, High Pavement Chapel, at one o'clock. After dinner the business meeting was held, the chair being filled by Richard Enfield, Esq., president of the association. The chairman observed that, as Sunday-school teachers, they wished to train up those in their charge not only to be respectable citizens, but something more than this—to be good soldiers not of mammon but of Jesus Christ. For assisting in carrying out this purpose, such an association as theirs was very useful. The visits it caused to be paid to the schools were of great value. Feeling the want of some test of the work actually done, he desired to hear more of the plan of examinations which had been discussed at the meeting at Bury.

Mr. RILEY, the secretary, read the reports, which showed that the association contains 1,779 scholars and 284 teachers, the average attendance of scholars being 63½ per cent. in the morning, and 75½ per cent. in the afternoon. The numbers are slightly less than those of last year, which is attributed to the greater strictness as to attendance, which is shown by the increased average per centage. The visitors have reported especially on the amount of direct religious instruction given to the scholars, and say it is generally satisfactory. The treasurer's accounts showed a small balance in hand.

Rev. C. L. WHITAM, in moving the adoption of the reports, advocated great strictness in requiring regular and punctual attendance, and referred to the means of retaining elder scholars and inducing them to become teachers.

Rev. J. L. SHORT seconded the motion. He regretted that his Sunday school did not belong to the association. He described the reports as characterized by simple honesty and hopeful earnestness, and pointed out the mischief that is caused by too favourable or too sanguine reports. The difficulties we meet with are not peculiar to ourselves, but belong to the age. There is a change going on as to the class from which we draw our teachers. We need teachers of true power, and these cannot be galvanized into life, but must be a gradual growth.

The resolution was supported by Rev. JOHN WRIGHT, B.A., and Rev. GOODWYN BARMBY, and was carried unanimously.

The appointment of officers and the fixing of the place for the next meeting, were proposed and seconded by Revs. WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE and J. J. BISHOP, Messrs. MORLEY, RICHARDS, COOPER, and GILL.

Rev. C. C. COE moved, and Mr. RILEY seconded, a vote of welcome to the deputations from other societies, to which

Mr. WADE and Dr. MARCUS responded.

A numerous company then sat down to tea in the Boys' School, in which room also the evening meeting was held, Mr. R. Enfield again in the chair.

Mr. WILLIAM CLARKE read a paper on "Sunday Schools, past, present, and future." Having briefly traced the origin and progress of the institution from the time of Raikes, he stated that Sunday schools went on growing till about ten years ago, since which time they have stood still or gone back. They are not now advancing in connection with any sect or church. Why is this? He quoted an opinion that it is caused by the spread of day schools. He hoped a time is at hand when parents who neglect to send their sons to a day school will be visited with penalties by the law. But the more general day-school education becomes, the more need there will be of the Sunday-school, if only it makes religion its sole specific purpose. Religion, and nothing but religion, in its doctrinal and moral aspects, should be the work of the Sunday-school. All writing classes should be abolished or transferred to the week evenings. Instruction in doctrine should be carried on by means of a catechism. The Bible should be the standard book in the school, from the highest class to the lowest. The members of each congregation ought to unite in the work.

The essay was received with much applause, and nearly all the speakers expressed their high appreciation of it and their agreement with its general tone. Dr. Marcus, Mr. Wade, Rev. F. Bishop, Rev. Wm. Oates, Mr. Riley, Rev. J. Wright, Rev. C. C. Coe, and Mr. Hughes, addressed the meeting. They all were anxious that religious instruction should be the main work of the Sunday-school, but there was some difference of opinion as to whether the teaching of writing, &c., can be at once banished.

The meetings of the day, on the whole, were highly satisfactory and cheering to all who were present at them.

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

The third annual meeting of members and friends of the Midland Christian Union was held at Cradley on Tuesday last. The proceedings commenced with public worship, in the Park-lane Chapel, at eleven o'clock, the Rev. HENRY M'KEAN, of Oldbury, conducting the devotional services. The Rev. DAVID GRIFFITH, of Cheltenham, preached from the text, Luke xii. 57, "Yea, and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" The sermon was a thoughtful criticism upon some of the chief controversies of the day.

In the afternoon, about sixty ladies and gentlemen dined together at the May Pole Inn, HERBERT NEW, Esq., president of the Union, in the chair; and FRANK EVERS, Esq., J.P., one of the vice-presidents, in the vice-chair.

After dinner the meeting for business was held. The "Health of the Queen" and the sentiment of "Civil and Religious Liberty" having been proposed, the PRESIDENT delivered his address, reviewing the operations of the society during the past year and exhorting the members to renewed efforts in the service of their common cause.

The Rev. D. MAGINNIS, one of the secretaries, read the report of the committee, and also that of the Rev. R. H. COTTON, the missionary agent. From these reports it appeared

That during the year the Union had supplied the following preaching stations, viz., Alcester, Spon Lane, and Worcester. At Alcester there is an afternoon service, with monthly communion service, Sunday school, and savings' club. At this station a short course of week evening lectures was recently delivered by the Rev. J. Gordon and Rev. R. H. Cotton. At Worcester the tentative services have been discontinued for the present in consequence of local difficulties. Through the kind co-operation of the Messrs. Kenrick, the Spon Lane station was, three months ago, removed to the Assembly Room, at West Bromwich. Since the removal there have been special services with announced subjects of discourse, and the attendance has been on the whole satisfactory. A Sunday school is about being opened, with a promised staff of eight teachers. A successful Sunday school conference had been held in the summer at Hurst-street, Birmingham. Annual collections had been made in several congregations in aid of the funds of the union; Mr. Cotton was resigning his office of missionary agent from May next, with a view to a settled pastorate; and an accession to the staff of lay preachers of a few earnest and competent men would be hailed with satisfaction. The death of Mr. Akroyd was referred to in appropriate terms.

Mr. S. B. WHITFIELD (treasurer) presented a statement of the accounts up to December 31, 1868. The expenditure was £179. 11s. 8d., and the balance in treasurer's hands, £1. 18s. 3d.

On the motion of Mr. A. J. SWINDELL, seconded by Mr. F. GRW, the reports and accounts were adopted, and ordered to be printed.

Thanks were voted to the ministers who had officiated that morning, on the motion of Mr. F. EVERS, seconded by the Rev. B. WRIGHT; and the Revs. D. GRIFFITH and H. M'KEAN responded.

The Rev. J. GORDON moved: "That, while we rejoice in the progress and prosperity of civil and religious liberty, we feel there is an increasing need for an earnest presentation of an enlightened Catholic Christianity to sanctify free thought, to quicken conscience, and to elevate the religious life."

The motion was seconded by the Rev. R. H. COTTON, and adopted.

The remaining resolutions, which were chiefly routine, were moved or seconded by the Rev. W. COCHRANE, the Rev. D. MAGINNIS, the Rev. H. EACHUS, the Rev. J. KEDWARD, Messrs. S. B. WHITFIELD, B. HINGLEY, J. GRAINGER, T. H. BILLINGHAM, J. KERTLAND, J. MORGAN, J. GUEST, and T. GUEST.

The Revs. S. Bache and J. Birks were also present, and several lay friends from Birmingham, Coseley, Oldbury, Wolverhampton, Dukinfield, Stourbridge, and Evesham.

BIRMINGHAM UNITARIAN DOMESTIC MISSION.

The annual sermons in aid of the above important institution were preached by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., of Liverpool, in the Church of the Messiah, on Sunday, March 21st, when collections were made amounting to £50. 9s. 7d.

On Monday evening, March 22nd, the twenty-ninth annual meeting was held in the large room of Newhall-hill Chapel. After tea the chair was taken by the president, J. H. Nettlefold, Esq., who observed that "the mission during the twenty-nine years of its existence had done an amount of good far exceeding the most sanguine expectations of its benevolent promoters." After speaking of the joys and sorrows of missionary work, the chairman alluded to the extensive educational agencies connected with the mission, and said that "something more was necessary than was now being done in England with regard to education. He hoped that ere long a compulsory system would be adopted, towards the expense of which all would be obliged to contribute, so that the cost of a free education for the people might not be as now—a charge upon the willing few. To the education received in the Hurst-street schools many were indebted for a good position in life."

The report of the committee, which was read by the secretary, Mr. Earl, gave a very satisfactory account of the work of the society throughout the year, and stated that the mission was becoming more and more recognised as the people's institution.

The Sunday schools were more numerously attended and more efficiently conducted than at any former period, the number in both schools being now 355. The deposits in the savings club had also increased, the amount for the year being £116. 15s. 10½d. The amount of half-crown subscriptions, £4. 17s. 6d., had been expended by the Ladies' Committee in materials for clothing for the destitute poor, which had been made up by the pupils in the girls' school. The provident society had been both prosperous and useful during the year. The total amount of receipts was £135. 5s., and the payments to sick members, medical fees, &c., amounted to £81. 3s. 4d., leaving a balance on the year of £54. 1s. 8d., and making the realised fund of the society £664. 11s. 11d. The number of members was 193. The daily schools fully maintained their established reputation. The average number of boys for the year was 222; average attendance, 193. The number of girls was 186, average attendance 134. Infants 230, and the average attendance 174. The school pence for the year amounted to £287 9s., the Government grant to £218. 16s. 3d., and the voluntary contributions £107. 17s. 6d. The report concluded by stating that "every department of the mission was designed to foster and encourage that self-help and self-dependence in the working man without which benevolent institutions, however numerous and calculated to minister to every variety of human suffering, would avail little to promote the true elevation of the poor and destitute, or to stay the plague of pauperism and crime which with ever increasing force spreads its baleful and demoralising influence throughout this Christian land."

The report was adopted on the motion of Mr. Councillor COLLINGS, who advocated a national system of compulsory education.

The Rev. B. WRIGHT then read a very comprehensive and interesting report of his peculiar labours among his still increasing congregation (numbering 200 members).

With laudable perseverance they had raised and presented the committee with £15 towards the expenses of the mission, besides providing for many things connected with public worship. The Sunday-school teachers had not only devoted themselves to their self-denying labours, but had also provided prizes for the children. Many of the pupils in the Sunday schools had from time to time become teachers, and also members of the congregation. About £400 had been paid into the different savings' clubs during the year. The night schools, penny entertainments, and social gatherings of various kinds had been unusually well attended, and altogether a most satisfactory and encouraging report of every department of Mr. Wright's labours was presented.

A cordial vote of sympathy with Mr. Wright, and of acknowledgment of the valuable aid rendered by Mrs. Wright in the work of the mission was passed on the motion of Mr. BROOKER SMITH, seconded by the Rev. A. GORDON, as was also a vote of thanks to Mr. Gordon for his discourses in aid of the funds of the society.

The following officers were then re-elected for the ensuing year, viz., J. H. Nettlefold, Esq., president; Mr. Earl, secretary; Mr. J. W. Hornblower, treasurer; and Mr. F. S. Bolton, school treasurer.

INTELLIGENCE

ABERDEEN.—The Unitarian cause here is progressing favourably under the ministry of the Rev. John G. Slater. During the winter months he has been delivering a series of controversial lectures, which have been well attended, a considerable number of his audience being strangers, a few of whom, at their own request, have had an interview with Mr. Slater, which has resulted in some of them becoming members of the church. The following are a few of the subjects which he has handled: "Inspiration," "The Atonement," "Colenso on the Pentateuch," "Who Wrote the Pentateuch?" "Eminent Unitarians," "The Protestant Pope," "The Catechism of Christ's Deity," "Religious Sensationalism," "The Second Chapter of Genesis—Eden," "Religious Character of Robert Burns;" and for Sunday next, the subject will be "The Fall."

BLITH.—A course of six Wednesday evening lectures, illustrative of Unitarian Christianity, was commenced in the Octagon Lecture Hall, Blith, on the evening of the 24th, by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Newcastle, the subject being "Thoughts about God." The lecture was listened to with the most earnest attention, by an intelligent audience of about 200, and in those parts where the lecturer compared the popular notions of God with more Christian views he was most warmly applauded.

BRIDPORT.—On Monday evening, March 29th, there was held in the Girls' School-room the last of six meetings for reading and music, which have been very well attended. The readings have been by the ministers, the Mayor of Bridport, and other members of the congregation; the music by the choir. On this occasion a harmonium was used for the first time, which has been purchased for the Girls' School with a legacy bequeathed by the late Miss Colfox. In the Boys' School-room a free evening class met thrice a week during the winter months, for youths who had left school. Two of the boys' teachers have been helped by three ladies, and instruction was given in French, history, geography, writing, arithmetic, &c. On Good Friday there was the usual religious service; and on the previous evening the commemoration of the anniversary of the Lord's Supper, at which the portions of the gospel were read relating to the last evening of our Saviour's mortal life.

CIRENCESTER.—On Good Friday the members of the congregation and friends took tea together in the chapel, and had the most agreeable evening gathering since the re-opening of the chapel. About 150 were present; among the number, Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas, of Fairfield. After tea the chief interest of the evening consisted in the hearing of recitations by the Sunday-scholars, interspersed by anthems from the choir.

KIDDERMINSTER.—There has been some unfortunate litigation at this chapel, the result of which is thus given by the Pall Mall Gazette:—"The Kidderminster so-called 'Presbyterian' church has been the subject of a judgment by Vice-Chancellor James. Was Mr. Parry validly appointed minister or not? By the deed, it was necessary that two-thirds of the men communicants of one year's standing, having paid the usual yearly subscriptions, should approve of the appointment in vestry. In March, 1868, Mr. Parry resigned, a fact not disputed. At Michaelmas following it was proposed to re-elect him. There were twenty votes for and fifteen against him. Thus he failed of the required majority. It was then proposed that there should be a temporary supply, and by a majority Mr. Parry was sought to be appointed till Christmas, 1869. But, as this was not approved by the proportion of male communicants provided for in the deed, the trustees sought to restrain Mr. Parry from acting even as temporary minister. The question was whether the restriction applied equally to a temporary and to a definitive appointment. The Vice-Chancellor declined interfering with a rule so reasonable as that when a third or more of the communicants declined a particular man's services he should not officiate as minister; for, as to any difference between a temporary and a permanent appointment, it was obvious that the former might be renewed from time to time without end. His Honour, therefore, gave judgment for the trustees and against Mr. Parry, but deducted from the costs as against that gentleman the sum of £50 in respect of certain rough methods which had been taken of preventing him from occupying the pulpit." We can only express our earnest hope that the Vice-Chancellor having authoritatively set aside the appointment out of which the difficulty arose, a spirit of conciliation will now be manifested by both parties in endeavouring to agree upon some minister who may again draw them together as a united people.

LONDON.—On Tuesday evening week, a lecture was delivered in the Court House by Mr. John Bowes, editor of the Truth Promoter, and author of a translation of the New Testament, subject, "Unitarianism weighed in the balance of Gospel Truth, and found wanting." After the lecture discussion was invited, when Mr. George Farmer and Mr. Thomas Hawley made a very able exposition and defence of the Unitarian system of theology, evincing (says the Staffordshire Sentinel) great scriptural knowledge and research. The lecture was well attended, the room being crowded to excess, and the leading and more intelligent section of the working classes mustering in considerable force.

NORWICH.—The secretary of the Octagon Chapel congregation has kindly sent us a copy of the "Deacons' Report" for the past year, presented at the annual meeting, March 21, 1869. It reports a generally favourable state of things; slightly increased subscriptions; an income from the offertory-boxes put up at the door not equal to that of last year; good attendance at the Sunday services, and a flourishing condition of the Sunday school and Brotherly Society; and expresses warm appreciation for the services of the minister, the Rev. J. D. H. Smyth. But why is there no statement of accounts? How are the members of the Octagon congregation to learn what their funds are, how they are raised and how spent? It is a great mistake to make any reserve about these things. The more the trustees and managers of a congregation take the people generally into their confidence, and let the affairs of the church be fully known to all, the greater interest in them will all take, and the more will all feel a personal responsibility to do the utmost in their power to help on a cause which each thus realises as his own.

ROCHDALE: CLOVER-STREET.—The annual party given to the choir, teachers, and friends in connection with this school took place on Tuesday evening week, the tea, as in previous years, being provided through the liberality of Mr. Ratcliffe. After tea the Rev. J. Freeston was called to the chair, when a very attractive programme was gone through to the satisfaction of the audience, and brief but energetic addresses were delivered at intervals. Revolving views, an electrical machine, a large telescope, and other objects of interest, imparted an agreeable variety to the entertainment. On Good Friday the scholars' annual party was held, Mr. James Sharpe presiding.

TAUNTON.—On Wednesday last, the social meetings held every fortnight through the winter, in the schoolroom adjoining the Unitarian Chapel, were brought to a close. Those meetings (for which a penny admission has been charged) have been conducted under the presidency of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, and have consisted of readings, recitations, and music, vocal and instrumental. They have been entirely carried out by members of the congregation, and judging from the large attendance and the satisfaction evinced, they appear to have afforded both pleasure and instruction.

AN APPEAL FOR THE IRISH CHURCH.—II.

To the Editors.—In reply to my letter in your last number you say that a "Confiscation" took place at the Reformation, of the religious property of the Irish people, and that it is now proposed to redress the injustice. This statement, often as it has been repeated, appears to me to have no foundation in history. The present Roman Catholic community in Ireland seceded from the National Church in the reign of Elizabeth, having for more than a generation previously accepted the Royal supremacy and abjured the Pope. They have, therefore, just as much right to the revenues of the Irish Church as the Free Church of Scotland has to those of the Scotch Establishment. But even if your view were right, what is to be said for the confiscation of endowments voluntarily and expressly given to the Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland before 1660? The state, it seems to me, has just as good a right to the revenues of Manchester College. Fully believing that Unitarians do not willingly countenance injustice, I ask your indulgence for troubling you with this second brief letter, and remain, gentlemen, very respectfully yours, JAMES GAIRDNER.

THE OPEN-CHURCH MOVEMENT.

To the Editors.—I trust the merits and demerits of this movement will receive full and fair dealing at the hands of the clergy and laity of our denomination. For if, as Mr. Herford shows, its material advantages are great, and it is, as he contends, calculated to develop amongst us greater spirituality, and impart more genuineness into our worship, surely it ought to receive the profoundest attention of all who have a spark of living interest in the cause of pure and vital Christianity. At present, however, his able letters have evoked but a smattering of criticism.

The question assumes a commercial and a religious phase. Commercially, it proposes a new mode of collecting the funds for the support of public worship, viz., by free contributions at each service. The mode, so far as Mr. Herford's experience goes, is a success. In the case of a very fashionable Ritualistic Church in this neighbourhood, I was told, the amount collected was less than £100 a year. And a collection from some 700 or 800 persons at another church, at a special choral service, was a miserable sum for so large a number, and contained a much larger proportion of farthings and halfpence than any other coins. This is to show the possibility of the mode of voluntary contributions proving a failure. Now, as there are certain permanent charges to be met by every congregational treasurer, to have an uncertain or fluctuating exchequer to draw upon, must be a source of perplexity and discomfiture to that indispensable officer. Nor does it seem right that the entire livelihood of the minister should depend upon so shifting a basis, to say nothing of his own sense of the infra dig. as he hears the drip-droppings of the small coins into the bags immediately after his sermon. To my mind, the whole religious pitch of the service is lowered some tones by the intervention of this most commercial of operations in the midst of it. Use, of course, is everything, and time, doubtless, would wear away any sense of incongruity that might at first be felt; still its existence must be allowed for as no inconsiderable obstacle to the adoption of the system by a body so sworn to the "proprieties" as our own.

Nor am I able to realise the beauty, efficacy, or attractiveness of that exquisite sensation of not knowing where you are going to sit when you go up to pay your weekly service to the Most High. I can fancy my Lady Hauteur discommoded to a degree at finding her skirts hob-nobbing with Jane's, her neighbour's cook. It is unchristian as to feel, we know; but is it worth while to disturb the quietude of so excellent a woman's mind on such an occasion by an arrangement (no less irritating at the same time to the poor cook), in order to teach her ladyship the lesson of common humanity?

I am compelled to stop here, as my space, I fear, for once is exhausted. WM. S. PRYER.

Bristol, March 20, 1869.

[1. All I have ever contended for on the commercial aspect of the question is, that if a people wish to do their best, there is no plan by which rich and poor can all alike give so much, with such perfect freedom from all pressure of incurred responsibility, as by the offertory. Your instances do not touch this position. 2. As to the sound of small coins being infra dig. to the minister, I confess that it does not weigh upon me half as oppressively as it used to do to know that every quarter some of my people were being dunned for seat-rents, which so collected were a burden. I would rather have small coins given willingly and easily, even with a little "drip-dropping," than larger quarterly sums given painfully in silence. 3. As to the unreliability of the income, it is a pure chimera. Wherever it has been thoroughly and heartily tried it has been found to furnish a larger income than before, with infinitely less difficulty. 4. The argument of the last paragraph (supposing our correspondent to be serious, which I cannot help doubting) is one which simply falls to the ground wherever the plan is tried. Whatever "sorting" the very proud or the very humble want takes place naturally. There is no harm in its taking place so. The harm is in stereotyping such distinctions, making them rigid and permanent, and excluding the possibility of their gradually wearing down.—B. H.]

FORMAL AND ACTIVE TRUSTEESHIP.

To the Editors.—In your leader of the 19th, headed "Open not loose trusts," you have, as it seems to me, a little confused the discussion of a graver question, partly by not distinguishing sufficiently between two senses of "trusteeship," and partly by too superficial a touch.

Trustees may be entrusted merely with that bare legal ownership of property which is necessary, under our present land law, for securing undisturbed enjoyment of it by those for whose benefit it has been or is to be set apart; or, they may be entrusted with an active charge of the property for securing the promotion of the founders' objects.

In the first case, their qualifications need not be more than will guarantee a reasonable permanency in office, and accessibility, if occasion require. Practically—with especial regard to rendering appointments of new trustees as infrequent as may be—a certain degree of local fixedness and a fair prospect of a long life are all that is wanted. It is of course usual for a society to seek its trustees amongst its acquaintances; but if it happen that these do not provide those essentials, it is common to select any persons of established standing who will allow themselves to be nominated to the formal office.

In the second case, it is even more important than that they should be settled, healthy and at hand, that trustees should be willing and able to promote the objects of the trust. Founders or conscientious survivors on an old foundation will—to echo your own phrase—select staunch representatives of the views that gave it birth.

If the distinctions thus stated be sound, it is obvious that your leading member, allowed his desire—grounded no doubt on his ability—to manage other people's affairs, to answer an invitation addressed solely to his personal respectability. (I have not the slightest idea who he is.) He was of course at liberty to decline the bare legal trusteeship if he did not wish to undertake it; or, if felt disinclined to trust the congregation with the management of property given to it with which he was to have even only a nominal association.

In the words just italicised, I venture to indicate the difficulty which I referred to above as a grave question, and as to which I think you failed to open the real issue.

Bare legal trusteeship nowise defines whether the trust of the foundation shall be open or close. It may be accompanied by a declaration of the object of the foundation either way. A chapel may be held by trustees on trust to permit it to be used for the public worship of God, which is popularly called an open trust; or for such worship by a congregation and minister moving in the groove of thoughtful and steadygoing freedom, which is a close trust.

Either declaration might equally accompany a most elaborate scheme of administrative trusteeship. On the other hand, the declaration may be omitted altogether, and yet either trusteeship may be made to cover an open or a close trust; namely, by means, as you suggest, of care in the appointment of trustees. Nay, by the same device, under the most open form, a trust virtually of the closest may be maintained. In this latter case, however, if the trustees were merely legal trustees, a congregation which had changed its position would be protected in its enjoyment of the building by the law of the land, as soon as it could exhibit the prescribed guarantee that the alteration was real and fairly enduring.

If the trustees were so in more than mere name, and had some real controlling power on the use and disposition of the property, they could of course effectually interfere with the independence of the congregation. This authority is in practice secured either by a "careful" arrangement of powers as to a new foundation; or, as to an old one not so providently guarded, if the congregation be inattentive or inert, by a more or less shameless usurpation by busy trustees of powers which neither public law nor their private deeds confer. In either case a "careful" selection of trustees is a most important measure for furthering this outrage on the liberty of conscience.

The question your leader intended to discuss was, in effect, whether for a new chapel occupied by a new congregation (both society and building having been raised by missionary enterprise and subscription), a bare or an active trusteeship is best. You pronounced the former practically equivalent to no trust at all; having, as it strikes me, begged the question by supposing the congregation to be such as not to be worthy to be trusted with the management of the property given to it.

Your paper, however, suggests the wider inquiry whether it is better to leave to each society the charge of its own development, subject to the chance of its falling a prey to a new minister, to new members, or to a party majority, or to provide the safeguard of active trusteeship, in the hands of staunch representatives of neighbouring churches, for the perpetual consecration of the property to objects of which the donors now approve, and the continuance of the congregations in the groove of thoughtful, steady-going freedom.

I do not see any but one answer to this inquiry, and that one condemnatory of the plan of active trusteeship. The objection is more obvious as against extraneous trusteeship, but is equally valid against active administrative trusts where the trustees belong to the congregation, unless great care be taken to secure the constant replenishment of the tale, and frequent revival of the list by the people.

It is a noble labour to rouse and foster that religious habit and that religious association which find their healthy development in the formation of worshipping societies, whether such encouragement be afforded by personal co-operation on the part of staunch neighbours (as earnest well-wishers of the growing grace of the new society, however, rather than as representatives of older ones), or by contributions for the support of the personal apostle in his chosen field.

By all means let the men with the mission, or the societies who find such men, gather their missionary congregations in the Mission Chapel, and patiently nurture and encourage the new life; but let them remember that adult life is ruined if it be not independent. By all means let the donors of the mission property, whether money or bricks, maintain their own responsibility for what they do with those talents of theirs, by personal administration or by a wise appointment of substitutes, whether they be called a committee or trustees. By all means join in such bodies—tried and proved local men—whether J.P.'s or cobblers. But as soon as the new society can go alone, let it go. Let it take the chapel it is accustomed to, if it is strong enough, by itself or by help from others who trust it, to buy it, or go, hived off as it has been called, to any other premises which it has strength to appropriate. A second-hand mission chapel ought to be reasonably priced, whatever its first cost may have been. But for the cause of personal responsibility, for the love of freedom, for the hope of membership in the universal church,—literally for God's sake—do not let us give chapels to infant societies and perpetuate their incompetency by subjecting them to the active trusteeship of outsiders! Nothing but the annual committee (with all due freedom of re-eligibility) can fitly or permanently represent the changing life of a congregation. Surely it is better that some should become priest-ridden and creed-bound if thereby they attain the highest culture they are capable of, and others, if needs must, should fail and break up than that the principle of the close trust should be revived; even under this innocent guise of a "careful selection of staunch trustees."

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A "Universal Jewish Synod" is to be held this year in Germany to unite the Jews all over the world in some agreement or compromise that shall annihilate the sects into which that ancient people are divided, and give them a Catholic unity such as they had in the days of David.

One of the most singular incidents of the late Holy Week at Rome was the arrival of eighty Hungarian gipsies, to see the Pope, and witness the ceremonies. Their chiefs were received by his Holiness, and formed a most singular novelty in St. Peter's.

Pio Nono has addressed a brief to the whole Christian world, granting a plenary indulgence to all who shall assist at mass and receive Holy Communion, being penitent for and confessed of their sins, on the 11th of April, in unison with his own jubilee, or fiftieth year mass, to be offered that day at St. Peter's. This brief is dated the 10th of March, and is given under the Ring of the Fisherman, a mark of great solemnity.

The Pall Mall is informed that a serious effort is being made to induce the Pope to prorogue indefinitely the Ecumenical Council. It seems that in one of the special congregations appointed to prepare the business, that charged with the due elaboration of the two cardinal points for which the Council has been convoked—the personal infallibility of the Pope and the condemnation of political liberalism in accordance with his declarations in the Syllabus—the doctors have fallen out amongst themselves, and cannot be brought to any agreement. But dissent on these two points ruins the whole project, and the Jesuits, therefore, who devised it, think it would be prudent to postpone it. The Pope, however, clings to it with the fondness of Jacob for Benjamin; and when these gentlemen, who had hitherto stimulated his anticipations of a glorious new paternity, approached him with a suggestion that it might be as well to give up the idea, he flew into one of his constitutional furies, and sent them back to reflect on what had best be done. After a while, they resolved to invoke the counsel of Cardinal Bilio, a prelate high in the Pope's favour. He accordingly went to him, and sought to open the intellect of the Holy Father to the grave danger of scandal to the Church in the event of such perversity being manifested in the council as had been displayed in the select congregation. But the Cardinal had no more favourable reception than his prompters. The Pope, however, was immovable. The Council should meet at the appointed time, and nothing should induce him to postpone it. But the Pope, though passionate, is a man of infirm resolution; and if the spirit of insubordination to Jesuit influence exhibited in the congregation should prove stubborn—which, no doubt, is a considerable assumption,—and if, as is affirmed, Cardinal Antonelli has become uneasy at certain manifestations, it is quite on the cards that the Ecumenical Council may be still put off as often and for as long periods as that of Trent was after convocation.

As we predicted, at the time of its appearance, would be the case, the Letter of Mr. Ffoulkes to Archbishop Manning has been condemned by the Congregation of the Index at Rome.

The party in Paris who do not believe in priests have been making a curious protest "in honour of the freedom of conscience." On Good Friday, when Catholics eat nothing at all, or nothing but fish, they ostentatiously fed on cold roast veal, and called their dinner a "banquet de la libre pensée."

No revolutionary Government in Spain has ever ventured to abrogate the ecclesiastical supremacy of the Church of Rome, or to tamper with that principle of "unity of faith" of which Spain has made its boast. We learn from the Daily News that Senor Olozaga, the chairman of the committee on the Constitution, has always stoutly maintained this principle, and never been willing to advance beyond a limited toleration of other forms of faith than that of Rome. He is now prepared to concede liberty of worship to all religious communions, provided that none but the Roman—the one acknowledged Church of the State—shall be allowed to celebrate their services in buildings publicly and formally consecrated to their use. A Protestant congregation might thus assemble in an upper room without hindrance from the authorities, but not open a "church" in a public thoroughfare. The majority of the committee, however, are for proclaiming the separation of Church and State, and leaving each communion to its own resources. The ecclesiastical dignitaries who were invited to confer with the committee are understood to have expressed their preference for a total separation of Church and State, rather than a distinct recognition of liberty of worship and of conscience, if the ancient unity of faith cannot be maintained intact. The Cortes will have to decide the question, but looking to the prevailing sentiment of the nation, one cannot be very sanguine as to the result.

According to an article in the Evangelical Review (American), the Lutherans are by far the largest Protestant denomination in the world. Out of eighty million Protestants, they profess to have more than one-half, or 47,115,500. Of these Protestants, Germany has 25,000,000. In the United States are 1,000,000. These statistics show, says the Lutheran Observer, that the Lutheran Church is larger than all other Protestant churches combined, and that even in the United States she is numerically the third denomination, numbering more communicants than any other Church, except the Methodists and Baptists.

A conference has been held in London, over which the Bishop presided, to promote the movement, now becoming general, to turn to account the services of laymen in evangelistic work, and other departments of the Church's labours. The Bishop gave his hearty approval to the movement, and said he could not understand any clergyman refusing lay help. The co-operation of the faithful laity was indispensable if the Church was to discharge her duties.

A correspondent of the English Independent, while he thinks teetotalism very admirable, as an act of self-denial on the part of those who practise it, but doubts whether the masses are influenced by it, believes that there is another way by which they may be weaned from the gin shop and their deadly draughts, and he means to try it. He says:

"Of all things, the working man likes his pipe. And why not? There is no harm in a pipe. It does not lead to drunkenness. Therefore I think of doing this, to show practically how a man may enjoy himself without getting drunk, this way. I shall hire a room that may be made comfortable with chairs and tables, and a good fire, and I will say to twenty or thirty men, 'Come and spend an hour or two with me twice a week or so, and smoke your pipe, and we will read the paper and have a talk, and you shall have a pint of beer each, but no more, or tea or coffee. But any one that comes must bind himself not to get drunk, or take more than a pint of beer, or drink drams at any time, or use bad language or his wife badly.'"

The power of voluntaryism is strikingly shewn in the annual report of Surrey chapel. It appears that there were 1,326 communicants, and that the amount raised at the sacramental offertory for the poor exceeded £360. The Benevolent Society, for aiding the sick at their own homes, irrespective of creed, had relieved 650 cases, and expended £337. For thirteen Sunday-schools, in which nearly 6000 children were taught by 500 teachers, £679 had been raised. Six day and evening schools, in which nearly 1,600 children are taught, received £249, and an industrial girls' school £70. For a special missionary to the working men of South London £213 had been contributed. An auxiliary to the London City Mission, employing three agents, received £167. The treasurer of the Christian Instruction Society, which holds upwards of twenty services weekly among the poor, visiting many of the lodging-houses and ministering to beggars, costermongers, tramps, &c., acknowledged upwards of £100. A temperance society received £40; the Bible Society £53; the Tract Society £63; the Dorcas and Female Clothing Societies £66. For foreign missions £144 had been contributed, and (with the aid of some friends outside) £830 had been added to the fund being raised in view of the expiration of the lease. Upwards of £870 had been contributed for the incidental expenses of worship, including the salary of an assistant minister. Thus nearly £4,000 had been raised, in addition to the support of their pastor, by a congregation composed chiefly of persons in humble life.

A suspicion has now and then crossed our minds whether "Father Ignatius," and some of the wilder Ritualists, were not fit subjects for an inquiry before certain of her Majesty's Commissioners. We should have no doubt in the case of a curate, thirteen or fourteen miles from Sheffield, if what a local paper tells us be literally true. It says he resolved to simulate the death, burial, and resurrection of the Saviour, and ordered a coffin to be got ready for him by Good Friday, expressing his intention to entomb himself from that day until Easter Sunday. The coffin was made of plain deal, with handles of rope, and was sent to the curate's lodgings, where his landlady on seeing it immediately fainted. It was placed in the rev. gentleman's study, and it is said that he invited several friends to visit him during the week preceding Good Friday, but his invitations were generally politely declined. Before the day of entombment arrived the vicar heard of the affair, and the coffin was destroyed by his orders, much to the grief of the curate, who, however, declared his intention of procuring another. Whether he did so has not yet transpired, but we should hope he has some friends to look after him.

The modification of Ritualistic practices, which was observable at All Saints' Church, Lambeth, for some time after the judgment of the Privy Council in the Mackonochie case, has at length subsided, and on Easter Sunday there was full service, with observances of even a more pronounced character rather than previous to the decision. During the consecration prayer in the Communion service, the Rev. F. G. Lee, the vicar, elevated the paten and cup on high, and genuflected low at the conclusion. The English Churchman says it is not true that the prosecution against Mr. Bennett has broken down. The state of the case is this: A commission of inquiry against him was sought and obtained. Subsequently Mr. Bennett re-issued a work also alleged to contain heretical doctrine. It became a question whether the case against him arising out of the first commission should be supplemented by materials drawn from this latter work or not. The promoters decided that it should, and in compliance with the law sought from the present Bishop of London a supplementary commission. This the Bishop has refused; but the steps which the promoters will take to insist on his giving way are settled, and it may be taken as certain that the case will go on.

From the report just issued by the Mormons, it appears that they have eight branches in London, with 104 elders, 38 priests, 23 teachers, and 30 deacons, hard at work. During the past year, 102 members were "cut off," but 915 of the faithful remain, and there has been "but little emigration." This looks as if there were likely to be a permanent settlement of these polygamists in the metropolis.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In a speech at a public meeting in Ottawa, the Bishop of Ontario, making special allusion to the trials besetting the Irish Church, spoke of his experience of like changes in the Canadian one. He candidly confessed that he would not now exchange the present condition of this for her former condition as an endowed establishment, and encouraged his co-religionists in Ireland not to be dismayed by the prospect of what was about to befall them, but to be of good cheer. In the course of his remarks he said:

"It is true that we have now no State aid, but we are free from State restrictions on our development. It is true we have no legal superiority of status, but we have what is better, Synodical action. Men are not now, it is true, attracted to our altars or to our communion by the glitter of worldly advantage; but then we have compensation in the fact that they are not now deterred by jealous dislike of our privileges from examining our claims as a Divine institution, our apostolical order and our evangelical truth—our antiquity, our literature, our common sense. I have, therefore, no fear for the Church, though she be disestablished."

The respective characteristics of the two great preachers, Gratry and Hyacinthe, who divided the attention of the devout in Paris during "Holy Week," are well described by the "occasional correspondent" of the Daily News. Gratry, he says, is scientific and philosophical; Hyacinthe practical and human, or humane. The former aims to ally reason with faith, to reconcile natural with revealed truth; the latter strives to exalt the moral standard of the faithful, to elicit and cultivate their consciences as well as to touch their hearts. Gratry goes so far in the broad direction as to speak of generous thoughts and good deeds as "deposits of the man's self in the bosom of his Creator; the doctrine of Hyacinthe is of equal breadth though he may reach it by another way. He appears to preach "the primordial unity of Christians and Mussulmans, of Isaac and Ishmael." They and their disciples will in the end be of the religion of Alexander Pope rather than of Pope Pius; Hyacinthe, for example, who was preaching for the Arab Schools in Algeria, openly declaring that there needed "no attempt at conversion" of pupils.

A correspondent of the Record wants to know whether the Episcopal Church in South Africa is a branch of the English Church, or a Church of South Africa; and what will be the status in England of clerics ordained by Bishop Maerorie. He says:

"Is not the practical state of the Colenso case simply this? That neither Christ nor the English Church have conferred on Bishop Gray any authority to depose Bishop Colenso from the diocese of Natal. He may decline to hold communion with him; he may even from time to time supersede him; but that is all."

It is said that the leading men in the Scotch Establishment look with much disfavour on the proposed union of the other Presbyterian bodies; and the reason assigned for this is that if the union were effected, the Nonconformists would have a Church numbering about 1,600 congregations, while the number of the Established is only from 920 to 930, and therefore the latter would be in a decided minority.

A correspondent of the Guardian, in reply to a defence of the Bishop of Exeter, gives a sad account of the state of his diocese, which shows that Establishments have their disadvantages as well as Nonconformity. Among other charges, the Bishop has never known his clergy, but taken his estimate of them from a small band, not always the wisest of men, by whom he has been surrounded; his diocese has long been known as the one in which curates with only their merits to trust to were absolutely without a chance of preferment; nepotism has ceased only because the supply of relatives unprovided for has at length been exhausted; if report speaks truly, the management of these matters has got into female hands; there are in the diocese twenty-four curates, receiving grants from the Curates' Augmentation Fund, and there are many holders of Episcopal livings whose labours would be amply recompensed by £100 a year; the Bishop's official representative is his eldest son, the Vicar of St. Gluvias, the Rector of Budock, the Archdeacon of Cornwall, a Prebend of Exeter, and the Chancellor of the diocese; and whoever may be the next Bishop of Exeter will succeed to such a legacy of disorder and confusion as can be paralleled, the writer hopes, in no other diocese in the kingdom.

The Times considers that the course to be taken by Irish Churchmen and their English allies in Parliament is clear. On the principle of the bill there can be no compromise whatever. The Church must be diestablished, and it must lose the endowments which adhere to establishment. But in the details of so important a measure there must be many things open to criticism, and long debates will give opportunities for successful interposition. To speak in plain terms, the Irish Church must be content to direct its efforts to keeping as much of its property as possible, and to this the action of the Opposition must come at last, whatever protestations and denunciations may be indulged in at present. The Government would probably be willing to conciliate the Irish Churchmen, and would yield more, perhaps, than strict justice sanctions. The Catholics will get their Maynooth money, their right to which is very doubtful, simply because there is a disposition to content everybody in such cases as this. So the Protestants may even better the very liberal terms which the Government has offered them. On the other hand, "No surrender" will be utterly ruinous in Committee.

Our readers may remember that "Father Ignatius" went down to Norwich a short time ago with the intention of driving a Baptist lady out of his Monastery there, but that her reception of him was such as led him to change his purpose. He now asks,

"Why is it that my Catholic friends are so angry with me because I did not fight Miss Robinson and her 'deacons?' and why is it that many of Miss Robinson's friends have treated her unkindly because she didn't give the word of command for an onslaught upon that dreadful man 'Father Ignatius' and his monks? Why is it? Ah, sir, the Catholics who are angry, and the Baptists who are angry, cannot have considered the matter in the light of the Gospel of our blessed Master

I pray that there may be thousands of such women as Miss Robinson and Mrs. Booth, with hearts like theirs, brimful and overflowing with the love of our own Lord Jesus, whom the world still hates and despises. Of course I feel most strongly that the particular way in which these holy Protestant ladies set to work is an eccentric and unprecedented one, yet the one bright, dazzling object that must attract every heart that loves the Lord Jesus, and that has witnessed the zeal of these good souls, is the bright burning light of the Master's love in them and about them."

In some "Papers on Methodism," Dr. W. Cooke thus speaks with justifiable pride of the denomination to which he belongs:

"One hundred and nine years ago the Methodist community had no existence, but now it may be asked, 'Where does it not exist? Where is its blessed influence not felt?' Besides reviving religion in other churches it has filled our land with religious light, with a living and efficient ministry, and thousands of Sabbath schools. It has extended to the regions beyond, and, despite all opposition, has fixed itself in every quarter of the world. It has hastily followed the track of the navigator, and tamed and blessed many of the most savage islanders, with the enlightening and soul-transforming influence of Gospel principles. It has anticipated the researches of the traveller, and outstripped the enterprising colonist, in exploring the dark regions of the earth, as the scenes where its benign labours might illumine and save degraded man. And now this system of yesterday numbers in its various sections one million six hundred and seventy thousand members; and employs five thousand eight hundred circuit ministers, and probably about twenty thousand or upwards of local preachers; while in missionary contributions it takes the lead of the oldest and wealthiest denominations in the world!"

The failure in preaching power which has been remarked in the Establishment, having been attributed by a writer in the Guardian to the present devotion to athletics at the Universities, "Cantab" replies that formerly there was a great deal of tandem-driving and steeple-chasing, which was much worse, and he believes that the younger clergy who emerge from the lower strata of undergraduates have quite as much preaching power, and more general culture, and a far higher sense of duty, than their predecessors. In the higher order of preaching he admits there may be a deficiency, and this is the reason he assigns for it:

"University reform has greatly diminished the inducements which attracted into the clerical body much of the highest intellect of the day; and open competition for public employments is daily more and more drawing off clever men from a profession in which no amount of industry or devotion will suffice to secure promotion. I think the Bishops are not blameless in having failed, as a class, to set an example which would have entitled them to claim an influence in the bestowal by merit of public or private patronage. Until the Church can offer 'an open career to talent'—not to literary talent like that of the Bishops of Ely and Lincoln or the Dean of Westminster, nor educational talent like that of the late and present Archbishops of Canterbury—but to purely professional talent, exhibited in the exercise of unobscured duties in obscure places—till then I think it is somewhat idle to complain that the Church is not served universally by a higher order of preachers."

The following note to the Perth Courier, from "John Davidson, writer," may be worth giving as a curiosity:

"I observe by the newspapers that a Unitarian preacher from Dundee has been trying to unsettle the faith of the people of Perth, by obtruding his bold, bad creed, and that they ignored him. This was to be expected from the 'Fair City,' blessed with such faithful Christian ministers, among whom ranked high my esteemed friend, the late Rev. John Milne. Christianity rests solely on Christ's divinity, which is the basis of his omnipotent atonement. His whole life proclaimed His divinity, and it was triumphantly crowned at his death. It is terrible, then, in any miserable sinner, to go about and teach a contrary doctrine. This is rank blasphemy, and nothing but the Divine curse can be looked for from such malevolent procedure."

A "College Fellow" at Oxford, in a letter to the Times, thus describes the "religious teaching" at the Universities, of which so much use is made by those who would close them against Dissent:

"I think it is not too much to take for granted that in a Christian country every child, at least in the class which comes to the Universities, has learnt the elements of religion in the nursery or in the lower forms of the school; and that, therefore, it is no part of the function of a University to teach them, any more than it is to teach the arts of reading or writing. And yet it is these rudiments and these alone which are taught in the college lectures; it is these, and these alone, in which the University (I speak of Oxford only) examines for the degree. It is true that the candidate is required to stumble through a short passage in the original Greek; but this any person can do at sight who is capable of passing through Oxford at all; and I do not think that any student who was unequal to such a task would be turned back if he could give an account of some of the details of the gospel history, and of a few of the more familiar facts of the Old Testament, and repeat, by rote, a sentence or two out of one of the Thirty-nine Articles. If I may speak of myself as a fair sample of men who have undergone the process of 'religious teaching' in Oxford, my experience is this:—I construed portions of the Greek Testament to my tutor on five or six several occasions during the four years and a half of my undergraduate career, and I occupied the whole of the day before my degree examination in looking up a few facts in a Compendium of Biblical History, and in learning by rote as many of the Articles of Religion as I could in so short a time. The next day I answered ten questions out of twelve in the examination, most of which I could have answered equally well before I left the nursery. This, then, is the 'religious teaching' which the University of Oxford requires all her students who are not extra ecclesiam Anglicanum to undergo. Those who declare themselves Dissenters may bring up an extra classical book instead. But it is important to observe that, if we except the learning of the Articles, 'this religious teaching,' supposing it desirable to continue such a farce, would not be in the least affected by the abolition of tests, or the admission of Dissenters to fellowships."

GOOD FRIDAY IN PARIS.

FROM the accounts given of the observances of the Holy Week in Paris, Mr. Lowder and his sympathisers might have found it worth their while to pay a visit to the French capital and take a lesson there. On Holy Thursday and Good Friday, the ceremonies of washing the feet, and the Adoration of the Cross attracted such crowds that at some of the churches entrance was almost impossible. The administration of the Sacrament at Notre Dame on this annual occasion is confined to men, and great numbers resort thither to avoid the crush at the parish churches. The Tombeaux at the latter on Good Friday were decorated with great splendour. At the Madeleine, in particular, the display of flowers was something marvellous. The Tombeaux was fitted up at an open side chapel, a large cross with a winding-sheet suspended on it standing at the summit. In addition to a profusion of the choicest plants, almost every lady visiting it carried a bouquet in her hand, and these were piled up in hundreds on the steps of the altar. The crowd was so great that a considerable body of sergents de ville was stationed both inside and out, to preserve order and form a gangway of approach to the altar-railing, where two boys or lay vicars presented crucifixes to be kissed, wiping them with linen cloths after each salutation. This is the Visite au Tombeau, or Adoration of the Cross, the great ceremony of the day, and which goes on from morning to night. At the Tombeau the sacred vessels, the candlesticks, cups, and the Pix itself, are thrown down and scattered confusedly on the altar, to symbolise the disarray of the Church. Around the Tombeaux there is a blaze of light, typical of that "light which no darkness can overspread," while the high altar and the rest of the Church are left in obscurity. The vast temple-like interior of the Madeleine is well adapted to this ceremony, and produces it with great effect. Low chants of the Agonie break forth at intervals, and the huge, dimly lighted expanse and the vast surging crowd which fills it make the spectacle very imposing. There is now also a complete abstention from those puerilities of imitation, and that exhibition of details of the scene intended to be recalled, in pasteboard and canvas, which used to disfigure the rite in French, and still do in Italian, churches. But the impression is less favourable in most of the other parish churches. In these the Tombeaux is usually erected in a small enclosed side chapel, off the main body of the church, into which you have often to squeeze your way with as much difficulty as into the pit of a theatre, to find yourself at last in the presence of a mere exhibition of wax-figures, which has no more solemnity about it than a rare-show, and at an atmosphere heated to the temperature of a furnace.

THE SKOPZIAN SECT.

THE Berlin correspondent of the Manchester Guardian furnishes us with the clearest account which we have met with of the origin of this peculiar sect, which has caused so much excitement in Russia, and is at present undergoing investigation by a Government commission. It appears that the sect has existed for several centuries, but that its more extended operations commenced about the year 1770, with the appearance of its great prophet Selivanoff. He is supposed to have been a peasant from the village of Stolbovo, and among his disciples was known by the title of Gossudar Batushka, a diminutive of endearment, which may be translated "Master Fatherkin." He resided at Tula for some time under the name of the Hermit of Kieff, where he gained over many converts to his horrible doctrines and disgusting practices. He afterwards travelled from place to place dressed like a beggar, and with variable success, sometimes finding it necessary to hide to escape the anger of unbelievers. The congregations or brotherhoods which he established were called

"ships," and in the most important of them, called "the great ship," a leading part was played by the prophetess, Anna Romanovna, who declared Selivanoff to be "God over the gods, Czar over the czars, and Prophet over the prophets." But the official head of the great ship was a peasant woman, named Aculina Ivanovna, who proclaimed Selivanoff to be "the Son of God, born of herself according to the word of the prophet." About the end of 1774 a band of Skopzians established itself in the village of Sosnoffska. The sect, which already numbered many thousands, now attracted the attention of the Government; Selivanoff was arrested at Tula, condemned to the knout, and the punishment was carried into execution at Sosnoffska. While on his way to receive it the people jeered at him, but his followers saluted him as the Saviour. He was then sent to Siberia, chained to a robber, named Ivanushka, whom he is supposed to have converted during the journey. He remained five years in Siberia, without having any communication with his friends; but at the end of this time a new prophetess arose, named Anna Safonovna Popova, who declared that the place of Selivanoff's captivity had been revealed to her supernaturally. Two of his friends, Alexei Torasjevitch and Mark Karpovitch, travelled accordingly to Irkutsk, the place in question, and assisted him in effecting his escape. According to other accounts, he was pardoned by the Emperor Paul. Where he passed the years immediately succeeding his exile I am unable to say, but in 1797 we find him in the town hospital at St. Petersburg, and shortly afterwards in a lunatic asylum, evidently the place for which he was most fitted. After the death of the Emperor he was removed to another asylum, adjoining the monastery of Smolna. A few months later Alexei Jeliansky, a chamberlain, and councillor of state, begged the directors of the asylum to allow Selivanoff to reside with him, and the request was granted. It was afterwards discovered that Jeliansky was himself a Skopzian, an offence for which he was punished with several years' confinement. Selivanoff then lived successively with a fanatical adherent of his doctrines, named Isidor Nenastieff, the rich merchant, Kostroff, brother-in-law of the prophetess Anna Safonovna, and longest of all with the millionaire Solodovnikoff. The last years of his life were spent in the monastery of Susdal, whither he had been sent by the Government, with directions that he should be kindly treated, and where he died in 1832, more than a hundred years of age. During the latter years of his life he is reported to have shown remorse and penitence for his career. His behaviour towards strangers was quiet and reserved, and even at the meetings of the sectarians he is reported not to have spoken much himself, but to have preferred listening to his prophets. One thing appears certain, namely, that in these Skopzians we have come upon a page of history the very existence of which was unknown to the world in general, and which, if by no means attractive, is at least very extraordinary when considered merely as a psychological phenomenon. The great extent of the sect, and the number of converts, are irresistible evidence that the Skopzian doctrines possess some peculiar fascination which is hitherto a mystery, but which, perhaps, may receive some light from the impending investigations. As Skopzian parents have only one child, and the increase of their numbers depends entirely upon the accession of new converts, their accumulation of enormous wealth may be explained, but it is difficult to imagine that the wish to be connected with so rich a sect is the only secret of the success of their propaganda. That they are extremely rich is beyond all question. The amount of their treasures recently discovered in the cellars of their chief at Morshansk has been stated differently within the last few weeks, but according to the most recent accounts it is about 48,000,000 roubles, or £7,000,000.

AMERICAN NOTES.

Mr. Emerson has been giving a course of lectures in Boston which have been very successful. In the last, on "Greatness," he spoke thus hopefully of the signs of the times:

"We have seen and are seeing the passing away of barriers to human happiness. We see tyranny fallen—fallen near us—falling far off, and the human race looking forward for land for the million, education for the race, and constantly carried to new ideas. To every man is power in the State. The corruptions of the Church are assailed and corrected. The noblest of reforms are already commenced, including among them the best interests of woman, and her position as she herself shall decide it. What are these but the promises and the preparation of the day when the air of the world shall be purified by nobler society, when the measure of greatness shall be usefulness in the highest sense—greatness consistent with truth?"

Mr. Emerson told of a man that had known Dr. Channing for years, who was so far gone in liberality that he said he thought "the Doctor was capable of virtue;" mind, he didn't say of "religion."

We have more than once expressed the opinion that Mr. Liddon's "Bampton Lectures" had been greatly over-rated, and the New Englander, an orthodox journal, seems to think the same. It considers that the discussion is unnecessarily drawn out. It attempts to be exhaustive, and becomes rather exhausting. There is not a strong, manly grasp of opposing systems and opinions. There is too much of the slightly solemn, gently patronising, Churchly tone for the best effect of the book upon those outside of the author's ecclesiastical and theological fold. No minister can read this volume without receiving from it much instruction; but he will have good reason to regret that it is not better. The late Dr. Robinson was once asked if Ellicott was not an excellent commentator? "A good commentator," was the reply. "But he is not a devout commentator?" "Yes, devout," replied the blunt Doctor, "after the English fashion—he begins all the designations of God, and all the pronouns referring to God, with capitals." There is a species of Anglican, ecclesiastical devoutness which is easily marked in not a few productions of really excellent men, but which wears a provincial and not wholly pleasing aspect.

The Methodists have built a sort of cathedral in Washington, styled "a memorial church," the cost of which is to be 250,000 dollars. The tower is to have a peal of bells, and the spire rises 240 feet high. All the windows are personal memorials in stained glass, as also the windows of the Sunday school attached. President Grant attended the opening, with Chief Justice Chase, Speaker Colfax, and many other senators and representatives. Mr. Punshon was the preacher.

In Dr. Bushnell's new book, "Moral Uses of Dark Things," is an essay on insanity, which contains the following description of a man who learns to comprehend and control his own weaknesses and variations of mood:

"Now a wise man is one who understands himself well enough to make due allowance for such insane moods and varieties, never concluding that a thing is thus or thus because just now it bears that look; waiting often to see what a sleep, or a walk, or a cool revision, or perhaps a considerable turn of repentance will do. He does not slash upon a subject or a man, from the point of a just now rising temper. He maintains a noble candour, by waiting sometimes for a gentler spirit, and a better sense of truth. He is never intolerant of other men's judgments, because he is a little distrustful of his own. He restrains the dislikes of prejudice, because he has a prejudice against his dislikes. His resentments are softened by his condemnations of himself. His depressions do not crush him, because he has sometimes seen the sun, and believes it may appear again. He revises his opinions readily, because he has a right, he thinks, to better opinions, if he can find them. He holds fast sound opinions, lest his moodiness in change should take all truth away. And if his insane thinking appears to be toppling him down the gulfs of scepticism, he recovers himself by just raising the question, whether a more sane way of thinking might not think differently? A man who is duly aware thus of his own distempered faculty, makes a life now different from one who acts as if he were infallible, and had nothing to do but just to let himself be pronounced."

In a recent pastoral, Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, said:

"We live with people—our earthly lot is cast among them—who do not believe in Jesus Christ. One class of our fellow-citizens, whose ancestors cried out, 'His blood be upon us and our children,' maintain that he was not God, but a vile impostor, and therefore justly slain by their forefathers; and this they teach on every Sabbath in their synagogues."

In reply, Rabbi Isaac M. Wise declares that such a charge is the seventh abomination enumerated in Prov. vi. 19. He says:

"It is utterly false, absolutely untrue, that any of the Jews maintain that Jesus was a vile impostor, that He was justly slain, or that anything of the kind or anything similar to it is taught at any time in our synagogues. The whole statement, in the aggregate and in all its parts, is a condemnable falsehood. The archbishop never heard such a thing in any synagogues; he never read it in any Jewish book; it is his own."

A correspondent of the Watchman (Methodist) having stated that Universalism has nearly "run out" in New York and its vicinity, the Liberal Christian says he forgot to add that most of it has "run into" "Evangelical" churches.

Dr. Bellows asserts that there is hardly an Orthodox minister in America who owes his popularity to his creed.

We mentioned a fortnight since some that of the American papers had been stating that Mr.

Beecher was in danger of a softening of the brain. On re-appearing in his pulpit, he made a humorous complaint of them for abusing his health. He remarked that no one knows what it is to suffer until he reads what the papers say about him. The press had pronounced him dangerously ill, which was untrue. He thought it strange that he should be denied the right to have a cold three days unmolested. He saw no occasion for the newspaper fraternity to hunt a man down because he happened to have a cold. It was bad enough to suffer intrusion without being misrepresented. He was happy to announce that his health was good, and that he would preach as usual on the following Sunday.

DEFENDERS (?) OF THE IRISH CHURCH.

To judge from the sort of language made use of by many of those who are for maintaining the Irish Establishment as it is, one might be almost tempted to think that they had been smitten with judicial blindness, and were forced to contribute to the object of the men to whom they are most bitterly opposed. A judgment which, as Lord STANLEY admits, is "virtually a national decision," has been given against them; yet, instead of setting themselves calmly and dispassionately to argue the grounds on which this rests, and clearly pointing out the reasons which make them regard it as impolitic or unjust, they weakly give way to idle passion, and indulge in foolish rhodomontade, and call names, and fling about coarse abuse, which can only have the effect of irritating those upon whom it is poured, and rendering them more resolute in carrying out their purpose without shrinking or compunction. The past week has been fertile in utterances of this kind. Thus we have the Bishop of MANCHESTER, at a Diocesan Church Building Society, describing the Government proposal as "an extensive measure of unprincipled spoliation," and Her Majesty's ministers, par consequens, as a set of unprincipled spoliators; and, in sympathy with his brother prelate, we find the Bishop of CASHIEL, at a meeting in Waterford, likewise denouncing their measure as "a moral iniquity," with which there is no room for compromise." At an Ossory Diocesan gathering, the Earl of CARRICK also declared that if the bill for disestablishment passed, it "would be the greatest national sin that was ever committed," and in one of the Irish formal declarations of opinion the change contemplated, with that peculiar insight into the Divine secrets which some men possess, was pronounced to be "highly offensive to Almighty God." And at Derry-lane, in the diocese of Kilmore, a resolution was passed expressing "a determination to hold possession of the churches, glebes, and ecclesiastical residences, even by physical force, if necessary." Whether the vexed and disconsolate friends of the Irish Establishment have derived much comfort from this bold resolve of Derry-lane to resist, if need be, the whole power of the British empire, we cannot say; and we know not whether they were greatly "lightened" by the solemn assurance of Mr. CHARLEY, the junior member for Salford, that he "believes himself to be an instrument in the hands of a Higher Power to work out a high and holy mission" on that arch-traitor the present Prime Minister; but we should think it could hardly be said even of them that "their faces were not ashamed," when they read the speech which Dr. Gregg, Bishop of Cork, made at a charitable meeting in that city. He gave his opinion thus: "They heard talk of bills and bills, but Bill Gladstone might go to the — (his friends fill up the blank with "wall," but the reporters unanimously agree that the word used was the "d—l") with his bill. It had yet to go through the House of Commons, where it would be licked into shape. When it went into the House of Lords he trusted it would be licked in another sense. He hoped they would lick it like a bear and leave nothing but the bare skin, and make Mr. Gladstone a present of it to stuff and put in his museum, and as Milton said, "Grin on it." Surely the force of vulgarity could no further go. But one Mr. Puxley, at the same meeting, followed hard on the heels of his bishop. Speaking of the Queen, he said, "Let her own good sense tell her whether it is right for her to perjure herself. It is a cowardly thing of Gladstone to take this opportunity when a poor woman is on the throne to confuse her and endeavour to make her commit perjury. If Prince Albert were living he would not dare do it. The poor Queen relies on her Ministers to advise her, and Gladstone, the traitor, the renegade, is one of them." We wonder whether any sane individual can possibly imagine for a moment that stuff like this can have any other effect than that of showing how ill fitted the men who can give vent to it must be to recommend Protestantism in the midst of a Catholic people, or to make it aught but a by-word and a reproach.

It is refreshing, however, to find among the more thoughtful clergy, one here and there uttering his protest against this style of "defiance," not "defence," and putting in a word for common sense and right feeling. The day after the Bishop of MANCHESTER's tirade, a letter appeared in the Manchester Guardian from the Rev. W. C. DOWDING, dated from Great Eccleston Vicarage, near Garstang, in which he refers to the language we have quoted above and expresses himself in the following manly strain:

As a clergyman I ask permission to put from me this language. Connected with a (still) Established Church, we are, in some sense, state officers, as well as bishops and priests; and to speak thus in bitterness—scarcely veiled—of the Premier is not quite loyal to the powers "that be." Glance for a moment at the sister profession. Would any of the judges use such freedom?

And what will be thought of it by liberal churchmen? Can such no longer attend a public meeting for church purposes, without being denounced as unprincipled spoilers? Is the Chancellor a "spoiler" with his generous purse? or "unprincipled" as he stoops to teach a class in a Sunday school?

We are afraid that the contrast between these different styles will outweigh all that our correspondent of last week can say in support of the Irish Establishment.

HELP FOR BARNARD CASTLE.

Our friends at Barnard Castle are so far away from any of our more wealthy congregations, and have been carrying on their work so worthily and faithfully in their isolation, that we wish to give their appeal a hearty word of commendation.

The Barnard Castle congregation originated in the movement of freer thought which passed through some of the Methodist bodies in the North a quarter of a century ago. Never wealthy enough to support a minister, it has still thriven, and its services have been conducted mainly by a band of earnest laymen, conspicuous among whom was the late Mr. GEORGE BROWN, whose "Words from a Layman's Ministry" many of our readers are familiar with; together with Mr. JOSEPH LEE, Mr. STEPHEN KIRLEY, and Mr. JOHN CARTER. Mr. BROWN's death appeared to infuse a new resolve into the congregation, not to be discouraged by what seemed at first an irreparable loss, and it has continued to grow. There is now a regular attendance, ranging from fifty to eighty worshippers. The small, inconvenient building in which they have met has long been found utterly inadequate to the wants of the place, and the friends there have for years been hoping and working with a view to obtain a more suitable place for worship. Mr. BROWN was deeply interested in this matter, and since his death the members of the congregation have felt with redoubled force the obligation laid upon them to go on with it. They feel that the erection of a new church would not only supply their own pressing need, but would be a fitting and permanent memorial of the life and labours of one of the most accomplished and devout laymen that ever led the worship of our churches. They have purchased a site for a new chapel in the centre of the town, and in one of its principal thoroughfares, and have secured a commodious schoolroom adjoining the site, where worship can be temporarily conducted. It is estimated that the whole cost of the site, schoolroom, and new chapel will be about £1,000. Towards this amount the friends at Barnard Castle pledge themselves to raise from £300 to £350. This sum is very large for them, and ought to bring them ready help from others in raising the remaining £600.

The work doing at Barnard Castle, and the people who work and worship there, are well known to us, and we heartily commend the case to our readers. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association have marked their sense of the importance of the work by heading the subscription list with a grant of £30.

Contributions may be forwarded to Mr. JOSEPH LEE, Barnard Castle; or to the Rev. J. C. STREET, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

The late Dr. Barham.

On the 3rd of March, Thomas Foster Barham suddenly and peacefully entered into rest, aged seventy-four years. He had studied at Cambridge, with the intention of taking orders; but doubts as to some of the doctrines of the Church induced him to prepare for the medical profession. He took the degree of M.B.; but—it is believed from increased scruples as to subscribing the articles—did not proceed to that of M.D. He became, however, a licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians.

Soon after leaving the University, he settled at Exeter, and published a "Help to Scriptural Worship" in 1821. In 1834, he aided the Rev. H. Acton to compile a liturgy containing eight forms of prayer, the fourth edition of which was printed in 1846, in which year he published a valuable collection of prayers for domestic worship. His religious opinions were those that have been called Evangelical Unitarianism. In his first work, "Unitarian Doctrine," he maintained the supremacy of one God the Father, and held to Christ as the mediator between God and man. He was, however, an earnest foe to sectarianism, and strove for Christian union without dogmatism. This induced him to take a warm interest in the "Free Christian Union," lately established, whilst he contended for its distinctively Christian character. His desire for unity did not abate his zeal for truth, and, in 1867, he published a new edition of his "One God, the Father."

In 1821 he commenced his subscription (which he continued till his death) to our college, then at York; and in the next year's report we find "Euelpis's prize for the best Greek composition" awarded "to Mr. John R. Beard." This prize, which in subsequent reports is valued at five guineas, was continued for about fifteen years; it was offered by Dr. Barham, who was quite an enthusiast for the Greek language. "A Reader" of the Inquirer (March 13) writes: "I have heard him converse with fine scholars in ancient and modern Greek, for hours together. He published a 'Greek Grammar,' in which he greatly simplified the declension of the nouns and the tenses of the verbs, and got rid of all superfluous technicalities. He also published a little work entitled 'Greek Roots on English Rhymes,' in which he strives to render the Greek primitives familiar, even to children, by amusing couplets, easily remembered. He wished to naturalise Greek among us, and make it as easy as Latin and French. His 'English Translation of Hephæstion on Greek Metres' was highly creditable to his classical scholarship."

No one who had the privilege of Dr. Barham's acquaintance could fail to be impressed with his high culture, great intellectual power, and polished urbanity; but he would also be struck with his disregard of conventionalisms which his reason disapproved. The courage which he displayed in seceding from the Church was manifested in matters of less importance. His speculations were not confined to doctrines: he protested against the abuses of our civilisation. In 1858 he published his largest and most important work, "Philadelphia: or the Claims of Humanity; a Plea for Social and Religious Reform." (Small 8vo, pp. 456.) In the chapter "on the existing distinctions of social ranks," he refers to the condition of domestic servants, and quotes the dying charge of Serjeant Talfourd, on the evil of the alienation from those who are inmates of our dwellings. In the next chapter, "on a brotherly distribution of the work of life," he refers, in sarcastic terms, to the indolence and uselessness of too many of our English ladies. As he was not one to entertain a strong conviction without attempting to put it in practice, he resolved to try an experiment. "I bought a few acres near a country town, and built on them a cottage of modest dimensions, and suited to my purpose. The servants were all dismissed; we took possession of our new abode, and had it all to ourselves, as we also had, saving some little assistance for a few hours in the morning from the hind's wife, all the household work. The kitchen, with its cheery perennial fire-side and pleasant homely operations, became our common resort and general eating-room. We had a parlour too, for a sitting and guest room; but it was that kitchen hearth, that sacred recess, that inviolable adytum of Hestia (Vesta), that was the delight of the house. Not to be tedious, I will only add that from this time I understood domestic happiness as I had never done before." (p. 93.) We honour the family that could make the great sacrifices involved in this change so cheerfully, that his happiness was promoted by it. He left his residence in the neighbourhood of Exeter, for which city he was a magistrate, and where he held a high social position, for the seclusion of Newton Abbott, a village between Teignmouth and Torquay. Here he resided for the rest of his life. He became a guardian of the poor, and spent much of his income as a judicious almoner for the public good. He opened a room for public worship, at which he conducted the service for many years. At the meeting of the Western Unitarian Society last August, at George's Chapel, Exeter, when Dr. Bellows preached, Dr. Barham was present, and took part in the proceedings. He was cordially welcomed, both by his old friends and by those who had often heard of his great abilities and unusual excellence. Of late he had been heard to express the fear so natural to those who love to work for others, that he might outlive his usefulness. He was, however, spared this trial. He had officiated as usual on the previous Sunday; and when those whom he loved were sitting near him, without any premonitory symptoms, he was suddenly and tranquilly removed. "May I die the death of the righteous, and may my last end be like his." May our Church abound more and more in men of learning and ability who devote their powers to the service of God; men of integrity, truthfulness, and courage, who are not afraid of the world, nor ashamed of Christ; men of benevolence and piety, whose zeal is tempered by love, and whose love to God and man inspire their zeal.

Dr. Barham was twice married, and has left a numerous family. R. L. C.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE FALLING SNOW.

BY CHARLES G. AMES.

I WATCH to see the dim procession pass—
The struggling, shadowy shapes that come and go;
I sit and watch, through clouded panes of glass,
Through gauzy curtains of the falling snow.

The fairy phantoms of the peopled air
Come softly gliding to the earth below;
I sit and list; I list in vain to hear
The feathery footfall of the falling snow.

No sound, save now and then a muffled hoof
And muffled wheel; and, in the silence, lo!
I sit and worship, 'neath my whitening roof—
The world keeps Sabbath for the falling snow.

White wings are fluttering all around to-day,
Unseen, unheard—the loved of long ago!
Alas! why miss and mourn I, more than they,
The forms that rest beneath the falling snow?

THE "ROB ROY" AT THE LAKE OF GALILEE.

WHEN we last parted with Mr. Macgregor, we left him at the Lake of Gennesareth, in connection with which he furnishes us with a few interesting particulars. It is about twelve miles long by seven broad, and is surrounded by mountains, save on the north, where the Jordan enters, and where there is a plain. On the western shore, "the towers and walls of Tiberias are reflected in the water," and beyond these "is the smooth beach of the 'land of Gennesareth,' a little crescent-shaped strip of plain teeming with verdure down to the shore, which is of clean, pretty gravel, and shells and sand, with a row of oleander bushes growing in the water," reminding one of Keble's lines in the "Christian Year,"

"All through the summer night, Those blossoms red and white."

which, having never been there, he modestly called a "happy accident." At the other end of the charming beach, along which so often walked the Saviour of the world, we see the hill on which stood his "own city," "Thou Capernaum which art exalted to heaven; but now not one house is there." Next comes the white strand where once Bethsaida stood. On steering towards it, Mr. Macgregor says: "Soon round my boat I saw ten thousand fish, their heads and backs above water, and as close together as they could lie. Outside of these was a circle of cormorants and ducks waiting for prey. No wonder that this was named Beth Saida, 'House of Fishes.' Lately two fishers' huts were built here. Twelve men came out and welcomed the Rob Roy with admiration and applause. One of them cast off 'his fisher's coat' and waded out to greet me." These men pay £100 a year to fish in the lake. The voyager suggests incidentally that a payment of this kind might be the "tribute-money" to furnish which the miracle was wrought. He spent three days at Bethsaida. "On one of them it was stormy, the waves rose rapidly, and a heavy 'cross-sea' very soon thundered on the gloomy beach. I have been (he remarks) in many lakes where the wind is sudden and severe—in Scotland, in Sweden, and in America—but I never saw any sheet of water so subject to equals as this, and so quickly moved from perfect calm into rough and distracting waves tossing about with a fretfulness altogether unusual. On the northern shore is the 'desert place' to which Christ withdrew for prayer. Near this the thousands were fed. As I went to it in my canoe, I saw men wading Jordan, for there is a ford near the place, and by this the multitudes could have followed Christ as he went. The northern beach is of fine black gravel. I discovered a channel 500 feet long and five feet deep, and a pier under water extending 100 feet more. The channel led me to a ruin, and plainly this was a little port inland. Another not so large was further east. From one of these the Apostles may have embarked when they left Christ behind." Mr. Macgregor finds "at least four localities on the eastern shore in every way remarkably adapted to the incidents of the narrative of the legion of devils and the herd of swine. There were the rocks and caves, where tombs would be. There was the wild feeding ground, covered with bulbous roots, where swine might feed. Even at that moment, a great flock of horses, camels, goats, and bullocks, was actually grazing and browsing on the rank herbage of the mountain. Near them the hill sloped steep to the strand, in one spot only a few feet from the water, in another leading straight to the high gravel beach. Now, this beach for a mile in extent is very peculiar in its conformation, and quite different from any other part of the shore of this sea. The gravel shelves down at an angle of forty-five degrees, from about ten feet deep in water. A scanty fringe of oleander partially conceals the water. When I came close in my canoe I could not see the inner shore at all, and therefore if a herd of animals were to run towards this they would come very suddenly to the top of the gravel bank, and being urged on by others behind they could not stop, but must certainly run into 'the deep' and be drowned. I compared all the various features of the hills and slopes here from different points of view, which could only be done by patient scrutiny from a boat, for you cannot compare two hills unless you are at proper distance from both of them, though, of course, you can see each of them by walking under it upon the shore. I came away much gratified by this afternoon's work, in having fully satisfied myself as to the complete suitability of the slope near Wady Fik for the scene of the only miracle of our Lord where punishment was inflicted and death."

EASTER EVE IN FLORENCE.

WE take following account, considerably abridged, from the Christian World:

In Florence the Saturday in Passion Week is most crowded, because on that day is held the curious festival known as lo scoppio del carro (car of fireworks), the principal feature of which is the ancient spectacle of the Colombino, which takes place in the Duomo, or cathedral. The Colombino unconsciously reminds us of those feminine theatrical characters who, attired in flimsy muslin and glittering spangles, make their appearance in the Christmas pantomimes, but in Italy it bears an entirely different signification; and yet the spectacle to which it gives a name possesses considerably less of the religious than of the theatrical element. In Italy the leading festivals of the Roman Catholic Church have become so mixed up with displays of fireworks, illuminations, processions, holidays, military reviews, and we know not what besides, that it is difficult to detect the presence of the really religious element. The people on such occasions certainly think a great deal more of the firework manufacturer than of the priests, and prize the illuminations which render resplendent the exterior of their churches more than they do the doctrines taught within. Shortly after daybreak a strangely fashioned car makes its appearance in the Piazza del Duomo. It is decorated in every conceivable manner, and is filled with rockets, mortars, and other fireworks. From the top of the structure, which is somewhat pyramidal in shape, is attached a cord, which is carried across the square into the cathedral, passing up the middle to the high altar. Here is to be seen the rocket, attached by a ring to the cord, awaiting the spark which shall send it hissing on its mission. The early services of the church are being conducted as usual, but no one seems to heed them. The attention of all has become so absorbed in contemplation of the preparations for the coming display. Towards eleven a.m. a motley and extremely noisy crowd, such as may be met at Epsom on the Derby Day, only sprinkled largely with cassocked, shovel-hatted priests and hooded nuns, pours hurriedly into the church, the aged vergers taking care to retreat in good time out of the way of the advancing wave of excited human beings. The clamour is terrific, worse even than that of a Boxing-night theatrical audience, the crowd evidently being completely forgetful of the decorum expected inside a church. The religious ceremonies are carried on in dumb show; no one pays any heed to them, for all are eager for the flight of the rocket. While the uproar is at its height the Archbishop of Florence suddenly makes his appearance, attended by a long and magnificent procession, conspicuous in which is the ancient banner which, more than 650 years ago, Pazzino del Pazzi planted on the battlemented walls of Jerusalem. Amid the rustle of silken banners, the odorous fumes of incense, and the swelling thunders of the organ, the venerable prelate, clothed in rich and costly vestments, slowly proceeds from the church into the square, where he formally bestows his benediction on the car of fireworks. This done, he returns to the cathedral, and, proceeding to the high altar, commences high mass. Scarcely has he intoned the first words of the Gloria than there is a sudden movement visible in the crowd, which seems literally to quiver with excitement, and the next moment a little acolyte applies a lighted taper—said to have been lit with a spark from the holy flints—to the rocket, which, hissing and spitting sparks, speeds rapidly along the cord to which it is attached, until, reaching the street, a tremendous roar of commingled applause, laughter, and screaming from the vast crowd assembled in the square greets its approach to the pile of fireworks. In an instant the mass of rockets, mortars, squibs, and crackers is ignited, and the rocket swiftly returns to its place near the high altar. Meanwhile the Archbishop is standing, surrounded by an imposing array of priests and choristers, near the altar, while the crowds of kneeling nuns are slowly intoning the Gloria, but the frantic mob cares not for these. As if with one accord, it most irreligiously—in the very midst of Divine service—turns its back upon altar, prelate, priests, monks, nuns, and all, and for what? Merely to gaze on a display of fireworks at midday! And yet all this is believed by devout Catholics to be rendering homage to the cause of religion. But the festival is not over yet. Pazzino del Pazzi evidently wished to make the most of his three flints. He insisted that after the display in the Cathedral Square there should be another in the street in which his palace was situated. Accordingly the car, newly replenished with fireworks, is slowly dragged, amid the cheers of the multitude, to the end of the Via Albizzi, where the midday scene is repeated, the torch, or Colombina, flying from the ancient Pazzi Palace instead of the cathedral. Nothing can be more stupid or more senseless than the whole affair. It tends to make religion appear a farce in the eyes of intelligent people, yet the Romish ecclesiastics will not hear of the proposed abolition of the festival. To them such a thing seem little short of sacrilege, and so this relic of superstition, folly, and priestcraft is solemnly perpetuated with rigid and almost zealous care.

A SCRIPTURAL ILLUSTRATION.

THE unchanging manners of the East afford, as every one knows, plenty of Scriptural illustrations; but we do not remember to have met with the following instance before, which occurs in a recent work, entitled "The Nile and its Banks." It is a description of the daily meal of the Arab sailors:

"A large stock of bread, made of wheat ground with the bran, cut into thin slices as soon as baked, and dried on the quarter deck, was the stock to last from three weeks to a month; it was the business of the boy, morning and evening, to take a sufficient quantity of this dried bread, and crumble it into a huge wooden bowl; upon this boiling water was poured, and a handful of red lentils scattered, and the whole stirred up with a large wooden spoon. Then they all sat round in a ring, holding an onion or a lettuce in the left hand, while with the right they dipped their fingers in the bowl, and so alternately took a mouthful of porridge, and then a bite at the salad, till, in less time than I have taken to describe it, the bowl was emptied and the meal at an end. This is believed to be precisely the same food as that for which Esau sold his birthright, thirty-six centuries ago; the same which Herodotus described as the provisions of the pyramid-makers; and it is the invariable meal of the Egyptian fellahen, varied only with beans and lupins to the present day."

SOUTHAMPTON.

ANNIVERSARY SERMONS AT THE CHURCH OF THE SAVIOUR.

A SERVICE commemorative of the ninth anniversary of the opening of the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, was held on Good Friday. The sermon was preached in the morning from John xix. 19, by the Rev. R. B. Aspland, M.A. In the afternoon a public tea was held, which was well attended. There was afterwards a meeting in the chapel, at which the Rev. E. Kell, M.A., presided. Dr. Watson, Dr. Longstaff, of Wandsworth, Mr. Appel, Rev. R. Yelland, and Rev. William Hargrave, B.A., of Newport, took part. We are quite unable to print the whole of the long report, which would occupy between four and five columns, which has been forwarded to us; but we are glad to give our readers the valuable speech of the Rev. B. Aspland, in response to a vote of thanks for his services.

MR. ASPLAND, referring to the services of which mention had been made, said that the longer he lived the more deeply-rooted was his conviction that the essential truths of Christianity lay in the subject he had brought before them, and the more deeply-rooted, too, was his conviction that the death and resurrection of Christ must lie at the basis of any Christianity that was to move the heart as well as satisfy the understanding of rational men. Indeed, he could not conceive of anything deserving the name of Christianity from which the fact and the doctrine of the Resurrection of the Christ were divorced. He could, it was true, conceive a beautiful moral religious system, with fine ideas of God and pleasing moral truths, inculcated quite apart from the doctrine to which he had just referred, but he believed, from all his experience of the human mind and heart, that people would never be able to do with philosophy instead of religion. Turning from what was personal, he would ask them to allow him to express his great happiness in being once more permitted to be present with them on their interesting anniversary. He had the privilege of preaching the first sermon in that place of worship. He congratulated them upon having such a handsome church, and he could but wish that they had already found it too small for their services. That wish, however, was generally a somewhat vain one in connection with Unitarian services, for the tide of popular opinion was still largely against them. They had to work against an adverse tide, and their progress consequently was but slow. But still they would be very unworthy disciples indeed of the Master under whom they were ranked, if they allowed a want of immediate success to damp their energies, to diminish their efforts, or in the slightest degree to depress their faith in the ultimate triumphs of truth and righteousness. (Hear, hear.) There were some people—members even of their own body—who had witnessed with delight, and had taken part in the great political triumphs which had signalled our age. He knew, too, that while they were much elated by the almost unexpected success of that department of truth, they were depressed in a very painful degree at the want of a corresponding improvement in relation to their religious position. They thought that while they had gained more than even the most sanguine expected thirty years ago in respect to their citizenship—their political rights and their civic standing—there had been nothing like a proportionate advance in their religious standing. Why, he asked, was this? With respect to political successes they had been, he believed, for the most part fairly won by general combination and earnest zeal. And he might almost add that if the same amount of earnest combination and intelligent zeal had been evinced amongst Unitarians in the promotion of their religious belief as in the cause of political truth, the result would have been much more satisfactory; but from whatever cause it arose, certain it was, that many men who were most eager and successful politicians were not eager and successful defenders of what they themselves professed to receive as religious truth. This he thought resulted from a too scrupulous regard for what were believed to be the rights of conscience, for some thought that in endeavouring to spread their religious principles they might not be extending absolute truth, but only extending prejudices. If this were correct they would of course be right in not diffusing their own faith. But it was, in his opinion, anything but a fair statement. When they propagated their opinions they did it not by the force of prejudice certainly, not by intimidation certainly, not by unworthy worldly means. If any among them attempted to pursue such a course, ninety-nine out of every hundred Unitarians would rise up and enter such an earnest protest against it that it would very soon have to be abandoned. But let those who pleaded the rights of conscience and the sacredness of private judgment as a reason for not making religious exertions, remember that while they were silent in the truth, a great deal was being done on the other side against it. For there were those in every religious denomination who were actively spreading prejudices and throwing obstacles in the way of free inquiry, intimidating this man, bribing that man, and while all this was going on outside them, Unitarians were doing very little to counteract such influences. But although there was much that was unsatisfactory in the present state of feeling, he was not in the slightest degree disposed to despair or abate one jot of hope. He had the same earnest conviction of the power of truth and its ultimate triumph, now, that he had in the most sanguine days of his youth. The time at which he then expected these triumphs to appear was certainly somewhat later than he anticipated and hoped. But he could not conceal from his own mind—and he would remind the church of the fact—that the difficulty they had to meet in re-creating a wholesome religious feeling, and in propagating a pure, spiritual religion, resulted from the very ardour with which people had accepted religious opinions, and the intensity with which they clung to the dogmas which in the earlier period of their life they had been taught to follow. Religious errors were of all errors the most difficult to eradicate. They were surrounded by an atmosphere of a sacred nature, and he felt that in regard to this they should be neither harsh nor uncharitable; but on the contrary, look at the difficulty calmly and wisely. But who could tell, looking at the changes which were ever taking place—looking at the signs of the times—looking at the character of the advance in opinions towards them of men who, though they did not bear their name, were essentially their friends and propagating their principles; when he remembered, too, that the men who did this filled the highest intellectual stations—were an ornament to their profession in the church as well as out of it—who, he said, looking at these circumstances, could tell what mighty changes might not occur, and he for one felt there were great grounds for hope. They, as Unitarians, knew that many of the essential principles of their religion were preached in Independent and other chapels, not under the name which they would give them, but still they were essential truths, and the generation accustomed to hear these truths will be in a very different state from what the church was in when they first began the work of religious reformation. He for one was most thankful for having been permitted to live during the last half century. He held that in no period in the church's history, excepting of course that section of it in which Christianity arose, had there been any time in which such a great and mighty and wholesome revolution was going on, or when there had been seen so great an improvement made as respected the modes of thought in the way of respecting the civil rights of large masses of the people throughout the world as during the last half century. And when he remembered that once it would have been considered a crime for any one to have professed Unitarianism—that his liberty would have been endangered if any one had stirred against him those penal statutes which were a disgrace to the statute-book—when he remembered how those laws had been abolished, and how previously to this the Test and Corporation Acts were abolished also—he could not but feel that it had been a time of privilege, and that there was a bright future yet for religious truth and liberty. And if at any period during the time to which he was alluding, men might be permitted more than at any other to utter their congratulations, surely it was at the present, when they were watching with intense interest a great revolution going on, in the noble efforts which were being made to bring about a change in the law by severing the church in Ireland from the State. They saw men of various creeds uniting as one to effect this object. They saw in the Queen's Administration men belonging to the Church of England, and the Church of Scotland, one, at least, Unitarian, and one, if not two, holding the doctrine of the Society of Friends. When they cast back their minds to the state of things which existed thirty or forty years ago, and saw how impossible such a union as this would then have been, and then compared it with now,—and the present condition of circumstances was taken as a matter of course, not an objecting voice being raised against it; when, too, they saw men who, differing among themselves upon particular principles, yet cordially uniting in their career of wholesome legislation—when, too, the consenting voice of the nation; when, further, they saw that only a few days ago one of the largest majorities which had ever been brought together in Parliament declared that the time was come when the union between Church and State, as far as Ireland was concerned, must be severed, surely, he contended, when they looked at all these things, they were entitled to indulge in honest and joyous congratulations. (Cheers.) He could not but augur great results from what was now going on. And he could not but indulge a strong and well-founded hope that they were now only at the beginning of many more important changes, and that the result would be a liberation of the public mind with respect to religion, and a total change of the ideas as to the mode by which religion should be best supported. He could not but conceive that the flood of light which had been poured upon the public mind during the past two or three years would be attended by changes of a remarkable extent and consequence. They already saw that doctrines, which a few years ago were deemed the philosophical ideas of a few advanced thinkers, were now accepted as truths by the greatest statesmen of the age, and accepted also with enthusiasm by the great bulk of the people of this nation. (Hear, hear.) What were deemed extreme doctrines by Non-Liberationists, and marked for the sneers of Tory politicians and angry Churchmen, were now accepted principles by the finest minds in the land, and were being carried out by the chosen statesmen of our Queen. Then (addressing the chairman), when they remembered that all these pleasing changes had taken place since they both first began to understand and take an interest in public questions, they might, in the prospect of other changes not far distant, lift up their voices and say, "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servants depart in peace." He concluded by proposing "A speedy and prosperous issue to the proposals of Her Majesty's Ministers for severing Church and State in Ireland." (Cheers.)

The Rev. R. B. Aspland also preached in the church on Easter Sunday to deeply attentive congregations.

TODMORDEN.

OPENING OF THE NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH.

ON Wednesday afternoon last, this beautiful church, the completion of which has been looked forward to with great interest throughout Lancashire and the West Riding, was publicly dedicated to the worship of God. This church has been built by Messrs. Samuel Fielden, John Fielden, and Joshua Fielden, M.P., the three sons of the late John Fielden, Esq., formerly M.P. for Oldham, revered throughout the factory districts as the leading promoter of the Ten Hours' Bill. To the interest and co-operation of the late John Fielden was due the founding of a Unitarian congregation in Todmorden about 1824, and the present church is intended as a memorial of him. And a noble memorial it is. Standing on a prominent point of the hill side, overlooking the villages which meet at Todmorden, its beautiful spire forms a conspicuous object in the landscape. There is no ecclesiastical building within many miles, nor any of our own churches in this country, at all approaching it either in beauty or completeness. What it has cost has not been made public, but the Manchester Guardian puts the amount at "between £25,000 and £30,000," and there is little doubt that this is not an overstatement. The following architectural description will be read with interest:—

The church has been built from the designs of Mr. John Gibson, of Westminster. It consists of nave and two aisles with chancel, the entrance being through tower on north side, and porch at the end of nave. It is decorated in character—is built of Clough Head and native stone, with internal facing and dressings of Halifax stone with Westmoreland green slates. The shafts of nave arcade, as well as minor shafts, are of polished red marble with richly mounted caps, and over the nave arches is a clerestory. The roofs of nave and aisle are of oak, the principals resting on polished marble shafts, with foliated caps, supported by carved corbels. The paving of the nave is of yellow and red Mansfield stone; that of the chancel is in squares, of Sicilian marble, with bands of red and Greek green marble, and black dots at intersections. The seating throughout is wainscot, with paneled and enriched ends. The chancel arch has clustered shafts of polished marble, with richly carved caps. The roof of the chancel is arched in bands, alternately of red Mansfield and Yorkshire stone, with tracery ribs, supported by marble shafts, with foliated caps. A mortuary chapel terminates the south aisle, and the organ chamber and vestry the north aisle; at the west end they are richly groined over carved bosses, and are divided off from the chancel by rich oak screens. The reading desk and pulpit are of oak, richly paneled, the latter with book board, supported by an eagle; the base to pulpit is of shafts of vari-coloured marbles, with junc-e-feuri caps and Sicilian marble corbelling over. The font is circular, of Sicilian marble, with shafts of Plymouth Spa and Greek green marble. The organ has a wainscot-paneled front, above which are the pipes, richly decorated. The windows of nave are filled in with Powell's glass, and those of chancel with stained glass, by M. Capronnier, of Brussels, embodying the subjects—Christ with the Doctors in the Temple; the Widow's Mite; Christ and the Woman of Samaria; the Good Samaritan; Christ Blessing Little Children; the Prodigal Son; and Christ Washing His Disciples' Feet. The building is heated by hot water. In the tower is a peal of eight bells, with machinery for chiming tunes on every three hours; there is also a clock, with transparent dials on three sides of tower. The tower, internally, is 146 ft. square, and the height to top of spire, 194 feet. The length of the church internally is 128 feet, and width 48 feet. The width of nave is 22 feet, and height to ridge 43 feet. The spire has tracery flying buttresses springing from pinnacles at the angles of the tower, the whole being crocketed. The tower stands at the end of the nave, is detached with lofty arches forming a porch, the whole being richly groined. The structure has taken nearly four years in building, Mr. Clay, of Audenshaw, having had the contract for the woodwork, &c., the stonework not having been done under contract.

So great was the interest felt in the building in Todmorden itself that it became evident that unless some restriction were adopted the church would be crowded to the doors by people living close about, long before the hour for service, and that the friends who were known to be coming from our own neighbouring churches would find it impossible to get in. Tickets were therefore issued, and after supplying the members of the congregation, there were not anything like sufficient to meet the applications from other towns. The necessity of some such arrangement, unsatisfactory as we feel any restriction on such an occasion to be, was evident on approaching the gates of the church, where a crowd of many hundred people, most of whom were anxious to have been admitted, lined the road. As it was, the church, which is seated for about four hundred persons, was crowded with double that number, and presented a very beautiful and striking appearance. A beautiful peal of eight bells rang out a jubilant welcome, and flags were hung from the belfry windows. The first tones of the beautiful organ (by Hill, of London), and the first words of the service gave sufficient evidence of the admirable acoustic properties of the building—a point in which our Gothic buildings too often fail.

The service was opened by the Rev. Lindsay Taplin with hymn, dedication prayer, and first lesson; the Rev. James Taplin (his father) read the second lesson, and the Rev. Brooke Herford read the concluding prayers of the liturgy, a new one just introduced. The chanting and the responses, and indeed the whole part of the service, were admirable. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Gaskell.

At the close of the service many of those present adjourned to the Oddfellows' Hall, the largest public room in the town. After tea, many of the strangers had to leave, and the room was crowded chiefly by the members of the congregation and the people of Todmorden and the district. Pending the arrival of Messrs. Fielden a hymn was sung, and addresses were given by the Rev. Lindsay Taplin, M.A., and Rev. S. A. Steinthal. The chief interest of the evening, however, was the address of Joshua Fielden, Esq., M.P., who, on entering the room, was loudly cheered, and his brothers not having yet come, at once voted to the chair.

JOSHUA FIELDEN, Esq., M.P., said: Men and women of Todmorden—I assure you it is with no conventional feeling of modesty that I tell you that I take the chair this evening with reluctance, because this meeting is assembled to celebrate the erection of a building with which my brothers and myself have had, I may say, altogether to do, and therefore it is difficult to speak without seeming egotistical. I shall try to avoid this, however, feeling the truth of what the poet said, that "He who builds a church to God and not to fame, Will never mark the marble with his name."

(Hear, hear.) But, feeling as I do, it would be ungenerous if one of us did not say a few words of kindly sympathy to you. Well, what can I say to you? I can only say that this church is the result of the work of the ministers who have been at the head of our congregation—of the Sunday-school teachers—and of those who have taken a deep interest in matters connected with our congregation. Mr. Taplin—(applause)—our present minister, has followed in the steps of another who certainly started the new movement. I allude to Mr. Brooke Herford. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Taplin, long before we ever contemplated building the church in which we have worshipped to-day, came to us, over and over again, to ask for more accommodation; and when we found that our congregation was outgrowing the limits of our space for worship—that our pews and the very aisles of our old chapel were crowded by Sunday-school scholars, we could not refuse to find fresh accommodation for those who wished to worship with us. (Hear, hear.) Well, we took into consideration what we should build. I have myself always been a great admirer of the beautiful old churches that abound in our land. I think that to walk into Westminster Abbey, or into St. Paul's Cathedral, throws a flood of reverence over one on entering them; and I came to the conclusion that that which does so in London must have a similar effect here on country folks. My brothers entertained the same feeling; and we decided that the building should not follow the fashion of our forefathers, adopted by them from the purest motives—(hear, hear)—but, as I think, mistaken ones. We came to the conclusion that there was nothing inconsistent with a pure faith, the purest faith that can be held—the most God-like faith that man can hold—in having a building which would strike the senses by its beauty. And so we settled on our plan; and, though the building has grown in its details, I think none of us regrets it; for we have always believed that when we enter into a work we should do it well—(hear, hear); and if there is any work we enter upon which should be done well, so as to leave its mark upon the sands of time, it is a building erected for the worship of Almighty God. Allow me just to tell you the interpretation of that window which was so much admired to-day. It expresses the idea of Christianity which is believed in by the founders of the church. In the three central lights you have seen that our Saviour is sitting at the well with the woman of Sychar, who is asking him questions, and saying to her, "The hour cometh and now is when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him." What do those words teach? That God is the Father—the father of all His children—universal in His love, and that God is a spirit. So the central point in Christianity is the universal Father—Christianity being spiritual, working through the spirit of man and not through any material form. Then on the right-hand side, you have Christ blessing little children, and that represents the idea of humility, for unless we become as little children we cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. So the spirit of God acting upon man must work upon his inward life. But then that is not sufficient. On the left hand you have the good Samaritan relieving the man stricken down by robbers. The spirit of God must enter into the heart of man, not, as was supposed by monks and nuns, to make them shut themselves up in solitude, but to work out into the outward life, in deeds of love and of mercy, in doing good to our fellow creatures. Now, I have told you the story which that window is intended to teach, and I hope you will think of its purpose when you go and look at it. We have there erected a beautiful building; but a temple will do no good unless there are workers; and I ask each and every one of you to help to make it a temple not in name simply, but one which, by your exertions and your efforts, shall become a real temple of God, so that those who go to worship therein shall not merely go for the sake of worshipping in a beautiful building, but from a feeling that they have God's work in the world to do. Many may say that they can do nothing, but I tell even the poorest, and any one who feels that he is incapable of doing any thing—I tell him he can do more than we have done because we have given of our abundance; but if he will give of his time and his labour and energy, true earnest religious zeal, and help to bring men out of their ways of vice to hear and profit by lessons of virtue, he will have done more than we have done. And here I would say a word to those who differ from us in theology—I don't think they differ from us so very much in religion, for there is more religion in the world than we sometimes imagine. (Hear, hear.) We do not wish to interfere with the religious convictions of any man. What we say as to our peculiar theological views is this—that we think they are able to draw men to religion from the highways and byways and alleys, and from the scum of society. We have no faith in what is called orthodoxy to do this. That is the great work before us, and I hope that none here will think that they are incapable of helping in that work. In conclusion, Mr. Fielden said he could only thank them for having listened to what he had said, and added that, as the spire of their new church pointed heavenwards, so should their thoughts, for it pointed to the Giver of all good, and, as God himself was perfect harmony, he hoped their beautiful place would be a help to them to bring their spirits into harmony too. (Loud applause.)

To the subsequent proceedings we can only briefly allude. The Rev. CHARLES BEARD paid a warm tribute to the architect, Mr. John Gibson, and in doing so pointed out the responsibility which rests upon architects in view of the fact that public buildings have an educational effect on the public mind, remaining permanently before the eye of the people, unlike a noble painting or sculpture which usually disappears in a private collection. HENRY A. BRIGHT, Esq., also made an interesting point, which ought not to be lost sight of, in reminding the meeting that this, the most magnificent church in our body was the outcome of what forty or fifty years ago, was a Unitarian mission. Mr. Gibson, the architect, Mr. John Fielden, Mr. R. T. Heape, of Rochdale, Mr. Royston Oliver, Mr. Leah, and Revs. W. Gaskell, J. Taplin, and R. Pilcher also took part in various resolutions, and the meeting was throughout of a very earnest and interesting character.

We noticed present during the day the Revs. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., James Taplin, Lindsey Taplin, M.A., Brooke Herford, Charles Beard, B.A., J. T. Whitehead, J. Black, M.A., J. Freeston, J. K. Smith, T. E. Poynting, J. Fox, T. H. Smith, R. Pilcher, B.A., J. Carter, S. A. Steinthal, M. C. Frankland, G. H. Wells, M.A., Messrs. Joshua, Samuel, and John Fielden, J. C. Mott (Birmingham), H. A. Bright, B.A. (Liverpool), Thos. Wrigley and Wm. Grundy (Bury), R. T. Heape and Royston Oliver (Rochdale), John Alcock (Gee Cross), J. Cliffe (Leeds), Benj. Heape, John Armstrong, Harry Rawson, G. J. Taylor, Jesse Pilcher, Richard Wade, and Frank Nicholson (Manchester).

INTELLIGENCE

ABERDARE.—The Unitarian congregations of this district held their annual meeting on Good Friday eve, in the English Unitarian Church, for the purpose of unitedly celebrating the Lord's Supper. The introductory service was taken by the Rev. E. W. Lloyd; the sermon was preached by the Rev. N. R. Williams. The Lord's Supper was afterwards administered by the Revs. J. Williams and E. W. Lloyd. Friends were present from Merthyr, Cefn, Cwmbach, Treynam, and Aberdare. The next meeting, in rotation, will be held at Cefn.

BIRMINGHAM: HURST-STREET DOMESTIC MISSION. On the afternoon of Sunday last, about 300 of the scholars of the Sunday-school, with a considerable number of their parents, assembled in the chapel for the annual prize distribution. 102 prizes were awarded for punctual and regular attendance and good conduct, including 30 special prizes—nine to girls, and 21 to boys—who had not been late or absent once during the year. Nine of the scholars had not been absent or late once in two years; five in three years; three in four years. At the same time 11 elder scholars were received as members of the congregation. On the following day, the usual Easter social tea meeting of the teachers and congregation took place, when 220 were present. An excellent entertainment followed.

DUKINFIELD.—On Sunday, April 4th, the usual sacramental service at the Old Chapel was an exceedingly interesting one. Thirty-eight new communicants were publicly received by the minister, and welcomed on behalf of the church. Many of these came from the upper classes in the school, the first twenty being from the minister's training class. To each of the new-comers was given a card of membership, recording the day on which he or she "became a member of the church communion." The cards containing a brief statement of "Our Religion," with a number of wise sentences of counsel "for the Christian life," and each is signed by the minister.

LYDGATE.—The congregation here celebrated the 174th anniversary of the opening of their chapel on Saturday last, by a tea party, at which about eighty persons were present. The Rev. E. Allen, the pastor, presided, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. J. Thomas, of Huddersfield; C. Howe, of Dewsbury; and Mr. H. J. Moorhouse, who, in speaking of the tendencies of the age, paid a fitting tribute to the old founders of this congregation, foremost of whom was Oliver Heywood, one of the ejected, who opened the chapel on the 28th March, 1695, and since that time it has been yearly celebrated.

MIDDLESBROUGH.—On Sunday last, the anniversary sermons in connection with the Sunday-school, West-street, were preached by the Rev. W. Elliott, of Stockton. On Tuesday evening the annual tea party was held in the chapel, when about sixty sat down to tea, after which a good company assembled, and the meeting was addressed by the Revs. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester; W. Elliott, of Stockton; William Brunton, of Middlesbrough, and other friends.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—On Sunday last, the fifteenth anniversary of the opening of the Church of the Divine Unity was held in this town. The sermons were preached by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who took for his text morning and evening Mat. xv. 9, "But in vain do they worship me teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." On the following day a tea meeting was held in the school-room, at which were present among others the Rev. J. C. Street, the pastor of the church, Rev. S. A. Steinthal, the Rev. E. Hopkinson (Choppington), Rev. Wm. Elliott (Stockton), Rev. J. Whitworth (Sunderland), and the Rev. Thos. Leyland (Newcastle), and Messrs. Jos. Clephan, Geo. Lucas, Jas. Watson, J. Brown, and Wm. Clayton. After tea a meeting was held in the church, at which the Rev. J. C. Street presided, who gave a satisfactory account of the proceedings of the past year. Mr. George Lucas welcomed the Rev. T. Leyland to his duties as missionary for the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Missionary Society, and addresses were given by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Rev. Wm. Elliott, Rev. E. Hopkinson, Rev. J. Whitworth, Rev. Thos. Leyland, and Mr. Joseph Clephan.

SHEFFIELD.—The annual meeting of the parents of the Upper Chapel Sunday School children was held on Monday evening, April 5th, when upwards of ninety parents sat down to tea. After tea a statement of the Sick and Investment Society's accounts was made by the treasurer, Mr. Stephen Bacon, from which it appears that 183 children are in the society, and have paid during the last year £72.9s. 8d., of which £33.7s. 9d. is into the Sick Fund, and £39.1s. 11d. into the Savings Fund. Owing to the large number of children in the society, and the small amount of sickness they have suffered during the past year, the society is enabled to repay 3s. 9d. to each child who has paid 4s. 4d. (a penny a week) into the Sick Fund. The savings are repaid in full.

STANNINGTON.—The usual Easter sermons, with special musical selections, were preached here on Sunday, March 28th, by Rev. R. C. Jones, of Derby, and H. Hill. The annual social tea took place on Easter Tuesday. Though the weather was very cold, a large number attended. After tea a very interesting meeting was presided over by the minister of the chapel, the Rev. H. Hill. After reviewing the events of the past year, very encouraging addresses were delivered by Messrs. George, Jonathan, and Henry Revit, Luke Oates, and James Vickers. On the Wednesday following a second social tea meeting was held, attended by more than the usual number of friends and parents of the Sunday scholars, when the programme of the previous day was gone through.

TODMORDEN.—On Saturday last, the Sunday-school choir and band gave their annual concert in the School-room at Waterside. On Sunday last, very interesting closing services were held in the old chapel to crowded audiences. In the afternoon the Sunday-school walked in procession to the old chapel to hear addresses from minister and teachers.

The occasion was full of touching associations, and the audiences were not unmoved.

THE SIMULTANEOUS COLLECTIONS.

To the Editors.—Although I am ready to admit that, in consequence of the bad weather at the end of March, nothing has been gained this year by changing the day for the Mission collection from the second Sunday to the last Sunday of the month, I am not inclined to join in the suggestion of my friend, Mr. Payne, that the various missionary committees should agree to go back to the earlier day. I think that it would be far better to get out of March altogether. Having a lively recollection of the miserable weather on the last three Mission collection Sundays, all of which I spent in the snow and storm, in East Lancashire, I believe that it would be to the interest of the Missions, as well as to the comfort of the ministers who exchange pulpits at the time, if the autumn, instead of the spring, was the season for the collection. I suggest the second Sunday in October.

WILLIAM CROKE SQUIER.

To the Editors.—I had an opportunity yesterday of conferring with several ministers of our district, and though they regret the fact that Easter Sunday fell on the fourth Sunday in March this year, and the consequently impoverished missionary collections, they felt it undesirable to unsettle again so soon an arrangement which was made last year with considerable difficulty. Easter is not likely to fall on the fourth Sunday in March for some years to come, and when it does, the collections could be then arranged for another Sunday, if desired. The second Sunday in March is unsuitable, not only on account of weather, but because it is assize Sunday at Nottingham, if not in other places also.—Your obedient servant,

A. W. WORTHINGTON, Secretary.

LONDON UNITARIAN LAY PREACHERS' UNION.

To the Editors.—Allow me to call attention to the collection advertised in your columns to be made for this society on the 18th instant, and to suggest that a liberal response be made, for I fear that not only no further extension can be made of this useful work in London without more funds are forthcoming, but that some of the stations must soon be discontinued. The rent alone of chapels and preaching rooms is upwards of £200 per annum. I think there is no society among us which does so much work with such small means. There are thirteen Sunday-school services, besides school and week night lectures, and other useful agencies at those stations.—Faithfully,

ROBT. SPEARS.

THE COMING WEEK.

LONDON: ROSSLYN HILL CHAPEL, HAMPSTEAD.—On Sunday, the annual sermons, morning and evening, by the Rev. Jas. Drummond, B.A.

LONDON: STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.—On Wednesday evening, a lecture by Samuel Sharpe, Esq., on "Ancient monuments."

Manchester: STRANGEWAYS FREE CHURCH.—On Sunday evening, the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., will preach.

Sale.—On Sunday evening, a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Beard, on "Welcome Back," the eleventh of a series the parable of the "Prodigal Son."

Todmorden.—On Sunday, morning and evening, continuation of the opening services. Preachers: Morning, Rev. Chas. Wicksteed, B.A.; evening, Rev. Brooke Herford; afternoon, a christening service.

Marriages.

MORPHY—CHALDECOTT.—On the 30th ult., at Addlestone Church, William Morphy, Esq., of Patras, to Constance Kathleen, youngest daughter of T. W. Chaldecott, Esq., of Addlestone, Surrey.

HALL—JONES.—On the 6th inst., at the Highfield Chapel, Isle, Mr. John Sugden Hall, of Greensates, to Charlotte, third daughter of Mr. William Jones, of Newtown, Montgomeryshire.

Deaths.

BENNETT.—On the 27th ult., at Sheffield, Mr. Edward Bennett, aged 53 years. He was a firm adherent of our faith, and for many years a warm supporter of our church, manifesting considerable interest in its various institutions. He was a man of unobtrusive habits and sterling worth. The Mechanics' Institution of Sheffield has lost in him a long-tried and ardent friend.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

In a work recently published, M. Garcin de Tassy shows that the Mahometan religion in India has undergone considerable modifications from its contact with Pagan institutions. There are six great festivals, not prescribed by the Koran, but yet celebrated all over India: one in honour of the prophet Elijah, and the others in commemoration of the five most celebrated pirs, whose names have even been given to the months in which their anniversaries are kept. Even the Hindoos venerate the shrines of the Mahometan saints, while, on the other hand, there are Islamites who will at times present offerings to Hindoo idols. The offerings placed on the tomb of the Mussulman pir or wali consist of flowers, sweetmeats, cakes, and vetches. Fairs are often held at these sacred spots, whither many repair for pleasure, others for devotion, and traders for profit, not to mention thieves and blacklegs, fakcers, musicians, jugglers, and dancing-girls. One of the principal festivals in commemoration of the death of Hussein, the son of Ali, takes place in the first month of the Arabian year, and lasts ten days. The Mussulmans of the lower classes on this occasion perform some odd practices, which are ridiculed by the more educated Mahometans. One man, for instance, will enter the imambara (or hall reserved for this particular solemnity) with a chafing-dish on his head to make milk and rice boil there; this is a spell for curing a cold. Another will wear a sort of lock on his mouth, and walk round the cenotaph which stands in the middle; and if this appendage falls off during the third or seventh turn, he imagines that God has heard his prayer.

A Jewish alliance in France, which has nearly 10,000 members, is looking forward to the occupation of Palestine by the Jews.

The total number of Protestants in France is set down as about 1,200,000, with 1,100 pastors of various schools of thought.

The Baptists appear to get the start of the Methodists in several nations of the continent. In Germany and Switzerland, for instance, the American Methodist Missions have 5,928 members, while the Baptists have about 13,000; and in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, the Methodists have only 769 members, while the Baptist Mission has 9,139 members and 216 churches.

Presents to the Pope, for the 11th, were pouring in abundantly. Prince Torlonia had made an offering of 250,000 francs; several hundred thousand had arrived from Hungary, besides articles of great value; and the daughters of the Roman nobility were raising a contribution to which the lowest donation was to be a napoleon. His Holiness was annoyed at the number of crosses sent him, and said, "what we want is money, money, still money." Great curiosity was felt as to the contents of two chests from America, labelled "Not to be labelled before the 11th of April."

One of the earliest explorers of the ancient capital of the Edomites has just died, at the age of 62. M. de Laborde was but 20 when he made his journey to the East, and penetrated through the fierce tribe of Wady Moussa to explore the strong city spoken of by the prophet, "Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou puttest thy trust in a rock." On his return he published his travels, under the title, "Voyage de l'Arabie et de la Pétrée," which was translated, and appeared in England as "Laborde's Mount Sinai and Petra."

Among the amendments to the Irish Church Bill which Mr. Disraeli has placed on the notice paper of the House of Commons, are the following:—Salaries of curates, property tax, and other outgoings not to be deducted from annuities to be granted to archbishops, bishops, or beneficed clergymen. Every present archbishop, bishop, and dean to enjoy the same title and precedence as if the act had not been passed. The Right Hon. F. Brady, the Right Hon. Abraham Brunton, and the Right Hon. Richard Keatinge to act as unpaid commissioners. The union between the churches of England and Ireland to cease on 1st January, 1872, instead of 1871. The commissioners to pay to the Church representative body a capitalised sum equal to four times the aggregate amount of the net annual incomes of all benefices for the maintenance of Divine worship in such places of Ireland as they deem fit; also a sum equal to 14 times the annual amount, which, on an average of the last ten years, has been spent in heating, lighting, and the necessary repairs; also £200,000 to provide for expenses of the management of property. All grants by statute, royal grant, or letters patent, since the second year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, to be vested in the Church representative body. A capital sum, equal to 14 years' annuity, to be paid in lieu of annuities if required.

As our readers have been made aware, the Guardian has for some time had correspondents complaining of the way in which the dioceses in the South and West of England are administered. The bishops of Winchester, Exeter, Salisbury, Bath and Wells, and Chichester are all, either from age or illness, unable to discharge the duties of their office, and it has been urged that those prelates should either retire, as Dr. Blomfield did, or have the assistance of coadjutors whose connection with the respective dioceses should be of a closer and more permanent character than the occasional ministrations of retired colonial bishops. The subject was mentioned in the House of Commons on Monday night by Sir Massey Lopes, who asked whether the Government had taken into consideration the expediency of making some adequate provision for the retirement of aged or invalid bishops. Mr. Gladstone said the Bishops had the question under consideration, but he had not yet been made acquainted with the result. He thought it better to leave the initiative with them, but that would not, of course, preclude the Government from taking action if they felt it their duty to do so.

Even the warmest admirers of our Church Establishment must admit that its working is not entirely perfect. A proof of this we have in the case of the Rev. G. P. Norris, who has just died. It appears that he was instituted to the rectory of East and West Anstey, in Devonshire, in 1816, and during the whole period of fifty-two years he dwelt only 18 months among his flock. They could hardly be expected to become very much attached to him, and they are petitioning the House of Lords that they may in future be protected from such "grievous neglect and injustice."

A correspondent of the Guardian a fortnight ago defended the Bishop of Exeter from the charge of unduly favouring his relations in the bestowal of Church preferment. An appointment has just been made which certainly looks a little like it, and that is exciting some feeling among the clergy of the county. It is the collation of the Bishop's grandson, the Rev. H. H. Du Boulay, who has been in holy orders only a few months, and is a comparative stranger in the diocese, to the vicarage of Sithney, the tithe-rent charge of which is £435, and the glebe 18 acres.

According to the Rock, the proctors of Mr. Mackonochie have requested the Church Association to compromise, for little more than a third of their amount, the costs in which he was condemned; and the Association has accepted the proposal, thus showing that its object was simply to vindicate principles, not to oppress individual offenders against the Church's laws.

The same Association, encouraged by its success in the Mackonochie case, has determined to institute a suit against the Rev. Mr. Purchas, of Brighton, in order to test the question, not raised in that case, of the legality of the eucharistic vestments and processions in church.

It may, perhaps, afford some relief to Mr. Gladstone's mind to learn that the divine mission which Mr. Charley has received to wreak "righteous retribution" upon him, only goes the length, as he informed an Orange meeting in London last week, of inflicting upon him "perpetual exclusion from power, for having dared to put his hand on the ark of God." This must have seemed an excess of mercy in the eyes of the Rev. B. D. Aldwall, who at the same meeting said, "he was not afraid to speak of the present cabinet as a Cabinet of brigands," and if he was called uncharitable for this, he answered that "charity rejoiceth in the truth." Of course, he could not, on his own showing, set down anyone as uncharitable who pronounced him to be a vulgar railer.

The amount reported at the last anniversary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society was £149,000, and it is hoped that the sum received this year will not be much below that.

A South London paper declares that, in a recent public announcement, it was stated that a converted burglar, "Ned Wright, the burglar," would preach at Wandsworth Assembly-room, and "break open the doors of hell with a gospel jemmy."

The Westminster Gazette states that "Mr. Ffoulkes, whose letter to the Archbishop of Westminster has been placed on the Index, will be offered the choice of public retraction and submission to the Church, or excommunication."

The Dublin Church Conference, after the usual kind of talk to which we have now become accustomed, passed a series of resolutions, in which the alienation of the property of the Irish Establishment is declared to be "an act of injustice unparalleled in the history of constitutional government, and bringing into doubt and danger all rights of property;" "the proposed plan of compensation harsh and inequitable;" and the appointment of commissioners to deal with the property of the Church "in the highest degree unconstitutional and oppressive." It was also resolved to appoint a committee, consisting of an equal number of clergymen and laymen, to supply the Parliamentary defenders of the Church with information, and otherwise assist them in their opposition to the Irish bill; and a resolution was passed, by a large majority, against all attempts in favour of "levelling up" from any quarter.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

THE Paris correspondent of the Times, referring to the view which is taken in French society of the approaching Ecumenical, tells us it is supposed that the Council "will probably first erect the belief in Papal infallibility into a dogma inseparable henceforth from the Catholic faith. It is believed, moreover, that something will be done in favour of the Holy Virgin, to whom is assigned every day a more important place in Catholic worship, and it is generally expected that the anathema of the Syllabus against popular sovereignty, a free press, free worship, and separation of Church and State, will be formally renewed." All this, says the writer, will be "scarcely heeded amongst us," though two centuries ago such an attempt would have convulsed the whole of Catholic Europe, and have driven France in all probability into a schism. This is to be attributed to two great changes which have been effected in French Catholicism. "First, as to faith: little is known and still less is cared by the vast majority of even enlightened French Catholics about what must be or must not be believed. . . Catholics of the present age look rather at religion as a general undertaking to accept without much concern any dogma or creed professed, or even discovered, by the head of the Church. Catholicism, as you meet it now in France, even in the best and most cultivated society, is less a doctrine than a resolution or, if you like the term better, an attempt to believe. The Catholics of the present day are much less followers of a fixed creed than believers in a general sense;" and any attempt on the part of the clergy to exercise on their own account or on that of their flocks any discretion as to accepting novelties proposed by Rome would create "universal surprise and bewilderment." On the other hand, the protests of the Council against a free press, free worship, and the like, would be received with indifference, because it would be well understood that they were mere protests which would, and could, lead to nothing. Such matters "are so decidedly considered here as settled questions by the whole body of the people, including the Catholic leaders themselves, that nobody would dream of venturing upon such ground, in spite of the utmost entreaties of the Church, if the Church were mad enough to meditate any such change." The general conclusion arrived at is:—"In short, the general tendency here, as in the rest of the world, is to separate more and more the Church and the State by extending the liberty of the Church in all matters which do not threaten the independence of the civil power; and it is instinctively felt that each of those two mighty facts, the Church and the State, is more powerful when defending itself within its reasonable bounds, and more and more powerless when attempting to trench upon the ground of the other."

In remarking on the letter referred to in the foregoing paragraph, the Pull Mall says:

"The real solution of the question between Church and State appears to us to lie in the principle that religions ought to be true, and that people should never be satisfied until they have gone as far as they can in the direction of ascertaining the truth on that subject. A bond fide belief in the truth of any form of religious faith being given, it is comparatively easy to regulate the life of an individual, or the policy and legislation of a nation, accordingly. In Mahometan countries, for instance, where the law and the religion of Mahomet are received without hesitation, the difficulty of deciding between the province of the king and the priest is comparatively little felt. Each has his function and knows his place. If we look at private life, we shall see the same thing. A thoroughly religious man of whatever creed, a thoroughly irreligious man, a man who completely knows his own mind upon religious subjects, and who really believes the result at which he has arrived, whatever it may be, to be the true one, has little difficulty in adjusting his religious principles to his every day life. He knows where he is. If he tries on the other hand, to separate Church and State—if he has one set of principles for weekdays and another for Sundays; one for the shop or the office, and another for Church and prayer—he becomes at once a double man, unstable in all his ways, and never certain as to which of his two masters he ought to serve on any one particular occasion. It is, and always will be, precisely the same with bodies of men as with individuals. There will and can be no unity in the State till there is some general agreement as to religious truth, and nothing is more idle than to suppose that any real harmony or lasting peace can be made between the Church and the world, till their true relation to each other is ascertained and acted upon avowedly. If the laity of France do not wish to be governed by the clergy, if they do not wish to maintain the different institutions which the Syllabus condemns, they will never be able to do so freely, consistently, and in a thoroughly effectual manner unless they pluck up the courage to say openly that Catholicism is false, and that its pretensions are based on delusion. Their conduct shows that an enormous proportion of them really think so, but they will have to say so some day, unless they are prepared to submit to much that they would by no means like."

At a recent meeting of his college, Mr. Spurgeon said:

"It was the wise course for each denomination to attend to its own work, and to leave others to do theirs. He saw no particular use in stealing recruits from one regiment of the Lord's army for service in another, especially while whole districts of country and parts of our large towns were unevangelised. As to the talk about too many ministers, he marvelled that Christian people could suppose it possible to provide more than were necessary for the work to be done. No doubt there were many Baptist ministers who could not get churches; but, for the most part, these were men that the churches were well rid of—a lot of dead stock that could do no good to any denomination. There were certainly not too many ministers of the right sort."

At the anniversary services of the South Devon branch of the English Church Union, the Rev. E. W. Urquhart, looking forward to the separation of Church and State, and the splitting of the former into different sections, gave it as his opinion that the English "Catholics" should look forward to reunion with the rest of the Western Church, and suggested that the most feasible project towards this end was that a certain number of the representative men of the "Catholic" school should be in Rome during the approaching meeting of the Council, and have a conference with the members. In doing that they would be sure of sympathy from a large section, especially in France and Germany, who had been alienated by Ultramontane extravagance. The late difference between the Bishop and the Archbishop of Paris showed that. It appeared certain that the authorities of the Council would consent to such a conference, and the English Church Union should make arrangements accordingly.

At a clerical meeting at Southport, the Rev. T. R. Birks, of Trinity Church, Cambridge, thus prophetically marked out the future of the Establishment to which he belongs, but his predictions, we are glad to say, do not seem to have depressed the spirits of his brethren, since they were able to listen to them with "laughter":—

"Looking at the strength of its adversaries, the Church might well despair of its power to resist them. Their assault was at present directed against the weakest part of the Church, namely, its Irish branch; but, however some might try to make distinctions between one part and another, they would find that a great many of those who now professed to respect the Church would change sides as soon as the second stage of the conflict was reached. The Times now discovered that the Irish Church was bad, and the English Church good; but, when the present stage was passed, and it became the policy of the leaders of the great united Liberal party to carry the war to the second stage, that journal would find how homogeneous and united the free Irish Church was, and how heterogeneous and discordant was the English Church; it would descend upon the vast anomalies of rural livings with large incomes and small populations, and town livings with large populations and small incomes;—it would find out that the Church of England was made up of nothing but a congeries of abuses; and all the arguments that had been brought to bear against the Irish Church would be brought with double if not tenfold force against the Church of England."

The Westminster Review, remarking on the way in which, though the practice of burning heretics has died out, they are still excluded from the employment of the State, observes,

"Even at the present day an oath is required on entering Parliament, and on other occasions, in England, which is intended to have, and may have, the effect of excluding atheists. In our country, as is usual with us, the door has not been at once thrown wide open, that all may enter, but has been unwillingly opened a little way—first to admit one, and then another throng of applicants. The fear of a revolution in Ireland compelled Parliament to open its doors to Roman Catholics 40 years ago, but it was not till more than 30 years afterwards that the Jews were admitted also. It is curious that Dr. Arnold, one of the most strenuous advocates of Catholic emancipation, was a vehement opponent of the emancipation of the Jews. His was one of those singular minds which make us wonder how they can reason so ably within certain limits, and yet cannot pass beyond them. He broke off his connection with the unsectarian University of London in consequence of the rescinding of a resolution which had been carried on his proposal, that a knowledge of the principles of Christianity should be required as a qualification for a degree; so that he was condemned in London as a bigot, and in Oxford as a latitudinarian."

On the eve of Good Friday, the Bishop of Rochester thus concluded a sermon at St. Mary's, Chelmsford:

"I protest, in God's name, before you all, against the increasing desecration of Good Friday; against going to places of public resort and pleasure; against buying and selling; against working, or exacting labour of workmen on the day on which Filate crucified the Lord Jehovah!"

It is seldom that a more tempting spiritual advertisement meets us than this, which appears in a recent number of the Record:

"ADVOVSON FOR SALE BY PRIVATE CONTRACT.—Advovson of a living in the south of England. Population 250, wholly agricultural. No Dissent. Fine old church, lately restored. Capital house, containing twelve bed and three sitting rooms, offices, stabling, &c., complete. Productive garden, hothouse, conservatory. Dry soil and mild climate. Good market town. Communication to London and all parts of the country by railway. Estimated value $520 per annum. Age of the present incumbent, 66."

On which the Birmingham Post, in a very profane Nonconformist style, remarks:

"That is a delightful touch—'No Dissent!'—so courteous, so Christian, and so expressive: as if one should say of a house, 'no bad smells,' 'no vulgar neighbours,' 'no vermin.' Then besides the absence of Dissenters, the living is otherwise desirable. Two pounds a head for looking after 250 people, with twenty pounds over, is not bad pay, especially when one considers 'the fine old church,' the 'capital house,' with its twelve bed rooms, garden, hot-house, conservatory, stabling, and other appurtenances so well known to ministers among the early Christians. The age of the present incumbent, only sixty-six, is a drawback; he might live twenty years longer, and then the purchase of this 'cure of souls'—fancy the connection of such phrases!—would be a bad speculation. Still the thing is so very tempting that buyers will no doubt come forward, and the right of shepherding and shearing these 250 sheep in the south of England will pass from hand to hand for a consideration, like any piece of merchandise. We wonder what St. Paul would have thought of the business. But then, in his day, they didn't take in the Record."

The Daily News insists that "the Bill, the whole Bill" must be the answer of the Liberal party to Mr. Disraeli's string of amendments on the Irish Church Bill. If he is allowed to pull this thread and that out of the texture, the web will fall into tangled disorder. His first amendment, which proposes that Clause 2 (declaring that at a certain specified time the Church of Ireland shall cease to be established by law) shall be left out of the Bill, would, if adopted, have the effect of improving it out of existence. The immediate purport of the other amendments is, in Lord Stanley's phrase, to save as much out of the fire as possible. If they took effect, the Irish Church would keep three-fourths or four-fifths of its temporalities.

REVIEWS.

The British Quarterly Review. April, 1869.

A REVIEW of the Royal Commission on the Laws of Marriage, after adverting to the discrepancies of British Marriage Law, and the consequent entanglements of unfortunate sufferers, approves, in the main, the propositions of the commissioners, and considers that upon the issue of a registrar's licence, based upon sufficient inquiry into the circumstances, the recognised clergyman or minister of a Nonconformist congregation should celebrate a marriage, and fill up and return to the registrar a certificate appended to the licence. The review shows how deeply engrained into the mind of Independents is opposition to the State; since it elaborately reasons that such a course would imply no unwarrantable subjection of the religious minister to the State, but only the civil attestation of the ceremony performed.

An article on France and the Ecumenical Council commences by tracing the steps through which the Gallican or national spirit of the French church before the Revolution was gradually converted into its present Ultramontane or Papal tendencies. Religion, repudiated by the Revolution, gradually scattered itself, and, though Bonaparte concluded a concordat with Rome, still laid the foundations of a Gallican section in the modern church. But under the returned Bourbons, Ultramontanism, aided by the advocacy of the Abbé de Lamennais gained ground. In 1830, the government did away with any relic of an established State religion, but still paid and directed the celebration of worship. Lamennais, influenced by the spirit of the recent revolution, began, in conjunction with Count Montalembert and the Abbé Lacordaire, to advocate the rights of conscience and civil liberty. A visit to Rome to seek Papal support disclosed to him, as to Luther, the venality of the Papacy. Notwithstanding the activity of this now liberal trio, the church tended strongly to Ultramontanism up to 1848. The two parties still continued in antagonism; the violent Catholic party finding an advocate in Louis Veuillot, the editor of L'Univers Religieux, while the Liberal party added Prince Albert de Broglie to the number of its leaders, and found in Le Correspondant a monthly organ to express its principles. Fresh difficulties were introduced by the promulgation in 1854 of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception and the Encyclical letter of December 8th, 1864. The Ultramontane tendencies have extended, while the Liberal party has become, if smaller, yet more determined. The influence of the present Archbishop of Paris is at present in its favour, and he permits the popular preaching of Père Hyacinthe. Under these circumstances much will depend upon the result of the General Council shortly to be held at Rome. Among others M. Arnaud de l'Ariège, in a work entitled "La Révélation et l'Eglise," has sounded a courageous note of warning in behalf of the liberal and national element of the church as opposed to the withering Papal tendencies which have so much injured Austria, Italy, and Spain.

An article on the Irish Church Establishment in the Sixteenth Century adduces the evidence of Dr. Brady's State Papers concerning the Irish Church in the Time of Queen Elizabeth, and the Calendar of the Carew MSS., recently published, to show that the Protestant Church has always been aggressive, and in the sixteenth century was by no means charitable in its treatment of the Roman Catholics. If any one wish for additional evidence of the injustice of the Irish Establishment, he will find it in this paper, abundantly supported by letters and papers of the period. The following two sentences will show why Mr. Gladstone is justified in fixing the date of 1660 as the earliest period from which to reserve the endowments of the Establishment:—"The sword of Cromwell . . . smiting down the State Church and Popery alike, he planted Puritanism throughout the country, and settled three-fourths of Ireland with colonists of English origin and strong Protestant feeling. Yet the disturbed elements were not quieted, for the policy of the Protector was not allowed time to become matured; and at the Restoration, the State Church re-appeared with its arrogance and aggressive spirit." Whatever arguments may be alleged by Protestants against the Commonwealth as a break in the Church history and endowments, might with equal, if not greater force, be alleged by the Roman Catholics against the Reformation being taken as a point of reckoning. This article seems unconsciously to show that, if we look to the past, the "levelling-up" system would be just; yet, if we look to the future, it may prove wise and right to bid religion rule and support itself.

We recommend, to all who can gain access to it, an article on the Brahmo-Somaj of India, as giving a very lucid account of this remarkable religious movement, and as doing it in a spirit of marked moderation and liberality. It narrates the career of Ramohun Roy, and points out as the cause of his comparative want of success the fact, that he never broke altogether with the caste system, and condemns this half-heartedness. "Dr. Carpenter," says the Reviewer, "indeed allows that the Rajah, in various ways, manifested solicitude to preserve his caste, with a view both to his usefulness and to the security of his property." He and his followers established the Brahmo-Somaj, i.e., meeting of the worshippers of the Supreme God. In 1840, this society was revived, at a time when education and missionary influences were making inroads on idolatrous worship and an atheistic re-action from idolatry. The revived society made considerable progress under the leadership of Babu Debendranath Tagore, formed branch societies, and slowly increased till they now number sixty societies, and have an income of about £1,000 a year. It followed the steps of Ramohun Roy too closely, retaining the observance of caste, and even committing itself to the Vedant system, till this was proved by Colebrooke and other scholars to be a Pantheistic and not a monotheistic system. The members then turned to the works of nature, and subsequently corresponded with Parker, Emerson, and F. Newman, observing theism as opposed to orthodox Christianity. They believe that Brahminism is a universal religion, including modern Mahometans, Christians, Hindus, as well as ancient Jews, Egyptians, Chinese, Romans, &c. It teaches men to recognise and praise God for the good that is in them, to repent and amend the evil. The immortality of the soul is an intuitive belief of human nature. Repentance will save the sinner, not from deserved punishment for past transgression, but from fresh sin; while a remedial action springs from the pangs of remorse. Five years ago this party manifested renewed activity under the influence of a new preacher, Babu Kesheb Chunder Sen; and progress has been made both in numbers and in independence of caste feeling. But Mr. Sen's position has vacillated. Two years ago he lectured eloquently on Christ and the cross; a year later on great men, enumerating as heroes (without mentioning Christ) Luther, Knox, Mahomet, and the Hindu reformer, Chaitanyo, whom Mr. Sen imitates in allowing "the more degraded of his followers to prostrate themselves before him and worship him." (p. 542.) Even Miss Carpenter was disappointed with the present state of things, though hopeful of the future; and the reviewer sees, in the educational and missionary labours of the last forty years, the earnest of a wonderful influence in favour of Christianity, which, at present insensible in its action, will make itself increasingly manifest as time goes on.

Words from a Layman's Ministry. Discourses preached in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle, by the late George Brown, Barrister-at-Law. London: E. T. Whitfield. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson.

THESE Discourses are valuable additions to the Sunday library of our religious households, not unworthy to stand near Channing and Martineau, Robertson and Tayler. In a preface by the Rev. J. J. Tayler we are told how, some years ago, finding himself on a Sunday, in his summer vacation, near Barnard Castle, he discovered accidentally that a small society of Unitarians met in that town for worship, and on the ensuing and several following Sundays he attended with his family in the little church. He found the services conducted by Mr. George Brown. "They were," says Mr. Tayler, "indeed, full of life and freshness. No formalism deadened this worship. It breathed the very spirit of faith and love, and left on my own mind a stronger sense of the reality of religion and of the living presence of God than I think I ever experienced before. Some of the impressions which I there received, will abide with me as a precious spiritual influence to my dying hour." Mr. Brown having died last year, "his family and friends," the preface goes on to say, "have naturally wished that some permanent record should be preserved of what he spoke with such effect on some of the grandest and tenderest themes that can touch the human heart. These Discourses have in consequence been selected out of his papers for publication, with the exception, however, of retrenching here and there a few obvious redundancies, correcting some clerical errors, and omitting the greater part of the poetical quotations. It has been thought best and most respectful to the memory of Mr. Brown himself to print these discourses as nearly as possible as they were originally delivered." We cannot better characterise these Discourses than by continuing to use Mr. Tayler's own words:

"If we are not mistaken, they will surprise the reader by their rare union of a pure and simple theology, with that rich unction of fervid religiousness which is too readily supposed incompatible with it. Perhaps the most remarkable feature which distinguishes them is their refined and elevated spirituality. On the doctrines of prayer, and on the direct action of God's spirit on the human soul, on the relations of free will and providence, and on the grand symbolism of the Cross as the truest expression of the grand self-sacrificing love of the pure Gospel of Christ—the statements of our author will be found singularly clear, earnest, and emphatic, presenting on these points a decided contrast to the somewhat cold and dry theology of the older Unitarianism."

We have been much struck, in reading through these Discourses, to notice, among other things, on how very simple and universal a basis both of Theology and Moral Philosophy his whole system—if we may venture to call it a system—of Religion and Ethics rested. A Living God.—Christ his representative, a life in his image.—Heaven a life in his nearer presence—these were the central ideas on which his whole religious faith seemed to revolve. He appeared to feel that a large number of the opinions which men insist on fastening to these great fundamental truths, have really little or nothing to do with the true central faith and life.

We have gained, therefore, from the religious unction of these Discourses, fed, as it was, by these few and simple beliefs, an assurance that real religion has nothing ultimately to fear, from the rapid loosening and sweeping away of the various systems of outwork which theologians have built around the enduring faith. These have only been like so many poor cottages or huts built against the granite walls of some old castle, whose strength and beauty come out the more when they are gone. Had we only those Discourses of Mr. Brown like that on "Walking with God" and that on "Prayer," which breathe his sense of the Divine Presence and his longing for a living communion with the Father, we might fancy him something of a mystic, and feel a doubt whether his thought was not too spiritual and lofty to find response in many minds. Again, if we had only those Discourses which speak of the practical duties and temptations of life as "With the pure all things are pure," "Little things," "Ill nature," "Thorns in the Flesh," and "The value of Time," we might, on superficial notice, fancy that our author belonged to the very practical and ethical class, who by the intensity of the light in which they see duties defined, are blinded to the sight of that love and trust through which alone duties become sweet privileges. But now the varied tones of melody breathed through these sermons show us that Mr. Brown was indeed a man of rich and many-sided spiritual life, combining those high thoughts which fill the soul with high ecstasy in the hour of worship and meditation with those common-sense practical purposes which sent him forth to do good service in the world. We have been much struck by noticing in the more ethical portions of the Discourses, an obvious system of definite moral philosophy—which seems essentially the same as that of Bishop Butler—lying at the basis of the thought. It is interesting thus to find him, a layman, led by his conscientiousness and earnest love of truth and reality, to search for clear consistent ideas on that subject of morals, which a large number of those whose stated duty it is to teach morals are, we fear, content to be without. Mr. Brown appears to have been one of those who found the prime warrant and prompting to faith in his own soul. But not on that account is he proudly independent of all outward help. In the Discourses, "Come unto me," "The Liberty of the Spirit," "Christ the Redeemer," "Christ the Saviour," "Christ Crucified," he shows that he regards Jesus as the representative of God and the representative of man also. And the reason for which he reveres and values Christ he shows by such passages as the following:

"The force and reality with which spiritual affections are expressed in the life of another is often the awakening power that reveals us to ourselves, and he is the greatest revealer of God who makes us conscious that we have in ourselves some germs of the attributes of our Heavenly Father. He who, by the spiritual attraction he exerts, can throw us into frames of pure desire, of patience, of prayer, of inward contentment, of deep confidence, he it is who has unveiled the image in which we were made, and drawn us nigh to the Father's presence."—(p. 108, "Christ the Redeemer.")

We shall not claim perfect originality for Mr. Brown. Indeed, on such themes as he discussed, it is now difficult to be original. And we often come in his Discourses upon obvious traces of the influence of the thought of Channing or Martineau, of Parker or Robertson, on his mind; but still we see that he had assimilated the thought gained with his own, and reproduced it, often unconscious that it had any external origin.

We should have liked to give a few features from the sketch of Mr. Brown's life prefixed to the Discourses, but for this, as well as for specimens of them, we must send our readers to the volume itself, assuring them that it will well repay their attention. They will find the language gratifying their taste by its appropriateness and elevation of style, and gratifying their ear by its smoothness and rhythm, whilst the thought will afford valuable food to their moral and religious natures.

THE CONGREGATION AND THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

WHAT is greatly needed is that our congregations should take deeper interest in our Sunday schools. Our people have to be brought to see that our Sunday schools are the real missionary fields to which their Christian love and zeal can go forth to bring into the Christian fold and life the multitudes around, scattered abroad as sheep having no shepherd. Long and painful experience has now taught us that the only way in which we Unitarians at least can do effectual work among the people is to lay hold of the children. We cannot lay hold of the adults—the adults we most want to reach. We cannot get at them. We can get hold of the children, and at most of our mission stations where we do get hold of the adults it is generally through the children, as their friends or parents. The only mission stations which seem healthy and flourishing in this district are those where the church is gathered round the Sunday school—its nucleus consisting of the elder scholars, teachers, and parents. Almost the only strong working-class congregations that we know have grown up from Sunday schools. We cannot help feeling sometimes as if Unitarian Christianity were of that fine and subtle character that, like the influences of nature, the sunshine, and the pure air, acting on the frame, it requires time to act upon the character, and that time can be gained only when we get human beings young and subjected regularly to the influences of religious education. The popular Christianity on the other hand seems like the more violent influences such as an electric shock or a potent medicine producing a great impression at once, though it may be but little lasting or effective. It is of no use for us to attempt to produce on the adult ignorant and sinful the same sensational effects which the orthodox can often produce, our true policy is education applied to the young.

A Sunday school, then, is an essential adjunct to a church. Without it the church has no arm to reach forth in compassion to lay hold of the multitude around. Without it the church has no real outlet for its Christ-like love to go forth and do what its master would have done for the spiritual poor and needy without.

But when a congregation has gathered together a number of children in a Sunday school it has only begun its work. The congregation is bound to see that the young souls which it has collected are fed with such food as will nourish in them the Christian life. For what must the congregation desire to do for these children? It must desire, to use the words of Mr. GEORGE SMITH, at the Good Friday meeting, "not simply to give a number of historical and geographical facts even upon the gospels, but rather to call forth their affection for what is good, true, and holy, to arm them against the social temptations by which they are surrounded." Now, if the congregation must desire this, it must desire, and feel it to be its duty, too, to provide for the Sunday school such teaching as will effect the end. It must provide, for the Sunday school, teaching as effective for the purpose as the teaching in the congregation. The lambs require as careful feeding as the sheep, but, at present, the sheep in our churches seem to monopolise the best pastures and most of the care of the shepherds to themselves.

There is plenty of work in our Sunday-schools for volunteers of every class, in helping to convey to the scholars whatever elementary instruction is still needed, and those facts—say of gospel history and geography, and those solid doctrines of religion and morality—which are the bones of the religious character and life you wish to form in them. But, after all, there is a work to be done in the school for which something more than volunteer agency is needed, just as surely as something more than volunteer agency is needed for the work of the ministry in the church. To clothe the mere facts with flesh and blood, to appeal to the conscience, to quicken the moral and religious feelings of children, to cause them not only to know the good but to love it, not only to know the bad but to hate it, requires both special gifts and special preparation. It requires as careful and special a preparation to enable a man to minister to the religious life of children well as to minister to grown-up people. Their natures have to be studied, and the ideas to be conveyed have to be carefully arranged in the order in which they can best receive them, and so clothed in language and illustration as to be adapted to their natures, and most fitted to arouse their interest and touch their feelings.

This is a matter that demands more attention than it has yet received. There is a vague feeling of desire that our ministers should take more part in our Sunday schools, but if so, they must be helped more than they are in their other work. In some cases, indeed, where there is an afternoon service it might be advantageously changed into a service and lesson for the young. In other cases, the minister of the elder congregation should, by some arrangement, be set free to be frequently the minister to the children's church in the school. Is not this another illustration of the need which is becoming more manifest every year for the lingering sacerdotalism which still so largely confines the ministrations of our churches to a ministerial profession, to be broken through in practice, as it has long been abandoned in theory, so that the public worship may be sometimes led by laymen, and our ministers be set more free for the evangelising work which alike in our schools and our missions waits for more labourers?

AMERICAN NOTES.

The following exhortation, rather calculated to alarm ministers we should think, appears in the Examiner:

"Churches of Christ, covet the privilege of burying your pastor. Do all you can to secure that privilege. If you are really in earnest, you will probably succeed."

The New York Herald gives an account of a singular gathering of Spiritualists in that city a few Sundays since. The star of the evening was Dr. H. P. Fairfield, advertised as "a remarkable trance speaker." The reading of the Scriptures was dispensed with, and in its place the doctor, after having very solemnly taken up a position behind the desk, announced that he would read a spirit poem by Edgar Allen Poe. This spirituous poetry must have been in rather small spiritual type, for the doctor was enabled to read off some eight or ten verses from the palm of his hand without turning over. Some more music from the tame piano, and the speaker said he was delighted to see so large and full an audience, and felt flattered at their presence; but he was more glad to see an innumerable host of disembodied spirits which, though not visible to the carnal eye, were seen by him. Wherever Spiritualists were gathered together to preach and hear the gospel, there these happy spirits were, and they were now waiting in that room to hear him speak. Dr. Fairfield took as his text the words, "Consider what I say; and the Lord give thee understanding in all things." He then commenced to discourse, but although his delivery was very rapid his language was so chosen as to be almost unintelligible. "The main idea," says the reporter, "was that Spiritualism meant upwards and onwards, and everything else downwards and backwards."

The American Missionary Association, which is working among the freedmen, is stated to have in its schools about 40,000 of all ages; and the number taught in the Roman Catholic schools is given as 200,000.

Dr. Chapin recently said in a sermon, and we are disposed to agree with him, that one of the most shallow things is "for a man to stand up in the middle of this great universe and say there can be no such thing as a miracle."

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher says the opinions of many a rich man on matters of morals and religion are similar to those of the machine in the mint; no matter what question is put, the answer invariably comes, "$5." The opinion of most rich men on those subjects is not worth a counterfeit five-cent stamp.

The Tablet (American) contains the following singular inducement from Bishop Rosecrans to contribute to the building of a Roman Catholic Cathedral:

"To those who aid us, with no matter what amount, we bind ourselves to offer, or cause to be offered, every Saturday, the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, according to their intention, up to the day when, with God's blessing, our cathedral shall be consecrated. After the consecration of the cathedral, this weekly sacrifice will be permanently established for the intention of all who may contribute five dollars or more; and we will send to each one, in a form suitable for framing (to donors of twenty-five dollars and upwards), on parchment, the following certificate:

"Columbus, O., _____ 186 .

We acknowledge the receipt of your contribution of _____ dollars for ST. JOSEPH'S CATHEDRAL, COLUMBUS, OHIO,

and do hereby certify, that your name has been entered as a full sharer in the fruits of a "Perpetual Mass" to be offered every Saturday, not simply for your spiritual and temporal good, but according to your intention; applicable, at your option, to yourself or your friends, living and dead, and an heirloom, in your family unto the end.

† SYLVESTER H. ROSECRANS,
Bishop of Columbus, Ohio,
G. H. AHRENS, Chancellor."

An eminent American physician has published some interesting statistics concerning the drinking habits of his country. Taking the population at 40,000,000, he finds that out of every 300 men 122 do not drink at all, 100 drink moderately, 50 are occasional drinkers, 25 drink periodically, and 3 are habitual inebriates. To every 178 who drink 3 are confirmed inebriates, 25 are periodical, and 50 ephemeral drinkers. There is 1 confirmed inebriate to every 59½ men. Of 700 women, 600 never drink, 30 taste wine occasionally, 17 taste ardent spirits, 36 drink beer regularly, 14 drink spirits periodically, and 3 are habitual inebriates. There is, he declares, 1 female inebriate to every 33½ women, for, though fewer women drink than men, more of those who do drink become habitually intemperate.

The State of Indiana must stand much in need of enlightenment, if the people of Lebanon may be taken as a fair specimen of its inhabitants. We are told that, in a recent case of murder, they passed in file through a church, each in turn touching a corpse laid on the Communion Table, the object being to discover at whose touch the corpse would bleed. The corpse gave no sign, and thereby the absence of the murderer was supposed to be proved.

SUNDAYS AND MONDAYS.

The Guardian thus severely animadverts on the article in the Pall Mall with the above heading, of which we gave a portion in our last number but one:—"We do not complain of such scoffs: they are in some measure the portion of religion in this age, as they have been in ages past, and will be in time to come. But we cannot help reflecting occasionally on the kind of authorship to which these mockeries of religion seem to be due. The infidels who sat in the seat of the scornful in our fathers' days were for the most part ignorant of the things they laughed at,—outsiders, who took notice of religion only so far as it supplied their witticisms with a butt. The scorners of our own time betray a familiarity with the sacred subjects on which they jest; they use the language of religion correctly; they know much more about it than is consistent with the attitude towards it which they assume. We have counted in a single article, written against religious persons or practices, half a dozen Scriptural phrases or allusions introduced with all the propriety which springs from old acquaintance with the sacred text. The article which we are now referring to in the way of illustration was obviously written by some one well versed in the details of clerical study and clerical life,—we might almost have said, exclusively versed in these things; for his lay experience would seem to be no larger than might easily be gained from the newspaper report of a shareholders' meeting. Is it possible that renegade clergymen contribute the scoffing element which has so marked a place in the journals opposed to religion? If it be so, we can understand the bitterness with which a pastor's work is ridiculed, and the mocking incredulity with which the laity are represented as regarding his endeavours to win their attention to the truth.

However this may be, there is one feature in the character presented to us by these jesters at religion which requires to be explained. They describe themselves as regularly attending the Sunday services of the church, although their business is only to grumble at the length of the Lessons, and to make fun of the preacher's zeal. Such attendance at church as this appears to us to savour of hypocrisy, and hypocrisy of a very cowardly sort. The man acknowledges that he goes to church for no honest purpose whatever; he believes in nothing that is said or done within the consecrated walls. Yet he appears to believe in the function,—takes part in it by using the books that contain its services, and probably joins more or less audibly in the words that are said or sung. All this he does, merely because he is afraid or ashamed to profess the utter unbelief with which in his heart he regards the whole affair. Anonymously he pours out the scorn of religion which is his true sentiment; he dares not avow it in person, lest society should frown upon him, or his worldly prospects should suffer. Greater meanness than this we can hardly conceive. Religion has at least this advantage over such unbelief, that its disciples know how to do and suffer in its cause. Belief has had its constant martyrs in every age; unbelief has votaries of so dastardly a temper that they will deliberately act a lie once a week rather than lose an invitation to dinner, or encounter the remonstrances of a friend."

A SECEDING PRIEST.

In Mr. Senior's "Journals relating to Ireland," we meet with the following:

"Father R. is a vulgar, pushing man, who was a curate to the Catholic priest of Birr. He obtained great influence among the lower orders here by preaching violent sedition. This tempted him to try to supplant his superior. Unable to get possession of the chapel, he opened a conventicle of his own, was supported by a considerable subscription, and beat the regular performer hollow in the number of his hearers. The Bishop interdicted him, and he repelled war by war. He began by preaching against the discipline of the Church of Rome, maintained the right of each congregation to elect its own pastor, and disclaimed all Episcopal authority. As he warmed in the contest, he attacked the doctrines of his enemies, preached against purgatory and transubstantiation, and the invocation of saints, and at last got rid of nearly all the peculiarities of Romanism. His success was such that there seemed to be a danger of his creating a schism. Archbishop Murray, Bishop Doyle, and another Bishop, whose name I forget, came to Birr for the purpose of solemnly excommunicating him. They fixed the time for doing so at eight o'clock in the morning. Father R.'s mob broke into the chapel, destroyed all the windows, extinguished the tapers, and would have injured (perhaps killed) the bishops if they had not taken refuge in the sacristy, barred the door, and defended themselves there until news was sent to the barracks, and a detachment came and relieved them.

"At last, however, poor R. ventured to step too far. As long as he preached against the doctrines of the Church of Rome he was applauded. But he began to attack its ceremonies. This they could not stand. 'It was awful,' some of those who had been his adherents said to me, 'to see him extinguish the candles on the altar, and then say mass without them!' The subscriptions ceased, his conventicle was deserted. He conformed to the Anglican Church, and left Ireland."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE MYSTERY OF THOUGHT.

How is it? Does the will our thoughts create,
Or only stir the latent seeds to grow?
Or do we but dispose the brain, and wait
The unknown inward flow?

We may not tell unless by what we feel;
And who shall say his thought can be constrained?
Or that he did more service than reveal
The thought of thinking gained?

Earth gets her wealth of flowers and fruit and grain,
All from the unseen world that lies behind;
Earth only is the body and the brain—
The other is the mind.

For though with wondrous skill we analyze,
Both thought and food when into being brought,
The unknown something in the process flies
That made them food and thought.

Alas, I know not! but when in the night
Of ignorance, where fancy blindly roams,
I turn to the Unseen and pray for light,
I often find it comes.

R. LEIGHTON.

THE "ROB ROY" ON THE KISHON.

AFTER lingering about the Lake of Gennesareth, and trying to determine the sites of one or two of the places mentioned in Scripture, such as Bethsaida and Chorazin, Mr. Macgregor tore himself away, and we again take up his narrative, and jot down for the benefit of our readers such matters as he points out to us that seem worthy of notice.

The sun has just risen, and the hills of Bashan are fringed on the top with a golden edge. The hoar frost still whitens the rich grass around our tent. The water laps the shore, the gravel beach, remarkable for its delicate cleanliness. The Rob Roy is strapped on the pony, and our cavalcade winds under the crags of the "Valley of Pigeons"—huge beetling cliffs pierced with caverns, and where a number of eagles are soaring majestically far out of our reach. Robbers once dwell in these cliffs as a fastness, and they increased in numbers and daring until all the country round was afflicted by the scourge. At length, Herod lowered great iron cages from above, in front of the caverns, and with soldiers inside them, who thus, by fire and sword, by arrows and iron hooks, finally conquered the outlaws and slew them all.

Nazareth within a few years has largely increased, the houses and pavement are improved, the fountain is renewed by stone carefully following the ancient lines but still sorely wounding the hallowed relics of a spot to which, we may be almost certain, our Saviour often went as a child, for fountains do not change in locality. The new church just begun occupies a commanding site, and the design though plain is beautiful. The Rev. J. Zeller, who has long been labouring here, shows us the bones of a crocodile about six feet long which had been killed a few months before in the river Zerka, which flows into the sea north of Joppa. For many years it has been asserted, but now it is proved, that the crocodile was to be found in that river. The shape of its head seemed different from that of the Nile crocodile, but this matter will be discussed when the skeleton is brought to England in the spring, for Mr. Zeller has promised it as a gift to the "Biblical Museum," now in course of formation by the Palestine Exploration Committee.

After a short stop at Cana, we wander on over hills and marshes till we camp at the foot of Mount Carmel. From the sea it looks beautiful, but not grand. To see its noble heights, its dark, steep glades, its fantastic rock, and the remnants of its forests, once so spreading wide, and even now an ample covering to its wild, grey crags, we must ride along the base some miles inland, and then climb the side and go along the lofty crags where Bala's prophets were vanquished in open fight with the majesty of God, and where they were "brought down to the brook Kishon," and slain by the bidding of the prophet. The highest of its many summits is 1,850 feet above the sea, and it looks much higher than this because the rise is abrupt. The sides of the mountain are fifteen miles long, and the breadth across at the wide end is about five miles. The interior of this triangular plateau is a series of lesser hills with great variety of outline, large and small trees, rocks of bright colour and grotesque shapes, thickets of bushes, and scattered remains of walls and terraces, and larger buildings. About 300 feet below the highest peak is a natural amphitheatre where 20,000 people could easily see all the details which are so minutely told us of the sacrifice as related in the book of Kings.

Carrying the canoe over a treacherous marsh, we reach the river's bank, and launch the Rob Roy in pouring rain. The Kishon is a most tame and monotonous stream. No part of it is picturesque. It flows sluggishly through the plain of Esdraelon and into the plain under Carmel, without rapids or rocks or any scenery except what you may see on a canal. It winds about, but not excessively. Its channel soon comes to be 60 feet broad and then 100 feet. For a few miles alongside of Carmel the water is some twenty feet below the plain, and the banks are sheer upright, of rich brown, or red, loam. Only a very few trees, and those of small size, are on its shores, but there are bushes in the water bent all one way by the violence of the stream in floodtime, while at other seasons the volume of water actually flowing will shrink up in hot weather till the bed is dry except in long, deep pools.

Soon the rain stopped, the sun came out, and then the gloomy river seemed to smile. The current was slow, the wind was in favour of the voyager. No Arabs could see him, much less get near, and he was left alone, one of the most solitary of mortals in the world. The banks were so steep and so soft that it had been very difficult to find a launching-place, but now it was entirely impossible to find a landing-place had he wished to go ashore, so the only pleasant excitement was that he must push on to the sea.

After ascending a tributary stream, and returning to the main river, he relates the following incident: "I was dipping a tin can into the water for a drink, and dabbling with it carelessly, when in the long-drawn silence a new sound reached my ear—a sort of hissing or gurgling, at intervals almost like breathing. On turning to my right side to look for the cause of this, I was at once transfixed with amazement—and, I will confess—with fear. There, within two feet of my hand, and just above the water, were the nose and open mouth of a crocodile! The water gurgled as he sneezed and gulped it down. I knew what it was at once, for I had often seen crocodiles on the Nile thus swimming with only their noses in the air, and on my bookcase in the Temple there has been for many years one of the crocodiles I shot there, so that the nose of this reptile is not a strange feature to me. Recovering my self-possession, I quietly dipped my blade near him, and down he sunk, and the Rob Roy shot away. Instantly regret seized on me that I should leave so novel and important a discovery to rest on the 'evidence of a nose'—for I did not see his eyes, or his back, as the water was much discoloured. But then there was this consideration on the other side. A crocodile on the Nile keeps away from man, for he knows and fears man's power. Unless you press him there he will scarcely attack. Here, however, on the Kishon, it is altogether different. The crocodile would see my hand dipping, each time I gave a paddle stroke, quite close to the water, and what could be more tempting to him than a piece of flesh! The somewhat listless pleasure of the day was suddenly transformed into business. 'It is my duty to do what I may dare to settle this matter now, for I should never have the chance again, and probably few boatmen will follow my track on the Kishon.'

Approaching the shore again (I had kept in the middle, for crocodiles are only dangerous in shallow water, and they seldom try to catch their prey in the middle of the river) I noticed many of the footprints of crocodiles. These marks are not unlike the impression left on the sand by the human hand if you stamp the wrist forcibly down. As I stopped for a moment to inspect these, there came below my canoe a 'thing' which went bump, bump, bump, for at least three feet along its flat floor. Being well accustomed to feel all sorts of knocks and scrapes from snags, rocks, gravel, stones, and sand, under my canoe, I was at once aware that it was not these. No doubt a crocodile had seen the strange object before him, and had come underneath me, feeling his way along the boat perhaps from sheer curiosity. So off I set at the best pace the Rob Roy ever went in her life, and I felt that I must only put up with the doubts and questionings which a first observer of a new fact must and ought to be subject to when he tells us what he is convinced of, but without the circumstantial details which, presuming veracity in the narrator, are needed to establish the correctness of his own conviction. I have already mentioned that there has been actually killed a crocodile in the river Zerka. I am informed that Arabs at Jericho say there are small crocodiles even in the Jordan. With respect to the Kishon, then, seeing that I am the first person known to have traversed that portion of it, which is far above the arable land near the sea, we cannot be surprised to hear that I am the first to have seen the nose and mouth and to have felt the body and observed the footprints of a crocodile there."

From the Kishon the canoe was carried to the Belus, a sluggish marshy river, with many palm trees near it, and ancient ruins, but chiefly notable because its name is said to have been given when glass was first accidentally discovered there in ancient days as men made a fire upon its sand, which happens to contain the requisite components. Mr. Macgregor paddled on to its mouth and right into the bay of Acre, and then into that renowned fortress, his canoe being, of course, the smallest vessel that ever reached it by sea.

THE PASSOVER IN JERUSALEM.

A WRITER in the Sunday at Home, who, through the kind offices of a Christian Israelite, gained admission to the houses of several Hebrew families on the night of the Passover, gives us the following account of what took place:

The same general order of things was observed in them all. A long table was arranged for the sacred meal in the centre of the chief room of the house, and both chamber and table were adorned according to the wealth and taste of the occupier. In the centre of the table was a basket containing unleavened bread. Dishes containing hard-boiled eggs and salads were scattered about, the salads representing the bitter herbs of old; and wine from the vineyards of Bethlehem, sweetened with raisins, was plentifully supplied. At sunset the entire family, old and young, gathered round the frugal board, the men at one end and the women at the other, while the children occupied places between. In front of the male members of the family was set a platter containing a piece of roast lamb, usually a cutlet from the loin. Before the repast commenced, the narrative of the exodus was read in Hebrew by one of the younger sons, and the patriarch of the group now and then interrupted the reader by throwing in some explanation of the text, or answering questions which were proposed. The narrative concluded, the head of the family led the devotions of the evening by reading some liturgical prayers. Then the feast commenced, at which only the males partook of the paschal lamb, while the women contented themselves with eggs and salad. At the conclusion of the repast, the ancient Psalms of David were sung in their peculiar nasal fashion, which occupation often advances into the night. To us these Jews displayed courteous hospitality, and pressed upon us their unleavened bread and very excellent wine, and when, in parting from the interesting scene, we asked an aged patriarch whether he still anticipated the advent of the Messiah, a ray of gladness lit up his furrowed face as he replied, "I am expecting his appearance every day." On the following Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, we repaired at seven o'clock in the morning to the chief synagogue of the Jews in Jerusalem. During the previous night heavy showers had fallen, the "latter rain" of Scripture. This had accumulated in the narrow streets for want of drainage, until the huge pools of water and mire rendered locomotion a thing of difficulty. The water had even invaded the floor of the sanctuary, and while we were looking about for a resting-place within, we were politely invited to take seats on the raised platform which occupied the centre of the building. From this conspicuous position we commanded the entire assembly. On the area some six or seven hundred persons were squatting on benches, with their legs folded under them, the books of Moses or some Hebrew liturgy on their knees, their heads covered (for the symbol of obeisance in the East is the uncovering of the feet), and a thick veil over their faces, as a memorial of the veil worn by Moses when he descended from the Mount, and which reminded us of the language of the Apostle Paul, "that to this day when Moses is read the veil is upon their hearts." Behind thick lattice-work, in a high gallery, were to be dimly seen the female portion of the assembly, but to all appearance mere spectators of a formal and feeble service. On the platform near us sat the Chief Rabbi, who presided in the assembly; but what to us was specially interesting was the presence of a youth called up out of the assembly, as Jesus was at Nazareth, to read the Hebrew Scripture. This exercise concluded, the sacred roll was carried through every part of the edifice, that the worshippers might kiss the heaven-sent law before it was deposited in the archives by the ruler of the synagogue. A few liturgical prayers were then read, or rather nasally intoned, by the rabbi, to which responses were made in guttural and boisterous tones. The teaching element was entirely wanting, and the worship appeared to us little more than the formal and punctilious performance of religious duty.

EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.

ON Thursday afternoon the annual meeting of the East Lancashire Unitarian Mission was held in Bank-street School, Bolton. The meeting was preceded by an afternoon service in the chapel in connection with the Bolton District Association. The Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., was the preacher. After the service, tea was served in the schoolroom, there being a large attendance from the town and neighbourhood, and the districts which are included in the mission. Amongst those present were the following:—Revs. J. Worthington, J. Entwistle, Revs. J. Clough, J. Dean (Bolton), J. Wright (Bury), J. T. Whitehead (Ainsworth), J. Taplin (Crediton, Devonshire), L. Taplin (Todmorden) Alexander Gordon, M.A. (Liverpool), J. W. Rogers (Burnley), J. K. Smith (Newchurch), R. H. Cotton (Birmingham), A. Rushon (Hindley), J. S. Gilbert (Rivington), W. C. Squier (Stand), George Ride (Chorley), John Fox (Heywood), also Mr. William Grundy (president), Mr. C. J. Darbishire (Rivington), Ald. R. Harwood, Ald. Taylor, Councillor Bromley, Mr. G. B. Dalby (Preston), Mr. A. Mackie (Burnley), Mr. H. Spencer (Ainsworth), Mr. C. Eckersley (Astley), Mr. W. Woodward and Mr. E. Manley (Chowbent), Messrs. R. Carling, G. Cunliffe, J. Harwood, F. Taylor, J. T. Simpson, A. Bromley, Mr. John Nuttall, &c.

Mr. WM. GRUNDY, the retiring president, occupied the chair. He remarked that the report which would be read to them, as in comparison with last year's report, a very satisfactory one, and looked as if they had an interest in the work they had begun. The present were queer times, when the question of disestablishment and disendowment were agitating the minds of men; and he had no doubt that as disendowment took place—or as he should say, as the loaves and fishes were separated from religion—and as religion stood upon the voluntary system, and they paid for what they believed, and believed what conscience dictated, they would really be better men, and the world would be better. With these feelings he knew of no religion equal to the Unitarian religion to make them better men, and to improve others. Unitarians, however, must believe what they professed, because their faith was not a fashionable one, but was rather spoken against; and having faith in it they must spread it.

Rev. J. WORTHINGTON, one of the secretaries, then presented the report.

"It opened by stating that the income of the society had been favourable, but as this was owing chiefly to the fact that the appointment of a minister to Accrington had been delayed, during the next year the Mission expected to expend the full income, and their efforts in this respect must not only be sustained but increased. The simultaneous collections had realised in 1866, £129; in 1867, £161; in 1868, £145. With these funds at their disposal the committee had fostered the congregations at the several stations. At Accrington a new chapel was opened on the 10th April, 1868, the debt on which had been reduced to about £100. The congregation after some difficulty had secured Mr. E. Coleman (Owens scholar, at the Home Missionary Board) as their future minister. The average attendance at the morning service was 30, and at the evening service 50. The school contained 60 scholars and 12 teachers. The collections amounted to £32. At Astley the attendance averaged, morning 35, afternoon 47. There were 50 scholars in the school, and £28 had been raised during the year. Burnley was disatisfied with their hired room, and had raised £150 towards a new chapel which it intended to build on a site purchased by the congregation. The average attendance is, morning, 40 to 45, the number of Sunday scholars 50, and the amount raised £50. At Heywood nearly the whole of the available accommodation in the chapel was taken up. There were 148 members, 135 Sunday scholars, and the collections £32. The income from the sittings was £40. At Blackburn they had taken the Cobden Hall, though the attendance was still small. There were 11 subscribers, average attendance 25, and the sum raised for expenses £45. The committee suggested the raising of a permanent building fund in support of the operations of the mission, and requested a number of gentlemen to consider how the object could be best accomplished. In closing their report the committee expressed their deep sense of the loss sustained by the mission in the death of Mr. Robert Heywood, who had been from the commencement a hearty and untiring supporter of their association, a large subscriber to its fund, a regular attendant at its meetings, and a warm sympathiser in its objects and operations."

Ald. RICHARD HARWOOD, who, though in a feeble state of health, was present during a portion of the meeting, read his report as treasurer. The income of 1866-7 was £279. 15s. 7d., and the expenditure £212. 16s. 5½d.; the income of 1867-8 was £293. 15s. 8½d., and the expenditure £219. 1s. 4d.; and the income of 1868-9 was £308. 15s. 10d., and the expenditure £305. 17s. 0d.; leaving a total balance in the banker's hands of £89. 9s. 11½d. No doubt that might appear a large balance, but at Accrington they were about to appoint a minister, and that would necessarily lead to an increased expenditure in Accrington of £100. Consequently, unless the subscriptions were increased they would be in a deficiency. He hoped they would not be put in that position.

The adoption of the reports having been moved by Mr. G. B. Dalby, of Preston, was seconded by Rev. W. C. Squier, and supported by Rev. A. Gordon.

The Rev. J. WRIGHT suggested that the meeting should resolve itself into the form of a conference, in order that any remarks upon the future working of the mission might be heard and acted upon, if advisable. After commenting on the now established system of simultaneous collections, he observed that the mission had been in existence for nine years, during which time it had gone on with varying success. In this district, during that time, there had been at least three chapels built, which would not otherwise have been the case, and before they met again he hoped they would be able to add a fourth—at Burnley. The association had been of great benefit even to the old congregations, for it had served to unite them more closely together than hitherto, causing in each an additional spirit of life and vigour. Out of 23 congregations in the association, during its nine years of existence, at least 19 of them had either built new chapels, new schools, or done something or other of a progressive character amongst themselves; affording a gratifying proof that they were not sacrificing existing interests whilst attempting to build up new ones. The annual income derived from the district for the support of missionary effort was £273, and he found that nearly £183 came from three congregations, so that from the remaining 20 they only received about £90. The three congregations he meant were Bury, Bolton, and Todmorden; but although they subscribed £183. 6s. 10d. last year, they were not likely to raise much more during the ensuing year, but the other 20 he thought might reasonably be expected to contribute more liberally; because for this year instead of £273 they ought to realise £300, so as to prevent the balance being on the wrong side of the sheet. After desiring that the various districts would send lay representatives to the committee meetings, he concluded by asking for the opinions of parties present on the various subjects mentioned in the report.

The Rev. J. FOX, as the minister of a congregation called into existence by the mission, spoke warmly in support of the association, but expressed his opinion that it would be unwise to open any new fields at present, preferring rather to let the existing stations grow up into self-supporting ones before diminishing their usefulness by diffusing their efforts over too wide an area.

The Rev. J. K. SMITH considered the badness of trade would account for the diminished state of the contributions, instancing the locality in which he was placed as being dependent upon the cotton business, which was in a very low condition at the present time.

Mr. J. BARLOW, of Clover-street, Rochdale, spoke similarly of the church with which he was connected.

The Rev. L. TAPLIN, M.A., said if the Unitarians in Manchester, Liverpool, and London gave in proportion to the collections at Clover-street, Padibam, and Newchurch, Unitarianism would have now a different position from that which it occupied. He held to the opinion that the mission should work one point thoroughly and steadily, until they had made it succeed, in preference to attempting too much, as most of their failures arose from doing things in too small a way, and then leaving bad antecedents behind them.

The Rev. A. RUTTON strongly advocated the introduction of the offertory into their chapels as being the best way of introducing a systematic plan of giving.

C. J. DARBISHIRE, Esq., spoke of the necessity for paying more attention to the education in their schools, that being of more benefit than talking about doctrines, and being a most important element in the life and welfare of the congregation. He moved that the officers for the ensuing year be:—President, Mr. Wm. Grundy; treasurer, Mr. Richard Harwood; chairman of Committee, Mr. John Grundy; secretaries, the Rev. Jeffery Worthington and the Rev. J. Wright; committee, the ministers of the district and two delegates from each congregation.

Mr. A. MACKIE seconded the resolution.

The Rev. J. DEAN said, although differing from that meeting in religion, he wished them success from his heart in carrying religious principles throughout Lancashire and the country to those who had no views on the subject. There was plenty of room for the work of Christian agencies, and if they would all work together against their common enemies—ignorance and sin—much more would be done, and done much better, in the cause they held dear, and greater results would reward their endeavours.

The Rev. R. H. COTTON spoke in support of the motion, which was then carried, and the meeting dispersed after singing and the benediction.

INTELLIGENCE.

CWMBACH.—At the close of the Sunday-school connected with the Unitarian Chapel at Cwmbach, on the 4th inst., a testimonial, consisting of a Welsh Bible and a handsomely bound copy of Jones's collection of Hymns and Psalms, was presented to Mr. Thomas Jones, who has been teacher in the above school for the last ten years and who is now going to America with his family.

DUKINFIELD.—On Saturday evening, April 10th, the annual meeting of the scholars in the weekly evening classes was held. The president, the Rev. J. Page Hopps, reported that the number of scholars had increased to 117, and that the pence received from scholars had paid all expenses in connection with the classes, leaving a handsome balance for the purchase of prizes. Thirty scholars, who had attended every evening, and in time, took first-class prizes; and twenty-five, who had attended every evening within four, took second-class prizes. These were given by the president, after tea, in the presence of the teachers and of the scholars who, though prizeless, seemed to enjoy the proceedings as thoroughly as the rest.

IDLE.—On the 6th inst. the congregation at this place met at tea, for the purpose of bidding adieu to one who has been connected with the cause in Idle almost from the beginning, and who has resolved to emigrate to the United States of America. In the forenoon of the same day Mr. John S. Hall, the friend alluded to, was married at the chapel, and in the evening, after tea, the minister, who presided, presented to him in a suitable speech, and in the name of the congregation, a beautiful silver watch as a token of the esteem in which he is held for his consistent Christian conduct, and for the numerous services he has rendered to the Church during his connection with it. Several of the older members also spoke, all wishing him God speed, and to these kindly expressions of goodwill Mr. Hall feelingly replied.

NEWTON ABBOT.—With the death of Dr. Barham the services at this place have ceased, and we learn from the Western Morning News that the Newton Abbot Temperance Society have purchased, at a cost of £500, "Philadelphia Hall," the room in which the services were conducted.

TODMORDEN.—On Sunday last, April 11th, services were held at the new church in celebration of the opening. The devotional part of the morning service was conducted by the resident minister, the Rev. Lindsey Taplin. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, B.A., of Liverpool. In the afternoon a short service was held for the christening of young children, when about thirty were brought to the font. A special interest was given to this service by the fact that the water used in it had been brought from the river Jordan. In the evening the preacher was the Rev. Brooke Herford. The congregations throughout the day were very large. In the afternoon even the aisles were crowded, many friends from Halifax, Rochdale, Newchurch, Dewsbury, &c., being present. The congregation have furnished for the new church a very handsome Bible, on which there is the following inscription:

"The word of God is not bound."—2 Tim. ii. 9.

UNITARIAN CHURCH.

This Bible, the free offering of the congregation, was formally placed on the reading-desk by the minister, on the occasion of this church being opened for public worship."

MR. VIDLER AND MR. W. J. FOX.

To the Editors.—Is there any ground for the statement that the Presbyterians or Unitarians showed any shyness of Mr. Vidler after he had become a Unitarian? There was, I apprehend, no Unitarian body at that time, which could either welcome him or turn the cold shoulder to him. There were ministers and congregations who were Unitarians, but they were not yet aggregated in a body, and were yet mainly known as Presbyterian or General Baptist, according as they belonged to one or other of those bodies. The "Unitarian (Book) Society" was in existence, but it was simply a publishing society of individual members, whose yearly meeting was, from the political circumstances of the time, very quietly conducted.* In 1801, Mr. Vidler's church (formed, I believe, by a secession from Worship-street ten or twelve years before), which had not been included in any denominational organisation, applied for admission to union with the General Baptist Assembly. The application, according to the usual practice, was referred to the next Assembly (1862), when they were admitted. That same assembly appointed Mr. Vidler preacher in default for the next year. This was just about the time of his conversion.

The decrease in his church was, I have always understood, entirely owing to his avowal of Unitarian opinions. An aged friend, still living, who was one of his members, has told me that, after the change had taken place in his mind, but was not yet avowed, some suggestion was made to enlarge Parliament Court or get a larger place, when he quietly said, "Don't be in a hurry; we shall have room enough soon." Yet, after the change, when his church joined the assembly in 1862, it reported 150 Baptist and 20 Pseudo-Baptist members, and the year after 250 members, and in 1864 above 200. Mr. Vidler was one of those who took an active part in the formation of the Unitarian Fund, which may, I think, be fairly regarded as the nucleus of the Unitarian body.

So far from "identifying himself" with "the Freethinkers" (properly the "Freethinking Christians"), that body (which claimed to be the only true "Church of God," and had a remarkable penchant for the excommunication of its members) was formed by secession from Parliament Court, of which Messrs. Thompson and Fenton were members, and Mr. Vidler was one of the objects of their fiercest hostility, which, in their earlier periodicals, they did not hesitate to show.

I have heard that before the secession Mr. Vidler once addressed Mr. Thompson at a Church meeting as follows:—"Brother Thompson, I see 'king' written on your forehead; but while I am here, king you shall never be." Both of them were men of strong will, likely enough to strike fire when they clashed.

Mr. Vidler was an amazingly large man: I should think he weighed over twenty stone; and when he came to town from West Ham, where he lived, he was obliged to take two places in the stage coach. The seats ran across the vehicle, not along it, as in an omnibus, and each held three persons. One day, when the coach stopped for him, four passengers, already in it, took possession of the four corners, leaving him the middle seat on each side. This was meant for a joke, and so Mr. Vidler took it. Hoisting himself in with an effort, and looking this way and that, he said, with a smile, "Very well, gentlemen, as you please;" and sitting down between two of them, soon by dint of pressure made one glad to vacate his corner and take the empty seat on the other side.

One more story. Mr. Vidler sometimes acted as a missionary for the Unitarian Fund in its early days; and when, at one of the anniversary dinners, the late Mr. Aspland in his speech had compared the missionaries to a sort of light infantry who went before, and prepared the way for the regular troops, Mr. Vidler set the table in a roar by getting up and saying, "I rise, gentlemen, to give you a view of one of your light infantry."

Surely there can be no doubt that Mr. Fox was in cordial union with the Unitarian body for somewhere about twenty years; and that his estrangement from it was in no way connected with his religious opinions. The change in his own congregation was not "a decline," but a secession. I was told at the time by a leading member of the congregation, a warm supporter of Mr. Fox, that of over six hundred sittings more than three hundred were given up. The seceders withdrew in a body to Carter-lane, where the congregation was very small and the pulpit vacant, and invited the late excellent Dr. Hutton from Leeds to be their minister.

It was not till after this secession that divergence of opinion between Mr. Fox and the general body of the Unitarians became prominent: but from that time he seldom acted with them; pulpit exchanges between him and other ministers were very rare, and the divergences of opinion became wider and more manifest, until the separation was complete.

THE OPEN CHURCH SYSTEM.

To the Editors.—Can you or any of your readers answer the following questions concerning the "Offertory system?" How many poor people have discontinued attending any place of worship after the adoption of the weekly collection, the seats having been previously partly rented and partly free? How many poor people have discontinued attending any place of worship after the adoption of the weekly collection, the whole of the seats having been previously free? What proportion of poor people, previously regular attendants, have become only occasional attendants on the adoption of the weekly collection?

My own impression is that handing a bag to every attendant to put money in every Sunday would keep away those who could not afford to pay, and that on any Sunday when a poor family were short of money they would stop away from public worship to reduce their expenses. By all means let us do away with appropriated and rented seats, but if a weekly collection causes any poor to stop away, it would be better, rather than adopt it, to suffer a slight diminution of income from reduced annual or quarterly subscriptions, and really "free-will offerings" dropped without compulsion or observation into a box at the door.—I am, respectfully yours,

ARTHUR BACHE MATTHEWS.
39, Congreve-street, Birmingham,
April 7th, 1869.

[The idea that the poor must be kept away from an open church by the service including an offertory, is entirely contrary to the experience of all places of worship at which the open church system has been earnestly tried, and the meaning of it thoroughly kept before the people.—B.H.]

To the Editors.—I ventured upon a few remarks upon the commercial aspect of this question in a former letter, to which Mr. Herford gave a very satisfactory reply from his point of view. I am glad, indeed, his experiments in putting the Offertory system to a test in our body have been successful, and no better thing could those congregations do whose pews are empty for want of "subscribers" than adopt the Offertory system at once, and go out into the highways and bye-ways and bring all in, that God's house may be full.

As to the religious side of the matter, Mr. Herford seems to me to draw rather too sharp a line when he claims for the small weekly offerings an amount of "sacrifice" which he regards as the essential spirit of true religious worship which he would deny to the quarterly or yearly "subscriptions." By over-straining a good case may be damaged.

I still hold to the opinion that there are inconveniences and drawbacks attending the Free Church system peculiar to it, and which must militate against its universal adoption, and that so far as the "religious" gain is concerned it cannot fairly be said to monopolise it.

Every church or congregation is the best judge of its own deficiencies and needs, and must regulate its affairs accordingly. It should, however, be wise enough to "let well alone," whilst, at the same time, it is ever on its guard against the inroads of indolence, apathy, and such like indications of a weak and declining condition.

Bristol.

W. S. PRYER.

[If Mr. Pryer agrees that "no better thing (than adopt the open system) can those congregations do whose pews are empty for want of subscribers," would it not also be good for those congregations whose pews, though all subscribed for, are at no time filled, seldom, indeed, more than half filled. And how about those even which are approaching to the same state? For instance, see the report of Heywood, in the East Lancashire Mission, in another Column. A beautiful new Chapel was built there a few years ago, and we are told that "nearly the whole of the available accommodation in the Chapel is taken up." Yet the income from sittings is only £40! In a little while, the whole accommodation will be let, so that the congregation cannot take another member, and yet it will neither be really full, nor self-supporting.—B.H.]

EXAMINATIONS IN SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

To the Editors.—I must confess that on reading your recent article on this matter, I was somewhat surprised to find the statement that the opinion of the meeting at Bury, on Good Friday, was so decided in its condemnation of the scheme of examinations proposed by Mr. Pilcher. I certainly left with no such impression on my mind; I should have said that the remark of the Rev. John Wright that competitive examinations were bad, but examinations were good, expressed the opinion of the majority present. Competitive examinations very properly received an almost unqualified condemnation; but there is no need why the examinations should be made a test in any way, on which either promotion or reward should depend, in fact, I would strongly urge that they should not. I believe, however, that if they became generally and willingly adopted, they would act as a stimulus both to the teacher and scholar. As to the subject matters of examination, they must depend largely upon the course of instruction given; if, on the one hand, it is of that desultory, unsatisfactory character which is frequently given in our schools, then the examination would fail to fetch out any immediate good result, beyond that resulting in the conviction of the teacher that such instruction is almost worse than useless. If, on the other hand, the teaching be of a thorough and systematic nature, then the contact of a fresh mind will help to draw out from the scholars what they have learned, and the teacher will note wherein his or her defects consist, from the failure in any instance to get at the required answer. These examinations should not be public, but confined to the class only under examination, and should be viva voce.

I am by no means an advocate for giving what is commonly known as secular instruction in the Sunday schools; the day for this has happily gone by, and the schools that still continue such instruction are, I believe, doing more harm than good, as they give an excuse to parents to take their children away from the day school, where they were really learning something, much earlier than was necessary, in order that they may go to work, while they save their consciences with the delusion that they are making up for it on the Sunday. But while confessing this, and fully admitting that a large part of the Sunday-school education is beyond the capability of being reached by any examination test, yet as it is impossible to ignore the intellectual part of the education, surely to improve that, and get the best of it we can, is a very fair and proper aim. As to the religious education, or, to speak more correctly, religious influence of the Sunday-school, this will arise much more from the personal character and behaviour of the teacher than from any amount, however considerable, of verbal instruction, so that the actual time of the class must necessarily be taken up in what is really the intellectual side of the matter. Our ministers have nearly all gone through an examination in their religious knowledge, and I can see no reason why, in a proportionate degree, our scholars should not be examined with a good practical result.

There is another expression in your article to which I must demur, viz., that "it ought to be the aim of our Sunday-schools to reach the poorest." I think the aim should be to reach all. If we can safely and truly say that only the children of the poorest need religious instruction, and that the classes above them get it at home, then your position, no doubt, is correct; but can we say this? I doubt it. Again, if we say that the Sunday-school teaching shall only be given to the ragged, what are we to do with those we have got? Are we to send them adrift, in order that we may apply ourselves to the instruction of their less well-dressed neighbours? Surely not. The question of dress does not affect that of the soul to be saved. So long as we are educating those to whom such education is an advantage, surely a good work is being done. Teachers of much longer experience than I can claim, unite in saying that the children, who now come to us well and neatly dressed, are from exactly the same class that formerly furnished ragged and dirty children, and that this is, in most cases, the result of Sunday-school influence. Such being the case, rather than complain of the present apparent status of our scholars, we should rejoice that so much progress has been made in their decency and order, and that we have educated them out of their rags, and kept them from the large ignorant mass below.—Yours truly,

RICHD. BARTRAM.

London, 6th April, 1869.

[Our impression of the feeling of the meeting is, that it was not merely against competitive examinations, but against the whole idea of making systematic examinations a part of our Sunday-school scheme. As to our correspondent's second demurrer, we have never written a word to advocate turning our present class of scholars adrift. Let them reach ALL. At present they do not. The poorest are not touched by them. Let our present scholars remain, but do not let us do anything to perpetuate the limitation.—Eds U.H.]

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE

LONDON SCHOOL. Head Master, T. HEWITT KEY, M.A., F.R.S. Vice-Master, E. K. HORTON, M.A., Fellow of St. Peter's College, Cambridge.

The SUMMER TERM will BEGIN for new Pupils on Tuesday, April 27, at 9.30 a.m. The School (for the better accommodation of which a portion of the south wing of the College has recently been erected) is very near the Gower-street Station of the Metropolitan Railway, and within a few minutes' walk of the termini of several other railways. Prospectuses containing full information respecting the courses of instruction given in the School, fees, and other particulars may be obtained at the office of the College. JOHN ROBSON, B.A., Secretary to the Council.

NEW UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHAPEL, STRATFORD, LONDON.

The Unitarians at Stratford, having sold the short lease of their former Chapel (which was some distance from the populous part of the town), have purchased a fresh site in one of the best situations, and are erecting an elegant and comfortable Chapel, from a design kindly furnished by Thomas Chisholm Clarke, Esq., of London, and will be completed in July, the cost of which, including land, will amount to £1,000. Four members of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—Messrs. Lawrence, Preston, Taylor, and Spears—have been elected, with others at Stratford, as Trustees. The town of Stratford contains a population of 60,000, and is rapidly increasing. The members of the Congregation at present are chiefly persons of humble means, but have generously subscribed nearly £100. Subscriptions are therefore respectfully solicited on behalf of the Building Fund.

HASTINGS UNITARIAN CHURCH.

The Building Committee beg to invite the consideration of their friends to the following letter, which they have received from Messrs. Munn and Mace:—

"My dear sir.—We have received your instructions to prepare the trust deed for your new Chapel at Hastings, but before we do so allow me to make a suggestion, viz., before settling the property you should make another appeal to the Unitarian public, so that the Chapel if possible may be settled free from debt. The importance of this is so great that I can hardly think your richer Unitarian friends (of whom I fear you have very few residents) will allow the property to be so encumbered, involving as it would do a liability to the property being sold to raise the amount at some future period. If there be a chance of getting rid of the debt altogether, I will cheerfully give you a further donation of £5 towards it.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

JOS. MUNN (for self and Mace). "T. Kennard, Esq., Secretary, Hastings." They also thankfully acknowledge the following donations, and beg especially to call attention to the list of promises conditional upon the whole debt being paid.

DUNDEE UNITARIAN CHURCH.

Subscriptions from the friends of the cause of Unitarian Christianity are solicited on behalf of the Building Fund. The present meeting place (a public hall) costs about £40 annually, available only on Sundays. If the congregation, which is of a missionary character, could be relieved of this expense, the cause would be nearly self-supporting. Last year £104 were raised for congregational purposes. About £1,500 will be needed.

A Young Gentleman desires a Situation in a MERCHANT or AUCTIONEER'S OFFICE; age 17; of Unitarian family; salary required; references, Revs. T. W. Freckleton, Plymouth, and J. T. Cooper, Buxton.—Address, Bond, Hampton House, Plymouth.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Idolatry among the Chinese seems to be a somewhat expensive luxury. According to the estimate of a recent traveller, they expend about £5,000,000 annually to appease and propitiate the souls of the dead, not less than £7,000,000 in worship of the Foo gods, and at least £20,000,000 in that of family ancestors.

A circumstance occurred in connection with the lottery in Florence, the day before the Pope's jubilee, which is sure to call out the spirit of gambling in Italy, already strong enough before. On the 11th instant, Pius, the 9th Pope of that name, celebrated the 50th anniversary of his first mass, at the age of 26. The last of these numbers, in the lottery players' Guide Book, corresponds with the word "mass" as well as "money." So hundreds, perhaps thousands, played upon the numbers 11, 69, 9, 50, 26; and in the drawing every one of these numbers came out of the wheel, and those who had backed them all won very large sums, and those who only backed four or three of them likewise made large gains. These lucky gamblers will, of course, have their faith greatly confirmed in a Pope who has thus been so good to them.

The number of Jesuits employed on missions throughout the world is stated to be 3,429, of whom some have their own local mission, while others are auxiliaries of the church. Of the former class are the vicariates of Hindostan and Bombay, 28 fathers; of Madura, 50; of China, 42; and of other places, including eight vicars apostolic, 188 fathers, 46 scholastics, and 62 other coadjutors. Of the second class there are 139 fathers in England, 15 in Constantinople and the vicinity, 46 in New York, 90 in Maryland, 84 in Missouri, 35 in New Orleans, 34 in California, and 14 in the Rocky Mountains.

Another relic of the London of the seventeenth century is passing away. The Danish church, which stood in the centre of Wellclose-square, near the Minorities and Whitechapel, is being demolished, to give place to schools. It was built in 1696 for the use of the Danish sailors, and has been used of late years as a Dissenting chapel, a "sailor's church," and more recently as the temporary chapel of the St. George's Mission, under Mr. Lowder. Inside the edifice is a large royal pew, which, just a hundred years ago, was occupied by Christian VII., King of Denmark, when he was on a visit in London. It may also be added that the church contains the monument of Colley Cibber, whom Pope very unjustly made king of dunces, in the second edition of his famous satire.

The report of The Female Mission to the Fallen describes a good deal of effective work in a direction where it is much needed. The plan is to send out female missionaries into the streets of London at night, who distribute tracts, bearing on them the name and address of places where any who wish to escape from the life they are leading will be received and helped. The Mission records 1,849 cases that have been helped during the eight years of its existence.

To the various instances which we have previously given of what the voluntary principle can accomplish may be added the case of St. Mary's, Harrogate, which in 1865, when the rector's health obliged him to leave, had the endowment £50, pew-rents £70, and a parsonage. He devolved the curacy at £70 with the house on Mr. Roberts, retaining the endowment of £50 for himself. Up to this time the church-rate system was in operation, but yearly balances at length reached £100—debt. Mr. Roberts set to work, threw church-rates overboard, and started the weekly offering principle in the mornings, and it gave £355 the first year, £200 more than the annual church-rate. Second year it gave £306, and last year £333. Beside this, during the period of three years, funds for new windows, heating apparatus, and chancel were raised to the amount of £912, for school £175, and £450 for bells; £300 were spent in reseating the nave, and £100 for a memorial window. Next, a curate's offertory was begun in the evening, and it reached £160. This led to the abolition of pew-rents, and thus the voluntary principle is supreme, having produced in three years the sum of £3,000, against £510 in the three previous years under the old régime.

As every student of history is aware, at the time of the introduction of Christianity and for a considerable period afterwards, there was a wide diffusion of Oriental religions in Europe. A new evidence of this has just come to light at Bayeux. Among the remains of a triumphal arch of the third century, buried in the foundations of the cathedral, the workmen have found a figure of Mên, the Phœnician Moon-god, bearing on his head the double crescent, and in his hand the mystic pine-cone.

According to the Dean of Ripon (Dr. McNeile) Popery is employing "sappers and miners" all over England, and some of our statesmen are the miserable dupes of Manning and Cullen. An effort is needed to rouse the Protestant feeling of the country; and with a view to this he generously offers, out of his own pocket, £5 for the best essay by a young man, and also £5 for another by a young lady, on the 31st Article—"Of the one Oblation of Christ finished upon the Cross." In spite, however, of the underground work which is going on, the Dean encourages us to hope that we are not in any immediate danger of being blown up by Papal machinations, since a friend of his, who has paid great attention to the subject, has shown that while in 1801 the number of Romanists in the three kingdoms amounted to 34 per cent, the proportion at present is only 17 per cent.

M. Emile de Bonnechese, brother of the Cardinal Archbishop of Rouen, but himself an enlightened Protestant, in the Preface to a new edition of his Histoire Sacrée, gives a deplorable account of the utter ignorance of the Scriptures which characterises French society. People may know the names of the chief Patriarchs, and a few traits of their history, but nothing of what gives to this its significance and value. They know, too, a few circumstances of the life and death of Christ, but are unacquainted with his discourses, and the life of his Church in the time of his disciples. And to this ignorance M. Bonnechese attributes mainly the progress of impiety and materialism among the masses, and the success of that "dissolving style of criticism" which is powerful against the Gospel only by reason of the ignorance of its contents. From hundreds of instances he gives this, which he himself witnessed in one of the richest departments of France. There was a society formed for the propagation of popular education. The chief magistrate of the locality was originally one of its principal members. But he "discovered to his dismay" that "the Gospel was among the works distributed by the Society." From that moment he positively refused to be any longer a participator in such distribution, for fear of "compromising himself," and "being accused of religious propagandism." In a speech delivered by this same functionary on this very subject, "he actually cited a text of Scripture, without having the slightest idea where it came from!"

The Rev. W. H. Milburn, "the blind preacher," and Chaplain of Congress in America, preached at St. James's, Marylebone, two Sundays ago. He ascended the pulpit slowly, but from his manner of conducting the service it would scarcely have been detected that he had not the use of his sight. He is tall, with a large black beard and moustache; his sermon was that of a scholar, well composed and well delivered.

An influential committee has been formed at Leicester for the erection there of a memorial to Robert Hall. The form which it is proposed that it shall take, is a colossal statue of the distinguished preacher, and it has been determined that the cost shall not exceed £1,200.

At the quarterly meeting of the London Baptist Association, Mr. Spurgeon said, there were about 270 Baptist churches in the metropolis, 60 or 70 of whom were much higher in doctrine and lower in usefulness than they would like to accept as a representation of their position. Some of the churches were extremely weak and struggling for existence. Their united membership could not exceed 30,000, and would probably fall somewhat below that number. It was a source of regret, too, that the London churches were burdened with a debt of £40,000.

The Weekly Register (Roman Catholic) tells us that "a considerable number" of Anglican clergymen have determined to attend the forthcoming "General Council" at Rome, in order "to lay their difficulties before the assembled prelates of the Universal Church." Their "earnest desire," it seems, is to be united to Rome, but their chief difficulty is that they have perfect faith in the validity of their orders, and believe that it would be sacrilege either to submit to re-ordination or to revert to the position of laymen. A special committee has been appointed at Rome to deal with the subject of Anglican orders, and our contemporary has no doubt that the reverend pilgrims will have all their doubts set at rest. As the ultimate result of this mission to Rome, the Register anticipates that there will be "an accession to the Church of some of the best and most pious Anglican clergy, and many amongst the laity will follow their example."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In an article on the Œcumenical, the Civiltà Cattolica, the organ of the Jesuits, and therefore of the Pope, after insisting that "the convocation of a Council can belong only to the Pontiff," and describing the moral power of one at whose invitation so many distinguished persons will come from all quarters of the globe to do him homage, adds:

"They recognise him as father, pastor, master, guide, in everything infallible, and to him they subject their intellect, their will, their words, their acts, even themselves. They protest (as was seen in a solemn act recently signed by 500 bishops assembled in Rome) to believe what he believes, to feel what he feels, to speak as he speaks, to reject what he rejects, to not willingly deviate one iota from what he shall be pleased to prescribe," &c.

If such is really the case, one hardly sees why his Holiness should put bishops and others to the trouble and expense of a journey to Rome. As all questions discussed will ultimately be submitted to his approval or rejection, as "in everything infallible," Pius IX. will in reality be the Council, and might just as well decide at once the matters which it is called to determine.

The able Paris correspondent of the Guardian says that an intelligent Spanish friend of his, who is a good but liberal Catholic, insists that it is an absurdity to suppose that there is any other religious faith among his countrymen than that of the Church of Rome:

"All Spaniards, he maintains, who have any religion at all, are Romanists; the rest are either rationalists or infidels. The latter profess, indeed, he says, sometimes to be 'Protestant'; but they hardly know the meaning of the term, and do so only out of opposition to the clerical party. Out of the same feeling they would attempt to compel the Government to build them churches or chapels, under pretence of affording them 'liberty of public worship'; whereas in reality they are Gallios who 'care for none of these things,' and would never make use of them; while such action would only exasperate the bigotry of the masses, make them disaffected to the new order of things, and more open to the excitements of the priesthood. A simple declaration of religious toleration seems to be all that the present state of Spain either requires or admits of, without any direct encouragement to a departure from the national faith."

At a meeting of the West Riding Congregational Union, the week before last, the Rev. Enoch Mellor, the President, in his opening address, strongly affirmed the principle that there was no distinction in the Apostolic age, between communicants and an inner circle called the church. The English Independent, however, declares that "Independence had no raison d'être, no cause or title of existence apart from the special doctrine which it teaches, and practises," and adds some remarks which, if they have any force whatever, would lead to the conclusion that it is good that men should feel so assured of the absolute truth of their views as to band themselves together in such a way as to shut out from their little circle every ray of fresh light which might lead to any doctrinal change:

"It is thought that this dissolution of the church into the congregation is a novel procedure. No. It has been often tried. The consequences have been invariable, and we must be blind to myriad beacons that glare from perilous rocks, if we rush again upon them to the destruction, not of our churches merely, but of our Christianity. What caused the uniform declension of the Presbyterian churches of the seventeenth century into Unitarianism? Their simple and solitary cause. The choice of the officers and the consequent regulation of the service in those churches was given to the congregation. Every one of these congregations realised this new dream of church reform, which is church annihilation. No one of them controlled or led the other. Yet existing separately, acting independently, one by one these congregations, with scarce any exceptions, fell through Arianism, carefully concealed at first, into Unitarianism. And now, in our day, we see the majority of them lapsing into deeper denial of Christian truth. What churches preserved the light of a 'true faith' through the deadening darkness which clouded England through the first half of the last century? Those—and, we might add, only those—that held by the anchor truth of the Church as a company of men and women who publicly professed their faith in Jesus Christ, and entered into open and avowed relationship with each other to fulfil the vows which their faith imposes."

In a masterly speech in the Cortes, which has produced an immense impression throughout Spain, Signor Castelar, replying to a grandiloquent oration of Canon Monterola, said:

"It was an error, the gravest of errors, to ask in the name of moral and religious ideas, as Senor Monterola had been asking, the coercive force and the material aid of the State. If we believed in religion, the voice of our own conscience was sufficient to make us follow its precepts. If we did not believe in it, the protection of the State was highly injurious, as it obliged us to be hypocrites and to make professions with our lips which we had not in our hearts. Religion might then be the means of helping us to deceive our fellow-men, but we could never deceive God—God who penetrates to the depth of the will and of the conscience. There had been two ideas which never succeeded yet in the world—one religion for all and one nation for all. Various illustrious Pontiffs tried from time to time to accomplish the first, but failed. Alexander, Caesar, Charlemagne, Charles V., and Napoleon tried to accomplish the second, and likewise failed. The idea of variety conquered the conquerors. The variety of consciences conquered the pontiffs, and the variety of peoples conquered the warriors."

In the Sword and Trowel for this month, we have this description of Savonarola's preaching:

"It must have been a strange sight to see the spare, haggard form of this pale-faced, keen-eyed, Roman-nosed monk exciting the crowd of listeners, and overpowering them with his vigorous eloquence. There was nothing in his voice to allure attention. It was thin and weak. Nor was there anything in his manner, for he was unpractised in speaking. But his words carried weight, and each had a flaming fire-dart which pierced its way, and carried conviction. His denunciation of the paganism of Florence, and the gross abominations of the church, stirred the city to its depths. The friar's popularity grew and spread like living fire. Men listened and shuddered. Priests heard, trembled, and hated. The people grew enthusiastic. His extraordinary faithfulness in rebuking those current sins of the wealthy to which they thought they had a prescriptive right; his personal form of address, without which no minister or reformer can hope to be successful in soul-winning; his clear evangelic utterances as to the natural state of the soul, its need of redemption, and the suitability of the free Gospel of God's grace to meet that need, told upon the people. They wept. They were silenced. Men who took down the discourses were known to drop the pens from their hands. Country people walked miles to hear the great preacher; came, indeed, the night before the Sunday, and besieged the church doors at early morn, that they might be sure of a seat. Rich burghers gave them victuals, and even acted as door-keepers. The convent church was too small; nor could the cathedral accommodate more than the three thousand persons who flocked to hear the friar."

The Rev. John Hunt, having been taken to task by Archdeacon Allen for his articles in the Contemporary Review on Bolingbroke and other free thinkers, justifies himself for bringing up again the "forgotten rubbish of the times of George I. and George II.," as the Archdeacon terms it, and concludes his reply thus sarcastically:

"Mrs. Hardcastle said of her son, Tony Lumpkin, that the poor boy had not yet come to years of discretion and his stepfather answered that he never would. With Mr. Allen, 'years of discretion' are, I suppose, over and gone. I do not doubt his capacity for the duties of an Archdeacon, which is, I believe, to look after fees and fabrics. He is also, I daresay, competent to perplex a St. Bees' student with a question in vulgar fractions, or to hunt up the antecedents of some supposed editor of the Record; but when he ventures upon the sacred domain of religious thought I am bound to tell him that this is holy ground, and to warn him off as a profane intruder. My papers on the Deists will probably be succeeded by another series in a kindred department. I invite criticism, and shall be thankful to any one who will help me in penetrating to the light; but as to what may be the judgment of Archdeacon Allen, I say, as Uncle Toby did to Tristram Shandy, 'I would not give a halfpenny to know.'"

Mr. Matthew Arnold, having been directed by the Privy Council to visit the Congregational Training College, Schools, and Board of Education at Homerton, to ascertain whether they were in such a state as to justify the Council Office in granting them assistance, has, according to the Guardian, "discovered a denomination; and has just failed—only because it was impossible to find what was non-existent—in discovering a creed." This denomination is "properly Evangelical." But our High Church contemporary is at a loss to know what that means, except that "its schools are not merely for Anglicans or Wesleyans, and that it excludes Roman Catholics and Socinians." "To the title of Evangelical, etymologically considered, Socinians and Roman Catholics lay claim quite as strongly as Independents," and the Guardian "fails to see how the trust-deed of the proposed Evangelical Schools could be so framed as to secure them from the admission of teachers holding the most extreme latitudinarian views." "History tells us that Congregationalism, Presbyterianism, and Unitarianism have had very intimate relations and mutual transformations in this country; and it is but natural that we should ask for some definite guarantee that 'Evangelical,' when written over the door of a school, shall mean something like what we intend by the word. Unless Homerton can give a definite answer to this demand, we prefer to leave Mr. Arnold's discovery among the other brilliant, but not always distinctly serviceable, descriptions which we owe to his cultivated pen."

The Echo considers that it was a tolerably long stretch of the pastoral crook for Cardinal Cullen to prevent the attendance of the faithful at the recent Freemasons' Ball in Dublin on pain of excommunication. The sudden order to forbear attendance at an annual festival on pain of eternal condemnation, was, to say the least of it, "coming it strong" on the part of the Archbishop. So sudden was it, that nearly 100 Roman Catholics had actually bought their tickets for the ball before the fulmination came forth, and piteously rushed, on its issue, to entreat for the restoration of their money—a grace which, we are told, was cruelly denied. Let us trust that it will be counted to them for an "indulgence." But this is not all. The great Lord Cardinal not only banned the ball-goers, but also the unlucky cabmen who should convey them to the ball. Everybody was to be excommunicated who took anybody else to the forbidden precincts. Col. Lake, the chief of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, seems, however, to have considered that even the authority of Holy Church should stop short of regulating cab-stands; and accordingly notified that he would deprive the driver of any cab or car of his badge who should refuse to carry a fare to the Freemasons' Ball. The threat proved effective. The cabmen have kept their badges; and may the great Lord Cardinal ("Paddy Wolsey," as some wag has named him) have mercy on their souls! Are we not reminded by all this of Ingoldsby's story of another Cardinal's excommunication of the Jackdaw of Rheims?—

"He cursed him living, he cursed him dying,
He cursed him in walking, in riding, in flying;
Never was heard such a terrible curse!
But what gave rise to no little surprise,
Nobody seemed one penny the worse!"

As in connection with the Irish Church question a good deal of nonsense has been talked, and no doubt will continue to be talked, respecting the coronation oath, by which the Queen bound herself to preserve to the established churches "all such rights and privileges as by law do or shall appertain to them," it may be well to put the matter clearly, as is done by the Times in the following remarks:

"Considering that the Sovereign is constitutionally, and two centuries ago was, in fact, the executive power of the country, checked, rather than controlled, by Parliament, and able to go great lengths against the national will, we cannot but see in the words of the oath a promise exacted from the Sovereign that she will not use her constitutional authority to nullify or defeat the law. She must not exercise her ecclesiastical supremacy, for instance, to introduce unworthy men or enemies of the Church into its highest offices. She must not belong to the Roman Catholic religion, nor plot with its priests the overthrow of the Church of which she is the legal guardian. But that the Queen should not be capable of acting in concert with her Parliament ought never, as it seems to us, to suggest itself to anyone who considers the terms of the oath. What she has to maintain is simply that which has been established and which exists 'by law.' If the proper course be taken to annul that condition, and to procure that the institution shall no longer be established by law, then her obligation to maintain it ceases. The oath is imposed on the Sovereign by her subjects, and the present Parliament is the successor of the Parliament or Convention of 1689, which framed it. It must be in the power of those who imposed the oath to remit it—a proposition which Somers thought too evident to need argument."

At a meeting of the Liberation Society in Manchester, last Tuesday, Mr. H. Sandwith, of Kars, said:

"He maintained that the religion of no majority, however great, had any right to be established, and call itself the religion of the nation. His idea was a free church in a free state. But what was our State religion? Was it the religion of Dr. Pusey, which some call Romanism? Was it the religion of Dean Close, which some might call Puritanism? Or was it the religion of Dr. Colenso, which some call rationalism? If we really had a true State religion, foreigners would be able to tell pretty well what that religion was. This reminded him of a story of a Jew at Bagdad, who had ample opportunities of seeing and judging of what the State religion of Great Britain was, and who thought he had nothing to do but to be converted to that State religion to enjoy the privileges which Englishmen enjoyed. He presented himself to the English Consul, and said he had become a member of the English religion; and when asked to explain the principles of the English religion, he said, 'Well, I eat pig, and I do not believe in God.'"

In a lecture last week at Cheltenham, which seems to have been received with great applause by the Low Churchmen present and with hooting and hissing by the High, the Rev. F. S. Cook, after finding a true picture of Ritualism in the account of the fashioning of the golden calf in the 32nd chapter of Exodus, discovered its "roots" to be, first, a reaction against the negligence of the past, which had issued in dusty pews, bare walls, and bad singing; next, the zeal of the Ritualists, which was great, though without knowledge; and, thirdly, their entire ignorance of the word of God, which led them to talk about sacrifices as ignorantly as schoolboys. After referring to their various costumes, he said many children had been heard to remark that their parents would not let them go to the theatre, because they would be able to hear the same singers on the Sunday at church; and empty-headed boys and girls were deluded to this show. Many men, who had but little brains, if they went to an ecclesiastical milliner, and got attired in the Ritualistic costumes, found themselves admired; and so pride was a fourth conspicuous root of Ritualism. Its "fruits" would be alienation of the Church from Protestantism, confusion, and the deceiving of souls.

REVIEWS.

The Prospect of Eternity. A Sermon by the late Dr. Barham. Newton Abbot: J. Pascoe.

A TOUCHING interest attaches to this Discourse as the last earthly utterance of a pure and noble mind. On Wednesday, March 3rd, the writer had prepared it for the following Sunday morning service at the Free Christian Church, Newton Abbot, and within an hour after he was called away from the scenes of time to those, which in the spirit of Christian faith he had been reverently contemplating, of eternity. "Not presumptuously attempting to lift the veil" which hides these from mortal sight, he had written, so shortly before! "here, then, let us dwell awhile in trustful humility, watching cheerfully while the night still lingers, till the day shall dawn, and the day-star arise on our souls. But meanwhile we shall not be blamed if we employ some thoughts in musing quietly and soberly on the good things which are in prospect, and which we hope, by the mercy of God, to find in the land to which we are travelling." The thoughts so employed lead to anticipations, simply yet beautifully expressed, of a kind which are well fitted to have the effect he desired of enabling not only those whom it was the writer's special aim to benefit, but all into whose hands his sermon comes, "to go more cheerfully and lightly, as well as more trustfully and piously, along such portion as may yet remain to them of their pilgrimage of life."

The perusal of this discourse has done much to strengthen the wish we have long felt that more of our cultivated and religious laymen would follow the example which Dr. Barham, and Mr. Brown of Barnard Castle, have set them, and use their gifts in recommending from the pulpit the great truths entrusted to their keeping. These coming freshly and earnestly from their lips would often be listened to with interest in quarters where, spoken by a regular minister, they would excite hardly any attention, as being merely something required to satisfy the demands of professional duty. Well would it be for all of us, did we more truly enter into the spirit which led the former of these two excellent men, almost in his last moments, to write; "so we must not cease to be watchful at our post, and faithful in every duty, till the summons of the Master shall give us our discharge. A few more days of watching and praying, and perhaps, of suffering, and the hour of rest will come—only endure to the end! 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life,' 'He that shall come, will come and will not tarry.' That cannot be long. Perhaps it is nigh; even at the doors!"

The New Affinities of Faith; a Plea for Free Christian Union. By James Martineau. Williams and Norgate. 1869.

No plea is needed for free Christian union; nor are we aware of any new affinities of faith having been developed or discovered the last thirty years which make the visible union of free Christian minds more easy or necessary than before. Always good practical Christians have felt that the sectarian divisions of the church are needlessly numerous in this free Protestant country and some others; that their fundamental agreements are more important than their divisions, and that those divisions are founded far too much upon mere doctrinal or opinionative distinctions, often of a very trivial kind. For this, the old idea of necessary orthodoxy and of salvation by the true faith is altogether responsible. And such is the power of mere habit and adhesion of sects—joined to that of prejudice, prescription, and fashion,—that a denomination founded two hundred years ago on the principle of freedom of belief and disowning ever since the penal idea of orthodoxy, is looked upon by the general religious world as equally sectarian with all the rest, and is more shunned for its free theology derived from its principle of "free Christian union," than any other for the most anti-social or irrational beliefs.

Some of us have flattered ourselves that the world was becoming rife for something better. The Independents have softened their creed; the Broad Church explains its articles away without daring to alter them; and to some good men it has seemed credible that a visible Christian union of men of all beliefs might be formed. With this view The Free Christian Union was launched about two years ago, with little acceptance beyond a small section of Unitarians. It seemed too Deistical for Christians and too Christian for Deists; and was destitute of practical plan and aim. The world heard little more of it, and it was generally thought to be defunct. A quiet benediction was uttered over its impracticable aims; and the Unitarian Association which had amiably responded to its demand to stand aside from the ground of congregational aggregation (which the new Union alone had any right to attempt), has failed to see its operations more successfully attempted elsewhere.

Mr. Martineau's pamphlet undecives us as to the relinquishment, though not as to the failure, of the free Christian union. It seems to be designed as one of a series of new Tracts for the times, to be devoted to this subject, and contains (on the obverse cover) the names of the officers of the society so designated. But we look through it in vain for further explanations of the plans, or new proofs of the aptitude of such an organisation for any practical usefulness. Of its sixteen officers thirteen or fourteen are, we believe, Unitarians. No Dean Stanley, no F. D. Maurice, no S. Davidson, no Kegan Paul, no Rowland Williams, no W. Kirkus, nor any Miall, but W.; not one of the seven Essayist and Reviewers; not even Colenso, gives his name to this comprehensive and free scheme. We wish it were, or could be, otherwise; but we must see things as they are. Mr. Martineau himself explains the fact over and over again. "Language, consecrated by ancient piety and turned into music by tender and solemn memories, ceases to report distinctly to the mind its quality of truth or falsehood, and procures indulgence for prayers and propositions from which, if fresh, the same intelligence would at once recoil. Hence it is that amid vast theological movements there is no corresponding amount of ecclesiastical change; and that the statistics and creeds of sects do not faithfully represent the inward condition of our Christendom." With severity and bitterness (perhaps not consciously felt) he says: "It is no longer an insult to a clergyman's honour, but rather a compliment to his intelligence, to suspect him of saying one thing and believing another; while the layman, who needs say nothing, uses a right of reticence which no earnest conviction ever claimed." How he can, in the same pages say that "theological groups are breaking up, not simply by disintegration from within, but by an unexpected plan of mutual attractions;" how he can speak of a "tendency to fusion and adjustment," and represent the men of new affinities as "ready for a religious fellowship not based upon doctrinal conditions," it is difficult to understand. They are ready for everything but this; they will use, perhaps assert, their right to explain away their own church articles; they will talk liberally in select and intelligent society, and scientifically among scientific men; they will join the world's Free Christian Church of benevolent and political activity; but to make "a corresponding amount of ecclesiastical change" is precisely what they will not do; perhaps not till the English church shall suffer the fate impending over the Irish.

The preamble of the society (quoted in these pages) states that "Whereas, for ages past, Christians have been taught that correct conceptions of divine things are necessary to acceptance with God, &c. . . . This society desires a spiritual fellowship," &c. Now this preamble describes correctly enough the orthodox assumption, but very strangely includes in the same universal charge those whose church basis has been the very opposite, and who (framers of the document) by this voluntary self-humiliation seek to attract others to the very basis on which their own churches have for ages been founded. And how is the preamble to be realised? One practical suggestion alone tending to this end is contained in the pamphlet. The supporters of the Free Christian Union "have provided no place in their scheme for the training or the employment of a clerical order, for any separate institutions, rites, or worship; and the only pulpit which they have proposed to raise was to be served by occasional preachers stepping out for the day from their own denomination and returning to it again." Does this mean that one pulpit in London, so supplied, is to be the representative of the Free Christian Union? Is this to be a cure for sectarianism? a substitution of the spiritual for the doctrinal Christianity? Would this be a new expression of new affinities of faith? Or is not exchange of pulpits, within the range of Christian sympathy and trust, an old established expression of old religious affinity? True, it must be also within the range of ecclesiastical law and church deacon approval. And these conditions will keep the Broad Churchmen at least out of the Free Church pulpit. Within these limits we can do what is suggested any day; and we do it on various occasions, which one would wish to see more numerous. The one pulpit proposed in London will not make our little mutual civilities beyond it less important than hitherto; nor (we fear) materially strengthen the old affinities (we call them the old affinities) of faith.

THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL.

In the article on "France and the Œcumenical Council," in the British Quarterly, of which we gave the outline last week, and which is understood to be by M. de Pressensé, the writer says:

"Its wheels will have to work in an absolute vacuum, for as to any decrees that it may make touching the political relations of religion, it is all but idle talk. The Council is simply a coup d'eglise of the Ultramontanists. It is a Jesuit plot; and the audacious men who take the lead in it reckon before everything to make use of it against the Liberals. It is not modern impiety that they trouble themselves about, for they know perfectly well that its abettors but mock at their anathemas; it is the liberal tendency in the bosom of their own Church which engrosses their energies; it is this which they hope to crush. Possibly they may succeed; only that which they thus think to destroy may perhaps burst its bonds, and be marshalled once more outside the narrow limits within which they had thought to stifle it. There is their supreme danger. Two recent publications, which now lie before us, bring out the gravity of this position of affairs more forcibly than anything we have stated. Both of these refer to the forthcoming council. One is a letter on the future Œcumenical Council by the Bishop of Orleans. 'This is a hymn of hope, and brings to mind—shall we say it?—the timid boy who whistled as he crossed the churchyard to keep his courage up. . . . We believe that the convocation of this council is a part of that conspiracy, and that one object of it, which is fully decided on, is to formulate into dogmas the temporal power, the entire negation of liberty of conscience, and all the other fine things that are taught and practised at Rome. Our anxieties, therefore, are all alive with respect to the results of this celebrated and dangerous council, and we do not stand alone; witness the second publication to which we have referred, which has but just issued from the pen of M. Arnaud de l'Ariège, and is entitled 'La Révélation et l'Eglise.' In it the author clearly develops his views as to the impossibility of harmonising Christianity with modern society, so long as the Church remains a political establishment united to the State. He shows that this confusion of things essentially different was the destructive characteristic of Paganism, which ignored the rights of conscience because it knew nothing of the true God. In our days it compromises everything, deteriorates everything, and by enlisting religion in the service of absolutism renders it distasteful to every generous nature. These grand ideas are developed from reason and history with rare vigour and force of language. The author does not hesitate to denounce the miserable policy of the Court of Rome, especially on the eve of the council. . . . Will this courageous note of warning be regarded? In a few months we shall see. If the council proves to be what all the preceding circumstances would lead us to fear, if it sanctions the adoption of the Syllabus, if it officially and dogmatically confirms the rupture between Rome and modern society, it will be responsible before God and men for the aggravated unbelief which it will provoke wherever Catholicism is regarded as the representative of Christianity. The fearful crisis which will alienate the minds of men from the Gospel, and in fact from the very idea of God, will be precipitated with a violence surpassing anything that we have hitherto seen. But the crisis within the Catholic Church will not be less serious. Possibly the votaries of Rome may succeed in concealing it for a time; perhaps many of the more liberal-minded among them may have the courage to fight against it; nevertheless, it can not be avoided. The unhesitating and unqualified condemnation of a tendency whose roots are deep and far-reaching, which is not the accident of the moment, but which is connected with a long series of events in the past, will bring, sooner or later, a rupture which will be hastened by the disappearance of the fiction of endowed religions. It will introduce an epoch of trouble and anxiety, but at the same time of agitation that shall be fruitful of good results. Catholicism, itself, reformed, shall bring its tribute to the great religious movement which is going on all over the world, and to which no one church by itself is equal; if, on the contrary, liberal Catholicism is crushed and extirpated, there will ever long remain nothing of the great Roman Church but a lifeless corpse ready to vanish away.'

DOING GOOD FOR DOING GOOD'S SAKE.

A GREAT deal of what passes for doing good in the churches accomplishes very little. There is a great deal of professedly beneficent activity in society, of one sort or another, but any one who looks closely into the matter is obliged to own that very little comes of it. This is peculiarly an age of philanthropic associations and organisations, and yet who is there who does not feel that the result is profoundly unsatisfactory? Why is this? We believe that to a large extent the poverty of the result arises from the poverty of the motive. Comparatively little of what passes for doing good is done really for the good's sake. To a large extent it is doing good with a view to the benefit of the doers. We do not refer so much to the coarser forms of self-regarding beneficence. The evil of subscribing to benevolent objects for the sake of getting a charitable name, and winning the praise of one's society or one's church, is too palpable to need any rebuke of ours. We allude to those subtler forms of selfishness which lead men to engage in works of apparent usefulness with a side-view to their own moral and spiritual benefit, or from a half-conscious desire to feel self-satisfied. We fancy that a good deal of the work which is done in our Sunday-schools is of this kind. Young people are pressed by their parents to take a part, on the ground that it will do them good to engage in such works. Or, they hear appeals from the pulpit pointing out the wrongfulness of life passed in mere devotion to business and pleasure, and they think they shall feel easier in their minds if they undertake a class or a district. Now, when people want to help in anything you are doing, it is not well to scrutinise their motives too closely. Many a one begins a good work from an imperfect motive, and gradually catches the better spirit of the work itself. We would, therefore, never refuse help because we thought that it was offered from such motives as these, but none the less is it true that these are not the motives which will ever accomplish any deep and really beneficent work. To grapple with want, and ignorance, and sin—to lift up the degraded—to overcome the apathy of worldliness—to minister to physical poverty and misery without destroying the spirit of self dependence—the tasks which wait for Christian men and women in all times, are just the hardest works that the world has to show, and they will yield to nothing but the spirit of a love not only self-sacrificing, but self-forgetful.

The same thing is true of the associated activities which are put forth by a congregation. We have sad experience of this in our churches. Everyone familiar with our congregational life must own that there seems to be a curious clumsiness among us in carrying out any impulses to benevolence and Christian work. Our congregations, many of them have a large number of what are called connected institutions and these make a fair show in their annual reports, and generally are very successful in getting up tea-parties; but it must be confessed that the amount of solid work which is the outcome of them is painfully small. We do not say this as a matter of blame to any one. The fact is that as a body of Christians we are only feeling our way into the great work, the need for which has developed with such fearful rapidity amidst the huge and ever-changing populations of our modern civilisation. We have a vague sense of much being needed, but we hardly know what. Is not the real source of inefficiency, this;—that there is too much ecclesiastical self-consciousness in our activity? It is too often our own condition that presses upon us, not the condition of the world around. We shrink from the reproach of idleness, and make spasmodic efforts to do something. We hear of institutions that are flourishing in one place, of plans that are working well in another, and straightway something of the kind must be started where we are. Tokens of this restless desire to be doing something are constantly under our notice. People want to feel that the congregation that they belong to is an active one, and they are apt to catch at any new scheme which seems likely to engage workers. Now there is a radical mistake in all this. Mere imitative activities are never of any use. Mere multiplication of agencies for the sake of having more doing is poor and profitless. The needs of society are infinitely varied, and no method of action can be drawn up which will produce the same effect with different workers and in different places. The great thing that is needed is to look round in the world with that spirit of loving desire for human wellbeing, in every way, which will be deeply struck and saddened by all that is amiss in human life, and earnestly desire to do something to mend it. Any work that is to do real good must be started on the compelling urgency of some sore human need outside of ourselves. It is that love—it is that sense of need—it is that losing of one's self in the deep desire to help a fellow-creature, which alone can overcome the strong forces of evil.

CONVENT LIFE.

THE Christian World Magazine offers the following warning to all whom it may concern:

Convent life is unnatural; we cannot therefore expect it to be very different from what it is. It is well that it should be denuded of some of its fine trappings, that it should be stripped of its romance—the romance with which foolish women have ever invested it, especially when they have been unhappy at home, tired of an aimless life, or as people say “crossed in love.” Disappointed affections have led many a weak girl to the cloister. Instead of trusting God's goodness, and waiting to see what good things He had in store for her, she rushed away to find “a living grave on earth,” and she has had too late to cry—

And yet they told me that all rest is here;
Within these convent walls the medicine and the cheer

For broken hearts, that all without
Was trembling, weariness, and doubt;
This the sure ark which floats about the wave,
Strong in life's flood to shelter and to save.

Ah, me, it is not so;
This is not rest, I know.

This is not love!
And yet they told me that all love was here,
Sweetening the silent atmosphere;
All given, without a faded leaf;
All smooth, without a fret, or cross, or grief:
No balm like convent air,
No lives of Paradise so fair!

A jealous, peevish, hating world beyond;
Within, love's loveliest bond:
Envy and discord in the haunts of men,
Here—Eden's harmony again,

Ah, me, it is not so;
Here is no love, I know!”

AMERICAN NOTES.

It seems that even in America there are some who are taken with the idea that it is proper for a Christian nation to have a national religion, and an association has been formed in Ohio, composed chiefly of Presbyterian ministers, to procure the incorporation of a confession of faith in the Constitution of the States. The New York Independent thus disposes of the measure:

“It would not constitute any man a Christian who is not one now. It would not add to the authority of the Christian religion. It would not show that a majority or any other specified proportion of the people are real Christians. It would not bind the conscience or control the faith or conduct of those who are not Christians. Nor would it curtail the civil rights of those non-Christians, save by a palpable injustice. Let us do all we can, as individuals, to bring other individuals to accept the Gospel as their rule of life. In exact proportion as we succeed in this we shall bring all the acts and all the influence of the National Government into conformity with the laws of Christ, which is the thing we really want.”

The Liberal Christian mentions an occurrence at San Jose, California, which illustrates at once the growth of liberal sentiments there and the spirit of the old Orthodoxy. The Rev. Mr. Hamilton, of the Presbyterian Church, had ceased to believe in the doctrine of everlasting punishment, and there being some murmuring on account of his theological unsoundness, he asked permission to resign. This request was refused, because it was held imperative for a Presbytery to prefer charges against a minister, when by common repute he was not sound in the faith; and his enemies were unwilling to let him depart without fixing upon him a brand which would impair his future usefulness and reflect upon his character as a man and a Christian. Mr. Hamilton appealed to the Presbytery to let him go, but his appeal was ruled out of order. He then unconditionally withdrew from the Presbytery, bidding them be careful how they trifled with his character or tarnished his reputation. He then walked out of the church, and, as by instinctive sympathy with him and his cause, the entire congregation rose and followed him, leaving the Presbytery alone in its glory.

In a recent lecture on “Theodore Parker,” the Rev. O. B. Frothingham said:

“Parker is called a destructive, and so he was, as Luther was a destructive, or Wickcliffe, or Channing. He who replaces an old building by a new one, must destroy the old, and if he dies before the ground he has filled up with rubbish is covered with the more beautiful temple, he is known only as a destructive, however fair the plans his brain had conceived. Parker said of himself, ‘I was born to thunder and lighten and break things down to the ground.’ But he also said, ‘The religion I am working at will be the faith of the next thousand years.’ He was a pioneer, and a pioneer makes clearings not parks, a hut not a palace, a barn not a cathedral. Was it nothing to have made the clearing on the very spot where the future temple must rise? Was it nothing to have erected a hut of sound timber large enough for all who needed shelter? Was it nothing to have turned a secular room into a cathedral, or to have sprung the pillars of eternity over the workshop? When the temple of a national faith shall be built, it will rise on the same spot, it will be constructed of those same materials that he used, and it will inclose that structure within the noble walls. Had Parker lived to see slavery abolished, and the curse of bigotry abated, had he lived to enjoy those quiet years he hoped for, his armour put off, his sword by, he would himself have placed some courses of those grand walls within which the coming generations shall worship.”

According to a New York correspondent of the Scotsman, Mr. Laurence Oliphant, formerly member for Stirling, has joined “a religious scholastic community,” consisting of 200 persons, in the western part of that State, near Lake Erie. This community, we are told, was established two years ago by Mr. T. L. Harris, formerly secretary of the United States legation in Japan. He purchased several farms, and gathered together a colony of 25 families, “who were agreed that the old apostolic plan was best, where the multitude who believed were of one heart and of one soul, and had all things in common”—except their wives and children. The association is formed “upon the principle of spiritual affinity, upon which principle communities exist in Heaven;” and “the cultivation of the land is held subordinate to this idea,” so that more is thought of “a holy life and conversation” than a well-ploughed field or a carefully tended crop. Nevertheless, the main chance is looked after, and not only are “former social distinctions merged into one common brotherhood,” but “every man takes his shovel and his hoe, his sickle and his pruning hook, and works with a will.” The result is that a little paradise is springing up. It seems that during Mr. Harris's residence in Japan, Mr. Oliphant was also there as secretary to the British legation; and that the American diplomatist converted the Englishman, so that, when the community was established, he hastened to cast in his lot with it. Though “all social distinctions” in the community are abolished, still it appears that some special honour is paid to the “ex-English legislator,” since he is not only “the cashier and business agent of the community,” but “close by the bluff of the lake an elegant cottage has been erected for the residence of Mr. Oliphant and his family,” in which abode “everything is plain, neat, and beautiful, without affectation, and indicates the controlling hand of the Christian English lady.”

The subject of ministers' salaries is engaging attention in the States as well as here. The Nation, one of the best American papers, says:

“Ministers of real power, who are animated by a high sense of duty, know and feel how much they are cramped in mind and hindered in their work by want of a proper pecuniary support. The consequence is, that hundreds and thousands of them pass their lives in what is, to a man who takes just views of life, the saddest of all positions—that of a labourer who has undertaken to do work which, through no fault of his own, he finds he cannot do well, or cannot do at all. Seeing this, it is no wonder that the best young men avoid the profession, or only enter it in small numbers. The remedy will come when the well-to-do Christians who compose their congregations make the demand for ministers and missionaries effective, by offering to set apart a larger portion of their own gains for the use of those whom they ask to help them in solving the great problems of existence. The argument that ministers ought not to want more money, and therefore do not need it, is an argument which one meets with frequently, both in political and social discussion; but the proper field for its use is the nursery. Ministers are men, and you cannot make anything but men of them by any course of training. That the Catholic Church does not suffer from this difficulty, does not affect our position. Priests have neither wives nor children; and it is human to be willing to take less pay for an office in which you exercise the power of forgiving or retaining sins, are confessed to as the representative of the Almighty, and meet a congregation as its spiritual master, than for an office in which your business is simply to teach, and perhaps bear as much unmannerly and ignorant criticism as the constitution of a sedentary man can stand."

BISHOP ATTERBURY A SCEPTIC.

DR. MATY, in his edition of Lord Chesterfield's Miscellaneous Works, says:

"The following anecdote was often mentioned by Lord Chesterfield; and I shall, to the best of my remembrance, give it in his own words. 'I went to Mr. Pope one morning at Twickenham, and found a large folio Bible, with gilt clasps, lying before him upon his table; and, as I knew his way of thinking upon that book, I asked him jocosely if he was going to write an answer to it.' 'It is a present,' said he, 'or rather, a legacy from my old friend the Bishop of Rochester. I went to take my leave of him yesterday in the Tower, where I saw this Bible upon his table. The bishop said to me, 'My friend Pope, considering your infirmities and my age and exile, it is not likely that we should ever meet again, and therefore I give you this legacy and remember me by it. Take it home with you and let me advise you to abide by it.' 'Does your lordship abide by it yourself?' 'I do.' 'If you do, my lord, it is but lately. May I beg to know what new light or arguments have prevailed with you now to entertain an opinion so contrary to that which you entertained of that book all the former part of your life?' The bishop replied, 'We have not time to talk of these things; but take home the book. I will abide by it, and I recommend you to do so too.'"—(I. 243.)

Critics have considered this story alone to be insufficient to rebut the presumptions to be drawn from Atterbury's life-long public professions; but Dr. Maty is strangely corroborated by a MS. note of Dr. Birch's (British Museum, Ayscough Cat. 4326, B 198), dated "Wednesday evening, June 5, 1751."

"Dr. Heberden told me that Lord Bolingbroke had assured him that Bishop Atterbury made no mystery of his infidelity with regard to Christianity, frankly declaring to his lordship very often that he believed nothing of it, and thought that no other man of sense did."

It is well known that Sheffield's epitaph on himself, after the confession of scepticism, originally concluded—

Christum advenoror, Deo confido
Omnipotent, benevolentissimo,
Ens entium miserere mei!

But when, before being inscribed in Westminster Abbey, it was submitted to Atterbury as Dean, he struck out the reference to Christ. His alleged reason was that the word advenoror was not strong enough to be applied to him. But if Atterbury were himself sceptical, the erasure is much more intelligible.

B A C A.

THE Rev. James De Normandie, one of our American brethren, who lately visited Baca, thus writes:—After riding through some valleys of oppressive heat, we came to one suggestive of sweetest rest. Its shady retreats, its rills trickling like tear-drops from the dark-shadowing rocks; its caves, the lurking-places of Bedouins; its sacred memories, make it a place for dreamiest meditation. It is supposed to have suggested the eighty-fourth Psalm, the favourite hymn of the mystics and pietists and perfectionists. "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth, for the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God. Yea, the sparrow hath found an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of Hosts! Blessed is the man whose strength is in Thee, who, passing through the valley of Baca, make it a well. They go from strength to strength, every one of them in Zion appeareth before God. A day in Thy courts is better than a thousand." At last we came to an open space, where another valley meets the one we are in at right angles. Two high peaks stand fronting each other at its entrance, and the plain made by their confluence is the parcel of ground Jacob bought; and, although the gurgling streams are near, he could not trust the strange and hostile Canaanites, and so dug a well for his own flocks. A rude heap of stones marks the spot of the well, now filled up within ten or twelve feet of the surface. There is hardly a doubt that this is the very place commemorated by the conversation with the woman of Samaria; and reverently we sat down by it, for here was the birth-place of the absolute and everlasting religion. If I were to build a world-temple where the discords of Christendom might be stilled, it should not be at Jerusalem, with its mass of tradition, and its grand temple worship; nor at Bethlehem, with its beginning of the faith; nor at Nazareth, with its quiet and untold life; nor yet by Galilee's murmuring waves, with their story of the miracles; but at Jacob's well, still uncovered to the bending sky of love, still open for the spirit-worship, where wearied men could find the hidden spring of everlasting life, and, by the toil of duty and prophecy of love, scatter the questionings of selfishness and the shadow of mortality.

LIBERTY OF OREDIENCE.

(OSCAR CLUTE, in the Liberal Christian.)

THAT the highest freedom comes only as we most implicitly obey, is true of our mental and spiritual relations as well as of our physical relations. There are physical laws, there are also mental and spiritual laws. We are free in body when we obey physical laws; and we are free in mind and spirit when we obey mental and spiritual laws. The only way in which we can acquire a systematic mental culture is by conformity to the laws of the mind. Let an unlettered rustic attempt to grapple with the great problems in any department of knowledge, and he fails because he has not conformed to those laws of the mind which command a careful culture of the mental powers. But with the philosopher it is different. He began in early youth a course of mental culture. He began with things plain and simple, and went on step by step, in accordance with the laws of mind, until he was able to grapple with problems the most abstract and complex. He now finds himself freed from those limitations with which the unlearned are hedged in. He has obeyed the laws of his mental being, and now finds that those laws work for his advancement and happiness. He has freedom from error, from superstition, from bigotry, from all forms of mental slavery.

The same truth holds good in our spiritual life. Every man has a feeling of obligation to do what he thinks is right. He cannot get rid of this feeling. If he disobeys it he is a slave to sorrow and remorse. If he obeys it he is free. Every man feels within him divine longings for all things true and beautiful and good; he has a quenchless thirst for nearer communion with the Infinite Spirit of holiness and love. If he feeds these longings with the truth and beauty and goodness that are all about us in the world of matter and the world of mind, if his thirst leads him to quaff from the rich streams of goodness and love that God sendeth over all His works, then there comes in upon his soul such grand peace as no tongue can tell, and he walks in the glorious liberty of the children of God.

A man who desires to get a well developed physical body gives to that body good food and careful culture. A diet of bran and sawdust will scarcely make him able to wield the axe and the sledge-hammer. So if he would have a noble spirit he must partake of spiritual food, and put his spirit into suitable conditions for its growth. Spiritual food does not consist of dogmas concerning a wrathful God, who consigns to endless woe the beings whom He has brought into life with natures "utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil"; but rather in thoughts of God's goodness and justice, in a sincere desire to make truth and purity manifest in the individual life, in a glad confidence in our human nature, which He has made a little lower than the angels, and crowned with glory and honour. The only condition of the soul which can lead to true growth and freedom is that reverent, profound confidence in truth which shall make us seek it, and accept it when found, even if it runs counter to all that we have held to be sacred. When we obey this law of the spirit we get freedom of the spirit, freedom from sin, from unhappy doubting, from bad thoughts of God and humanity, from that foolish weakness which seeks to put a priest, or a creed, or a book between the soul and God.

So, in all the relations of our being, obedience gives us true liberty. Liberty comes not by annulling, not by transgressing it, not by evading it, but by obeying it. Obedience brings us into harmony with law, into near communion with Him in whom we live and move and have our being, who is the source of all law.

A MALAGASY PRAYER.

THE Christian World, and other papers of the same class, have recently had glowing accounts of the impulse which has been given to Christianity in Madagascar, by the new Queen having inaugurated her reign with the total abolition of idolatry and the nominal adoption of the religion of the missionaries. In the speech which she made at her coronation she said with regard to "praying," as the profession of Christianity is designated:—"This is what I say unto you, below the skies, concerning praying; there is no compulsion and there is no prevention, for God made you." Her majesty seems at least to understand the principle of religious liberty as well as some nearer home; and judging from a prayer used by the original inhabitants of the island, as given in the Freethinking Christian's Magazine (ii. 87), we should be inclined to think that, under proper guidance, much might be made of them in the way of true religion. It runs thus:

"Oh, Eternal! have pity on me because I am transitory. Oh, Infinite! because I am but an atom. Oh, Almighty! because I am weak. Oh, Source of Life! because I am drawing near the grave. Oh, Thou who seest all things! because I am in darkness. Oh, All-bounteous! because I am poor. Oh, All-sufficient! because I am nothing."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

FACES IN THE FIRE.

LEWIS CARROLL.

THE night creeps onward, sad and slow;
In these red embers' dying glow
The forms of fancy come and go.

An island-farm—broad seas of corn,
Stirred by the wandering breath of morn—
The happy spot where I was born.

The picture fades in its place;
Amid the glow I seem to trace
The shifting semblance of a face.

'Tis now a little childish form—
Red lips for kisses pouted warm—
And elf-locks tangled in the storm.

'Tis now a grave and gentle maid,
At her own beauty half afraid,
Shrinking, and willing to be stayed.

Oh, time was young, and life was warm,
When first I saw that fairy form,
Her dark hair tossing in the storm.

And fast and free these pulses played,
When last I met that gentle maid—
When last her hand in mine was laid.

Those locks of jet are turned to gray,
And she is strange and far away
That might have been mine own to-day—

That might have been mine own, my dear,
Through many and many a happy year—
That might have sat beside me here.

Ay, changeless through the changing scene,
The ghostly whisper rings between,
The dark refrain of "might have been."

The race is o'er I might have run,
The deeds are past I might have done,
And ere the wreath I might have won.

Sunk in the last faint flickering blaze,
The vision of departed days
Is vanished even as I gaze.

The pictures with their ruddy light
Are changed to dust and ashes white,
And I am left alone with night.

GOOD FRIDAY IN MONACO.

A CORRESPONDENT of the English Independent, who arrived at this little principedom on the afternoon of Good Friday, gives a curious account of the way in which it was being kept, from which we abridge what follows:—The aspect of the place differed little from that of other days. The gambling-house was open, and the rooms were as crowded as usual. On entering the parish church, however, we found it almost in darkness. Every ornament had been removed; the high altar and all the pillars were draped in black cloth, and the windows were covered up to shut out daylight. The church is very large, and contains three or four side chapels. From one of these a faint light glimmered, and showed a few men and women devoutly kneeling in prayer. This chapel, from which the altar and confessional had been taken away, represented the Garden of Gethsemane. Large branches of olives, some eight or ten feet high, had been cut down and planted in it. Palms, cypresses, and long grass, and soft moss, with here and there a small allee, gave it all the appearance of a real garden. The brook Kedron was there, and the domes of Jerusalem were seen in the distance. At the foot of one of the olives were three figures, representing Peter, James, and John asleep; and at some distance from them was Christ himself, in an attitude of prayer, with the cup by his side. The faint light of a lamp was so arranged as to give a kind of moonlight appearance to the scene. The private chapel of the palace, belonging to the Prince of Monaco, was laid out as another garden, that of Joseph of Arimathea; and great taste was displayed in the arrangement of the choice flowering plants and fragrant shrubs. The whole end of the church in front of the altar was occupied by an enormous block of marble, out of which was hewn the new tomb, and a figure representing the body of Christ was lying in it. A third scene was represented in the Church of the Penitents Noirs; but, as the entrance to this building was guarded by two men, dressed as Roman soldiers, with drawn swords, we were unable to see what it was. The few worshippers appeared to belong to that small number of truly pious Catholics to be found in every country; but they took no part in the evening's performance. Later at night the procession commenced, and all the scenes in the passion of our Lord were enacted with a scandalous levity, and the mockery of the whole tragedy became inexpressibly shocking.

At eight o'clock a drum began to beat, and a band of Roman soldiers, headed by a centurion, and a standard-bearer carrying the Roman ensign, and followed by a crowd of men, women, and children, marched up to the palace, and thence through every street of the town; after this all was quiet again for more than an hour. But about ten o'clock the procession started again from the church, and proceeded to the private chapel of the castle. Everybody and everything mentioned in Scripture in connection with the Crucifixion were here imitated, and Christ himself had four or five representatives. Over the first the figure of an angel was carried, presenting him with the bitter cup. The disciples were dressed in white tunics, and crimson scarfs round their waists. Judas was among them, tossing his money-bag in the air, and followed by a rabble with swords and staves. Peter brandished a sword near Malchus, and pretended to cut off his ear; but the healing appeared forgotten, for he walked through the rest of the procession, holding a handkerchief to his head, which had been partially steeped in blood. A large wooden cock figured at the top of a long pole, and was carried by a boy dressed in black. Around this first Christ were a number of little children, dressed as fairies, with wings and crowns, probably meant for the legion of angels. A second Christ followed with his hands tied behind him. Herod, with a crown of gold on his head, and a crimson mantle, covered with stars, on his shoulders, rode on horseback, amidst a troop of Jews and Romans, armed with swords and sticks, and a band of music accompanied him. Then came Caiaphas, the high-priest, Pontius Pilate, washing his hands, Barabbas the robber, &c., each in appropriate costume; and after these a third Christ, bending under the weight of a huge cross, and with him St. John and his lamb and a number of legendary personages, of whom it was difficult to understand the meaning. The most revolting figure of all was a coarse-looking man, who represented Christ with the crown of thorns on his head and the great drops of blood on his face. Nothing could be more painful to witness than this man's efforts to assume an expression of sorrow and suffering, while his companions were joking him on his unsuccessful attempts. He carried a reed in his hand, and the Cyrenian walked by his side bearing a cross. Little children followed him with the hammer, nails, sponge, vinegar, and gall. The three Marys brought up the rear, dressed in deep mourning, and wearing long crape veils. To play the part of one of these Marys is the ambition of every girl in Monaco, it being believed that some great piece of good fortune will happen to one of the three before the next Good Friday comes round. Their part was, of course, to weep behind the cross; but their suppressed laughter between their feigned tears showed that the performance was as much a comedy for them as for their male companions. The actors were lighted by torches, and on leaving the palace, where they remained about a quarter of an hour, they proceeded to parade the streets of Monaco, and finished by returning to the Church of the Penitents Noirs, in which a grave had been prepared, and where at a late hour of the night the burial scene was enacted. Here, I believe, also took place a representation of the Temptation, with Adam and Eve, and the serpent; but we did not get into the building. The crowd was very great, and we had seen enough and more than enough for one night.

It is only just to the Catholic clergy to add that not a single priest took part in the ceremony, that it is universally condemned by them, and that the Bishop of Nice has done all in his power to get it discontinued.

ORIENTAL DRUNKARDS.

FROM M. De Gobineau's book on the "Religions and Philosophies of Central Asia," it seems that the Orientals are as fond of physical as they are of moral intoxication. Drunkenness is, indeed, the radical vice of the Asiatics. In spite of sumptuary laws and the positive prohibitions of the Koran, the immoderate indulgence in fermented liquors is universal. Priests as well as princes, the guardians of church and of state, devote their nights to the was-sail-bowl. Women, too, of all classes, from the ladies of the palace to the girls of the bazaar, have their merry drinking-bouts, which they prolong till after midnight or until the "cold tea," as brandy is euphemistically called, has left them dead drunk on the carpets of the seraglio. It is not because it tickles his palate that the Oriental drinks spirituous liquor; the taste is by no means pleasing to him, and he gulps it down as one would swallow a bitter medicine, with grimaces of disgust. It is the bliss of stupefaction that he seeks, and consequently prefers those beverages which produce this effect in the shortest time. There are multitudes of Persian scholars, famous for erudition, eager for knowledge, and with a keen relish for the most refined intellectual pleasures, who, nevertheless, seldom pass a night without intoxication.

BAPTISTS AND FLOWERS.

A SHORT time since the Freeman having made some sharp remarks on the Rev. T. T. Lynch, of Mornington Chapel, for taking a bunch of flowers into the pulpit one Sunday morning, he thus alluded to the subject in a recent lecture on "John Foster": "Baptists dislike flowers. It took me some time to discover why. At last I hit upon the solution, thus: a flower is a pretty thing that likes to be sprinkled, and Baptists think their babe sought not to be sprinkled. Now the way in which proof was given last year that Baptists dislike flowers will be shown by introducing you to the breakfast table of Mr. Watercress. Mr. Watercress was a most good-natured and respectable man. He and his family were at breakfast. He took up the leading journal of the Baptists, called the Freeman, and he exclaimed, 'Well, what next, I wonder?' Said Mrs. Watercress, 'What is the matter?' 'Why,' said he, 'Here's Mr. Mornington been taking a bunch of flowers into the pulpit and preaching with them in his hand throughout the sermon.' 'What a goose!' says the lady. 'Then she said, 'I wonder whether it was one of those big warming-pan nosegays we sometimes see in the windows.' 'No doubt it was,' said Mr. Watercress, and taking up one of the large breakfast plates, he goes to his parlour door, puts the plate to his breast, and walks in a stately manner to the head of the table to represent the passage of Mr. Mornington from the vestry to the pulpit, with all the little Watercresses laughing. It is quite a pleasant scene. The same evening there were two ladies taking tea together, and having a little talk over their tea, as ladies do sometimes. These were Miss Pepper and her friend Miss Soft. Now Miss Pepper exclaimed, in quite an awful tone, 'Cain redoubts!' which means 'Cain come back again.' 'What do you mean, my dear Miss Pepper?' says Miss Soft, horrified and yet gratified at such an exclamation. 'Why,' said she, 'as if millinery and gold rings were not enough, here has Mr. Mornington been bringing flowers into the very pulpit. Only a Cain would present God an offering of flowers. Oh, I want no rose but the Rose of Sharon.' Then said Miss Soft, looking as wise as an owl, 'I think the less we see of God anywhere else the more we see of him in the Bible.' Now that is the exact reverse of John Foster's principle. His principle was this: the more you see of God in the world the more you see him in the Bible. He was a special lover of flowers, particularly of the minute and retiring ones, because though he was in a real sense great, he felt himself to be a minute, and he was a retiring man."

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. J. Freeston, of Rochdale, has received, and accepted, an invitation to become the minister of the congregation at Blackley, and will enter upon his duties in August next.

BANBRIDGE: ORDINATION.—The Rev. John Miskimmin, who, a month or two ago, completed his course at the Home Missionary Board, having received a unanimous call from the Second Non-subscribing Congregation at Banbridge, was ordained on Tuesday, the 30th of March, by the Presbytery of Antrim. The service was commenced by the Rev. John Porter, followed by the Rev. S. C. Nelson, of Downpatrick, who explained and defended Presbyterian ordination, and the right of the people to choose their own pastors, especially as carried out by the Presbytery of Antrim ever since its formation—now nearly a century and a half ago. He went on to show that the Presbytery had never imposed tests and confessions of faith on their licentiates and ministers, but left them, as well as their congregations, perfectly free to inquire and judge for themselves, and to maintain their own views of divine truth. Although the Presbytery had neither directly nor indirectly interfered in their selection, he felt confident that he might congratulate them on the choice they at length had made. Mr. Miskimmin was sprung from a talented family; he was son of a late valued elder of the Presbytery; and there was every reason to believe that he would prove a devoted and useful minister of the Gospel. Mr. Miskimmin, in repeating his acceptance of the call, made an earnest and admirable statement of his purposes and hopes; and the people having raised their hands in testimony of their adherence to the call, Mr. Nelson offered the ordination prayer, and the choir sang the ordination hymn; after which the members of Presbytery welcomed him with the right hand of Christian fellowship, and with assurance of their advice and aid. The Rev. William Napier, of Clough, then delivered an excellent practical charge to the young minister and his flock, and concluded with prayer. Afterwards the Presbytery were joined by several members of the First Banbridge, as well as by those of the Second Congregation; and a very agreeable evening was spent.

BELFAST: THE DOMESTIC MISSION.—On Tuesday evening the annual meeting was held in the Mission House. There was a large attendance of friends and supporters:—Rev. J. Scott Porter; Michael Andrews, Esq.; John Campbell, Esq.; Andrew McMechan, Esq.; Wm. Spackman, Esq.; Jas. M. Darbshire, Esq.; Herbert Darbshire, Esq.; Rev. John Jellie; Henry Bruce, Esq.; Samuel D. Freud, Esq.; Wm. Shaw, Esq.; Thomas Agnew, Esq.; A. O'D. Taylor, Esq., &c. The Rev. John Scott Porter presided. Mr. James M. Darbshire read the annual report, which showed that the work of the mission has been carried on regularly and satisfactorily during the year. Besides the Missionary's own labours the Ladies' Committee had met monthly; the Evening Sewing Class, under Mrs. Moncrief (the Bible woman), had been conducted weekly with a better attendance than during any previous winter, and the Clothing Society was prosperous. Grateful reference was made to the late Rev. W. Bruce. The treasurer's account (Female Mission) for the half-year ending 31st March last was submitted, from which it appeared there was a balance in hand at that date of £22. 18s. 8½d. The Rev. T. Bowring then read his report, which gave an interesting review of the missionary operations during the year in connexion with the mission. The usual resolutions were then proposed and carried, the Rev. T. Bowring, Rev. John Jellie, Messrs. Michael Andrews, M'Mechan, Campbell, H. Darbshire, Taylor, Bruce, and Spackman taking part in the proceedings, which closed with prayer.

DUNDEE.—"Mr. John Davidson, Writer," of this town, whom we have had occasion before to introduce to the notice of our readers, seems to be growing, if possible, more exceedingly mad against our simple faith; and we cannot help thinking that if his knowledge of the law is no greater than that which he displays of the gospel, his clients must fare badly at his hands. In one of his recent letters to the Dundee Courier, these are a few of the choice things which his Christian humility and charity lead him to utter against a form of belief which was that of Milton, Newton, and Locke, and which he must be aware is now cherished by thousands of minds as well qualified, perhaps, to judge fairly and conscientiously as his own. It is a "cold, cruel creed." "It would be well if this horrid heresy could be summarily suppressed." "Unitarianism is a lie." "What then can be thought of sinners who openly deny Christ's divinity, as Unitarians do? They are worse than the Devil, for he publicly acknowledged the divinity of the Saviour when he dwelt on earth, and it is confessed by all the hosts of hell. Unitarians wilfully shut their eyes to the truth, and deliberately prefer damnation; for whosoever refuses to believe in the divine Sonship of Christ must inevitably perish." "Countless will be the assembly at His judgment seat, but in all the world there will not be a single Unitarian. The deluded creatures now called Unitarians will then see to their dismay that Christ is 'God manifest in the flesh.'" After these specimens of Dundee orthodoxy, we think our readers will feel with us how desirable it is that our friends there should be furnished at once with the funds which they require for the erection of a church, in which ignorance like that of Mr. Davidson may be enlightened, and unreasoning bigotry such as he has converted into Christian meekness and charity. With this view, we may say that we shall double our own donation, and we hope that many others will be induced to do the same, and let it be seen at least that ours is not a faith so feeble as to be "summarily suppressed."

PERTH.—After having been excluded from two lecture halls in this town, the local committee secured another for a lecture from the Unitarian minister of Dundee, on Wednesday, the 14th inst. There was a large attendance, the hall being quite filled. Discussion was invited as usual. One gentleman requested to be allowed to engage in prayer, as his contribution to the discussion. As soon as Mr. Williamson can get time he will attempt a Sunday service in Perth, which is much desired by our new friends there.

WHAT TO DO WITH CHURCH RATES.

To the Editors.—Probably all your readers know that the payment of Church rates is no longer enforced by law. If collected at all they will be so on the voluntary principle, depending solely on the free will and consent of ratepayers. Most Dissenters will cease now to pay Church rates. To such let me suggest that they pay the amount of their usual Church rate to the managers of their own chapels. There are, doubtless, many of our old meeting-houses requiring a little attention of that kind which can only be given by the aid of money. What, then, could we do better with the money which the Legislature gives us the free use of, than to apply it to purposes which our hearts sanction? Nor should the now free-will offering be less ample than the past compulsory Church rate. I believe that churchwardens are intending to make an early application for the rate this year. It is, therefore, all the more necessary that we should be so far on our guard as not to be betrayed into that false charity which helps what we regard as a Church founded on—or, at least, teaching—error, while we neglect that true charity which begins at home.—Believe me, yours truly,

W. ROBINSON.

The ANNUAL MEETING will be held at Radley's Hotel, on Wednesday evening, the 19th May.

UNITARIAN CHURCH, NEWHALL HILL, BIRMINGHAM.
The Thirty-fifth ANNUAL SERMONS in aid of the Schools will be preached on Sunday, May 9th, by the Rev. TOZEAU PARRIS, of Tavistock.
The Anniversary TEA PARTY will be held on Monday, May 10th, at five o'clock.
The Rev. T. PARRIS, Rev. J. K. Applebee, of London, and other ministers and friends will take part in the business of the meeting.

THE Thirty-fifth ANNUAL MEETING of the SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION will be held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, on Thursday morning, May 20th. The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A., in the Chair. Breakfast at half-past eight o'clock.—Picketts, 2s. each.

DUNDEE UNITARIAN CHURCH.
Subscriptions from the friends of the cause of Unitarian Christianity are solicited on behalf of the Building Fund. The present meeting place (a public hall) costs about £40 annually, available only on Sundays. If the congregation, which is purely of a missionary character, could be relieved of this expense, the cause would be nearly self-supporting. Last year £104 were raised for congregational purposes. About £1,500 will be needed.

UNITARIAN WORSHIP AT BLACKPOOL AND SCARBOROUGH.

At the recent Annual Meeting of the Missionary Conference, an association of Unitarian ministers for missionary purposes, it was agreed that an effort should be made to establish religious services, under Unitarian auspices, at Blackpool and Scarborough, as early as possible in the present year.
Blackpool and Scarborough are much frequented by Unitarians during the summer months. For them, as for the extension of the cause of liberal Christianity, it is very desirable that a place should be made in these towns.
The Committee of the Conference beg earnestly to appeal to their Unitarian brethren for aid in carrying out the above object. They need funds to enable them to take the initiatory steps.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The total amount of the gifts presented to the Pope on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of his entering the priesthood is estimated at twenty millions of francs.

According to the Globe, arrangements are being made for the creation of a Bishopric of Madagascar, and £1,000 will be granted towards the endowment at the May meeting of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and grants also be made by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel and the Colonial Bishoprics Fund. As the recent accounts of the progress of Christianity among the Hovas are of a very satisfactory kind, and they are supplied by the London Missionary Society with a sufficiency of Christian teachers, it is hard to see what need there is of a Bishop to superintend the two stations now occupied by Church of England missionaries, and to send out one will only have the effect, in all probability, of causing strife and confusion, where peace and concord have hitherto in a great measure happily prevailed.

The Baptists in Paris are about to build a chapel there, and have selected a site on the south side of the Seine, near the Hospital of the Invalids. They have received liberal offers of pecuniary assistance from friends in the United States. We shall be glad when something of the same kind is done by the Liberal Christians of this country and America.

Our readers may perhaps remember that in the spring of 1863, after Dr. Colenso's calculations regarding some of the statements in the Pentateuch had caused alarms in many orthodox minds, the Speaker of the House of Commons proposed the production of a Commentary which should serve as a satisfactory answer to the heretical Bishop's objections. The Rev. F. C. Cook was named as editor, Mr. Murray as publisher, and it was understood that a number of eminent scholars of the Church of England had promised their assistance. After two years had passed, inquiries began to be made as to when the desired work might be looked for, and the assurance was given that it was making progress, and part of it already in type. Two more years went by, and the same assurance was repeated, with the addition that the Pentateuch was to be published first. We are now getting on in the year 1869, and still no part of the Commentary has appeared. But our hopes are refreshed by learning that the other day the editor, the publisher, and the contributors dined with its projector, the Speaker, and we may trust, therefore, that some time or other it will see the light. It would be well, however, for those who have it in hand to remember what Swift says—that "a book that misses its tide is neglected, as the moon by day, or like mackerel a week after the season."

The Tablet has been at the pains "to gather from authentic sources" the particulars of Mr. Newdegate's refusal to be introduced to Dr. Manning, "that most insinuating of tyrants," as he termed him. It appears that the Archbishop of Westminster had been in the tea-room with a friend, who, being inspired with mischief, said, "There's Newdegate, shall I introduce you to him?" "With all my heart, if he likes it," at once replied the Archbishop; and his friend went over to the godly man, but soon came back laughing, saying, "It's too strong, it's too strong." Mr. Newdegate had escaped the snare of the fowler, and no doubt fled away, reflecting on another victory over the Man of Sin.

Readers of the "Life of Keble" must have felt a want of the correspondence between him and his friend Richard Hurrell Froude, which was needed for a full understanding of the famous Tractarian movement. Sir J. Coleridge stated that the letters had disappeared and could not be found, but the John Bull now informs us that they have been unexpectedly discovered.

An opinion has been given by the Solicitor-General, Sir Roundell Palmer, and Dr. Deane, to the effect that at present no means exist for trying before any competent tribunal the question whether Dr. Colenso has or has not propounded doctrines at variance with the teaching of the Church of England.

The Methodist Times gives the following illustration of the way in which devoted Churchmen, who make such an outcry against touching "the sacred property of the Church," can deal with it when it suits their turn:

"Early in 1867 the suffering Protestants in the diocese of Derry and Raphoe send up a bleating cry to Dublin Castle for the appointment of a chief shepherd. The Duke of Abercorn looks about him for a staunch and sturdy Protestant clergyman, whom he may put into the vacant see, and the vice-regal choice falls upon that most fortunate doctor, William Alexander, who is forthwith enthroned. 'One good turn deserves another,' does it not? Of course that cannot be questioned. Now, it so happens that the Queen's representative wishes to extend his political power, as a territorial magnate, in Ireland, and to do it quickly too, for he may be no longer viceroy, and times are coming on which may require influence of the 'right sort' in Ireland. How is this to be done? Ah, but that is no difficulty at all, for there are twelve parishes in Derry and Raphoe, covering more than 6,000 acres, and waiting to be leased, and is not the spiritual lord of these domains the obedient and grateful servant of the noble marquis? Well, it's a bargain. A lease is taken for twenty-one years at 2s. 4½d. an acre, but worth five times as much. Thus the noble viceroy will become the political dictator of this acreage, and clear £57,000 in twenty-one years. It would not be polite to call this any ugly names, seeing that a bishop and a duke are involved. Let us rather say nothing more about it than that it is our earnest hope and expectation that such scandals are coming to an end."

"Samme the costermonger" has been preaching to large numbers of poor people—between three and four thousand—at the Agricultural Hall. But our readers will ask, who is Samme? Well, from a tract published by the Religious Tract Society, it appears that he was a brickmaker, a swearer, and a drunkard. In an illness owing to an accident, he was called on by a district visitor, who came again and again to his house, and read and prayed with him till his heart was touched, and he rose from his bed a converted man. He then managed to buy the requisites for carrying on the trade of a costermonger, in which character he became known to many good people in Dalston and its neighbourhood; but of late he has been engaged on Sundays in preaching to the poor, which he is said to do in a very simple, but effective way. He has a voice of great power, into which he puts great feeling, and is described as admirably qualified for addressing the outcasts and wanderers, who never enter our churches or chapels, and call all good people Methodists.

The "May meetings" have already begun. On Monday the Baptist Union held its annual session, when the president, Rev. W. Brock, delivered an address on the characteristics of the times, impending changes, and probable results. The report presented stated that the outward signs of prosperity had never been more striking than during the year just closed. Forty-six new places of worship had been erected, and twenty-nine others enlarged or improved, at a cost of £92,950, and supplying seat room for more than 18,000 persons. In addition to this, forty-nine churches had been originated, so that the whole number of churches belonging to the denomination in the United Kingdom was 2,447. The increase in membership was 9,982, bringing up the total number in communion to 231,506, and, adding the 267,396 scholars in its schools, the Baptist denomination might be estimated at more than a million.—On the evening of the same day, the United Methodist Free Churches held their twelfth annual missionary meeting, when an encouraging account was given of the past year's efforts in Australia, New Zealand, the East and West Coast of Africa, Jamaica, and China, where the Churches have European missionaries, whose labours are greatly assisted by a large number of native teachers. The year's expenditure, amounting to £9,997. 13s. 5d., had exceeded the income by £609. 7s. 4d., arising, it was stated, not from any want of liberality, but from deficient organisation.—On Tuesday, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel had its annual gathering. The report stated that the receipts in 1868 amounted to £103,132, and an appeal was made for £14,000 to enable the Society to give the support promised to its various missions, and to prevent the necessity for reducing that support to an extent which would inflict serious injury upon them. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who presided, after referring to the success which had attended the operations of the Society, more especially in India and Burmah, said this was an age in which old theories as to Church establishments were very much shaken, and men's minds were greatly unsettled, and the more need was there for the Society to exhibit in all its doings that calmness and consideration for the feelings of those with whom it had to do which had hitherto characterised its proceedings.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Roman Catholics never allow themselves to use their reason, or else they could hardly fail to see what an absurdity it is to bring into discussion at the forthcoming Council the Pope's infallibility, when the final decision on every question brought before it rests with himself; so that in reality he will have to determine whether he is or is not infallible. Yet the Tablet says:

"We hope, with Catholics in every part of the world, that the Pope will be decreed by a dogmatic canon to be absolutely infallible when speaking ex cathedra on faith or morals."

One who has been "about forty-eight years a Methodist," and is much exercised by the objections which some make to class-meetings and love-feasts, writing to the Methodist Times, says:

"The truth is, and I know it from personal observation, that Methodism is not now what it once was. It has become to a certain extent a fashionable profession of religion, and too many who are connected with it, and others who wish to bear its honoured name, know nothing experimentally of vital godliness; hence their continual grumbings about class-meetings being the test of membership in the Methodist churches. Their opposition to class-meetings does not arise from any want of nerve and ability to speak in them, but from a dearth in Christian experience. Follow them to other social meetings, where they are at liberty to talk on frivolous and worldly subjects, and you will generally find them the most loquacious of those present."

The London correspondent of the New York Nation is anxious that the Irish Church Bill should be passed in some shape so that Parliament may devote itself to other matters for which the road is now hopelessly blocked; as, for instance, the measure relating to Endowed Schools. He says:

"These schools enjoy a revenue considerably larger than that which will be set free by the disendowment of the Irish Church, but they have been allowed to fall into that helpless state of muddle which is only too characteristic of English institutions at the present moment. The endowments are wasted, misapplied, and put to actually prejudicial uses of every kind. To put them right would be the first step towards providing the country with that of which it is most urgently in need, a good system of secondary education. No one can put them right but Parliament, and Parliament is so taken up with squabbling over a question upon which every sensible man in the country has long ago made up his mind, that we have no hopes of anything but a mutilated and, at best, preparatory measure."

Mr. Disraeli's strange paradoxes seem to suit the taste of no party in the Church. The Guardian says:

"We have to thank him for having furnished us with a new definition of an Established Church. It is a Church kept up and ruled by an external and foreign Power. Thus the Roman Catholic communion is an Established Church in Ireland, and we presume elsewhere, only not at Rome. What respect can we have for the sincerity or judgment of a man who, in the House of Commons, at the head of his party, on a grave and serious subject, can talk such extravagant, such stupid stuff? More mischievous, though of course less absurd, is the importance which he and his chief assistant in this controversy, Dr. Fall, attribute to the personal supremacy of the Queen. In his eyes she is a kind of lay Pope; and a Popedom of one sort or another is necessary to the Church. These superstitions, which serve instead of opinions to the leader of the Conservative party, were brushed away by Sir Roundell Palmer. The Supremacy, if we examine its real meaning, means in fact two things. It means certain special prerogatives in reference to the Church by law established—prerogatives defined by law and of very limited extent, such as the nominating of Bishops—which the Crown exercises, as it does its other prerogatives, under the advice of its Ministers. It means also that Ecclesiastical Courts (where they exist, as in England and Ireland) are, just as Civil Courts are, the Courts of the Queen as chief magistrate and representative of the sovereign power."

"A compliment to the Catholic Church from Mr. Disraeli is," says the Tablet, "at the present moment a charming surprise."

"The Catholics are a match—and he repeated the compliment twice—without soldiers and policemen and law-courts, simply by themselves, for any establishment that any Government can create all over the world. Never, certainly, was the power of Catholic unity more strongly recognised by foe. Such is the power of Catholicity that without your Parliament it establishes itself; such is the weakness of the Protestant communion that it cannot accomplish even that. . . . The delicacy of the compliment consists in the words 'established' and 'foreign power.' Does he seriously mean that the Pope has 'established' Catholicity by force? If Cardinal Cullen and the Irish people have no fear of Papal Zouaves or fleet, what is this 'establishment' of which he speaks but the voluntary cohesion of Catholics bound together by belief in the same doctrine, and therefore paying willing obedience to the same head. We thank Mr. Disraeli. He has said better than any man yet has said it; the Establishment of faith and love is stronger than the Establishment of force and fear."

We entirely agree with this closing sentiment; but we should like to ask the Tablet which of these Establishments it considers the one in the Roman territories to be, where, if we have been rightly informed, "Papal Zouaves" and similar coercives are found necessary."

The Standard says, and so far we are happy to agree with it, "it is clear enough now that the Irish Church Bill will receive no material modifications in its passage through Committee. A good many amendments have been made, but their character is comparatively unimportant. . . . The bill remains what it was intended to be—a measure of monstrous and unparalleled injustice, which first strips the Church of its status and property, and then loads it with chains."

According to a correspondent of the English Independent, "the plan of dissolving the church into the congregation is on the increase," and this is exciting grave fears in many minds. "A member of the Church of England" seems puzzled, as we ourselves were, by the position which, in a recent article, our contemporary took on the subject, and he says:

"It will be within your recollection that a few months ago a very influential prelate of the English Church [now its Primate] defended the union of Church and State on the ground that, if that connection were dissolved, it would be impossible to prevent Churchmen drifting into Unitarianism. If I remember correctly, you attacked this extraordinary position with great eloquence and vigour, and as I thought with complete success. And yet, if I understand your argument in this week's number, you have fallen into precisely the same error in defending the institutions of the Independents. I do not precisely know, and you do not tell me, how 'the church' of the Congregationalists is formed. But I suppose that it is composed of members of the congregation who have made some pledge or accepted some test as to their religious faith. However this 'spiritual fellowship' be arrived at, it appears that it embraces only a fraction of the congregation; and, if I understand you, the rejected portion is practically expected to pay for the maintenance of services over which they have no control whatever. The pecuniary question, however, is unimportant (though it is inviting to a Churchman); your leading argument is that unless the 'congregation,' that is the many, are held down by the 'church'—meaning the self-elected few—the great bulk of people known as Independents will 'begin in weakness' and 'end in recklessness'; or, as you more clearly put it, 'will be swept away' into Unitarianism and infidelity. In other words, Congregationalism is no better off than Establishmentarianism. Both alike depend upon the machinery devised by man, for otherwise they are helplessly unable to maintain the faith delivered by Christ to his Apostles!"

The reply which the Independent makes is that a church, "if it be a society, must have certain acknowledged bases of union between its members," and that while "other churches constitute themselves by a rigorous doctrinal subscription," Independents do this "by faith in Jesus Christ;" but we are left in the dark as to who are the judges that decide what the "faith" is which entitles a man to be received into the church, and what "pledge" he is required to give or what "test" to accept of possessing such "faith."

On the report that Dr. Raleigh and Mr. Jones have resolved upon a systematic exchange of services, each one occupying the pulpit of the other once a week, the Freeman, while thinking that once a week is too often, is yet in favour of more frequent exchanges than are made at present. In their judgment on sermons, Dissenting congregations are apt to forget that their ministers are, in regard to preaching, subject to demands that are not made on the clergy of the Establishment. The rector or vicar generally has one or more curates with whom he can share the responsibility of preaching as often as he pleases; and he likewise ministers to a people with whom the sermon is a more subordinate matter than among Dissenters. The Wesleyan minister is allowed to labour in one town only three consecutive years, and is stationed in the same town only twice in his lifetime. If he be in a large town he will belong to a circuit in which there are two or three or four leading chapels beside smaller ones, in most of which he ministers with more or less frequency; and probably during his three-years' term he does not preach more than seventy Sundays to the same congregation. Whereas Dissenting ministers, besides addresses on various occasions, have to preach from forty to fifty Sundays in the year to the same people, and this not for three years only, but perpetually. There may be specially-gifted men for whom this is not too much, as there are instances in which it has been done well for a lifetime; but our contemporary thinks it is unreasonable to expect it from the ordinary run of ministers, and with such pressure upon them it is not wonderful to hear of their breaking down in health, and people saying that their ministers have lost all freshness and exhausted their powers. Such pressure, the Freeman is of opinion, might be advantageously relieved by a more frequent interchange of services.

In a speech the other day at Willis's-rooms, the Bishop of Peterborough (Dr. Magee) made a vehement attack on voluntarism, and was "most tyrannically clapped fort." His summing up seems to have been received with special applause by his hearers, seven-eighths of whom were ladies. It was this—"upon the endowed principle, it is Felix who sometimes trembles before Paul; upon the voluntary system, it is Paul who is for ever trembling before Felix." It would be vain to argue with his lordship, but we wonder it did not strike him, and even the ladies who cheered his remark, that Paul was a thorough voluntary, ministering with his own hands to his necessities, and yet made Felix tremble, and that it was attributing a base and mercenary spirit to the clergy of the Establishment, who all profess to be "moved by the Holy Ghost to take on them their office," to assume that if their endowments were not secured to them they would be afraid to warn and admonish faithfully the congregations committed to their charge.

On the opinion of the lawyers, mentioned in "What is Doing," upon the Colenso case, the Daily News remarks that if they are right, neither the Bishop of Capetown nor the Archbishop of Canterbury has any jurisdiction over that prelate. The Royal Supremacy has created what it cannot control. It has conferred the duty, the position, and the title of bishop, but has reserved no means of enforcing responsibility for them. The fault, however, does not rest in the colony but at home. These colonial bishoprics were the creatures of the vain ambition of the Bishop of Oxford and other dignitaries here. They thought to anticipate the wishes of the colonists, and have overreached themselves. They were pretty sure that when the colonies came to self-government they would not do the right thing in this matter, and they tried to do it for them beforehand. They were not to be trusted to choose their own ecclesiastical system, and with the aid of the royal supremacy, most improperly accorded, prelates at home were in haste to put a little copy of our English State Church in possession of the ground. Hence all the difficulty and all the humiliation of these later years. The Church has been betrayed by a few fussy self-constituted leaders into a false position, and is suffering from it.

The Times suggests that, as several of the heretical Bishop's books have been published in London, proceedings might be taken against him by the Bishop of London, as in the case of Mr. Bennett, of Frome; but this is a point upon which the learned counsel abstain from expressing any opinion. The leading journal says, it follows from the opinion which they have given, that in many cases a colonial bishop is independent of all authority in the exercise of his episcopal functions. He may commit any enormities within his own diocese, and no one has any jurisdiction over him. He may deny the essential doctrines of Christianity, or even of religion, and if he pleases, he may still hold his post and exercise the functions of his office. There could not be a more discreditable instance of the confusion of ecclesiastical law. The lesson to be learned from this state of things is that for the future, unless we are prepared for distinct and complete legislation upon the subject, the Government must have nothing to do with the religious affairs of the colonies.

Archdeacon Pollock, who seems to have a decided turn for strong language, in his charge, delivered at Nantwich on Tuesday, said:

"There was division, if not treason, within their Zion; there were faithless watchmen on the walls, the enemy was thundering at the gate, and there were many signs that England was growing weary of her Church, if not also of her God. They might see that in the abolition of church rates, the first step, as he read it, towards disestablishment and disendowment. They might see it still more plainly in the cruel wrong which was being done to the Church in Ireland, in the principles enunciated by many of the promoters of that wrong, in the motley aspect of the allies who were combined against her. They might see it in the proposed elimination of religion from the education of the masses, and the deposition of the Church from her wonted place of oversight, whether in the universities or the endowed schools of England. They might see it in the popular acceptance of the dogma of religious equality—a dogma which meant nothing else than the equality of truth and falsehood, of light and darkness, of Christ and Belial."

The interpretation which the Saturday Review puts on the ineffectual amendments to the Irish Church Bill proposed in the Commons is, that they are intended to ascertain what may be effectually proposed in the Lords. It says, "for this purpose it may not have been imprudent to put forward in the Commons amendments of an extreme character, sure to provoke discussion and to catch the attention of the country. If Mr. Disraeli had only proposed such amendments as he had some hope of carrying in the Commons, he would have been precluded from asking for more from the Lords. But by starting with outrageous and audacious demands in the Commons, which he knows cannot be conceded, he may enable the Conservative peers to seem comparatively moderate when they come to make their amendments." The Spectator says Mr. Disraeli's words of command now are, "Eyes front! March! Defend Church cash!"

REVIEW.

The Evidence from Tradition and from the Fathers applied in Support of the Apostolic Origin of the Fourth Gospel. By David Rowland, author of "The Second Table of the Commandments a Perfect Code of Natural Moral Law," &c. Longmans. 1869.

MR. ROWLAND is well known as a layman of earnestly theological tastes, a lawyer by profession, whose legal habits have been applied to the investigation of biblical and moral questions. "The purpose of this essay is to submit the important question raised by the critics of the Tübingen school, which disputes the apostolic origin of the fourth gospel, to an examination of the kind of inquiry which courts of law employ in investigating rights or titles to property dependent on ancient traditionary and documentary evidence." It is written with direct reference to Mr. Tayler's book on the same subject, and maintains the opposite side of the question on the strength of a full induction of the evidence. We note a few of its more striking points. Mr. Tayler made a strong point of the fact that the earliest citation from the fourth gospel, with John as the name of its author, is by Theophilus of Antioch, later than A.D. 180. Mr. Rowland observes that as much might be said of the other three Evangelists, whose works are admitted by Mr. Tayler to be genuine. Citations are made from them all, sometimes loosely enough; allusions to them all abound in the early fathers, without mention of the names of Matthew, or Mark, or Luke, or John. Why then is this absence of name decisive against the genuineness of John's gospel alone? "Citation, in its proper sense, appears to require that the title of the book cited, with the name of its author, should be included in the citation." "The inference from the alleged absence of citation of the fourth gospel until late in the second century is, of course, in its first aspect, prejudicial to the apostolic origin of the gospel. But the evidential value of non-citation of the fourth gospel depends upon the fact whether the works of the fathers contain citations of the other gospels, with the names of their respective authors prior to Theophilus. An examination of the works of the apostolic fathers, from Barnabas to Polycarp inclusive, has disclosed that there is not in the works of the apostolic fathers any citation of the fourth gospel, with the name of its author; that is, citing portions of, or a passage from it, with its name as the Fourth Gospel, or the Gospel of St. John, or with any other distinctive name or title. But the absence or omission is not peculiar to the fourth gospel; it extends to each of the other three gospels. The result is the same in the works of the post-apostolic fathers between Papias and Theophilus." "The absence of citation being general to the four gospels, and not special to the fourth, it follows that no inference can be drawn from non-citation which is not applicable to each and all the gospels; and if one of the gospels was in existence in the first century, then the deduction is clear that the fourth gospel was, or might be, in existence also, unaffected by any inference from the absence of citation." The true nature of the early "allusions," as Lardner calls these informal citations, is then made plain by Mr. Rowland; and he claims Polycarp's quotation from the First Epistle of John (admitted by Mr. Taylor to be by the same author as the gospel) as carrying the authorship up to A.D. 108. He also maintains that Irenæus might testify credibly the number of gospels in use, however fancifully he might explain that number four by there being four winds and four cardinal points.

Mr. Rowland is unable to regard the quaterdeciman question as a "most formidable argument." "It has," he says, "no direct bearing on the question;" and "it complicates the subject unnecessarily." He does not see how the opening of the 13th chapter proves the Lord's Supper to have been held before the Feast of the Passover. He has no doubt that our Lord celebrated it at the usual time. And as to the remark (xviii., 28) that the Jews would not enter the judgment hall lest they should be defiled, "but that they might eat the passover," he remarks that there was time enough yet for them to do it before morning, as intimated even in the Evangelist's phrase, "and it was early," omitted ("an important omission") in Mr. Taylor's treatise. And the Preparation, he plainly shows, was the preparation, not for the Passover, but for the Sabbath of the Passover-week. On the whole, if we may not say he has decided the question, he is entitled to claim its re-hearing in a higher court.

W. J. FOX.

THE writer of our recent article on South Place, Finsbury, sends us the following:

"I am obliged to the correspondents who have supplemented my article with details of Mr. Fox's early life. They confirm my view that Mr. Fox was educated and became heretical before he had any connection with the Presbyterian body, and that only during a portion of his ministerial life were he and his congregation identified with the general Unitarian Church. Yet this portion was the most successful and important one. The moral of his history seems to be: that no more in religion than in anything else can a revolution be effected by ideas alone; that the most brilliant leader exercises but a passing influence unless he has a compact body of disciples who can preserve and popularise—even though at times they exaggerate and travestie—his teachings. The boldest men sometimes feel afraid of their thoughts, and are appalled at standing in a small minority against the world. Unless liberal thinkers can preserve themselves in an organised body, within whose ranks they may find pupils and teacher; supporters and sympathisers, friends, husbands and wives, mere bond of intellectual agreement will not suffice to unite them; and when they drop away, the truth to which they should have borne witness is not likely to endure. They will do little for its promulgation after they have outwardly passed into the ranks of orthodoxy or indifference. When the wine-jar was poured into the sea the wine was lost, but the ocean's hue remained unchanged.

"One word more. The interesting reminiscences which my article has elicited from your correspondents are but a few of many such which are passing into oblivion. No more interesting page of our history could be written than that which should detail the various social, political, and religious agitations excited in England by the impetus of the French revolution during the generation that followed it. Yet to-day nothing is known of them except the few details which have been embalmed in State trials; and the men who took part in those movements are passing from our midst without leaving us any record. To speak merely of religious movements, how many of us had heard of those 'Freethinking Christians' to whom Mr. Means refers, or know what were their peculiar views? I once toiled through half-a-dozen volumes of their literature, but learned little of them beyond the two characteristics that they hated St. Paul very much because they didn't agree with his views, and the Unitarians still more, because they did agree with theirs. Or again, who now mentions Williams, the founder of the Literary Fund, the once-famous 'Priest of Nature,' who formed and ministered to the (I suppose) earliest Theistic Church in London, and whose chapel after many vicissitudes is now the great ritualistic temple in Margaret-street? "K."

RICHARD WEAVER.

As some of our readers may know nothing of this famous "revivalist," who is causing such excitement in the East-end of London, we throw together a few passages from a description of his preaching at the Victoria Theatre, given in the Nonconformist.

The vast concourse, estimated at between 3,000 and 4,000, speedily subsided into comparative silence; but for a few moments only, the whole assemblage, as if moved by one impulse, suddenly bursting forth with a well-known revivalist hymn, the singing being maintained with ever-increasing energy until the appearance of Mr. Weaver on the stage. Immediately on entering, he knelt for a few moments in prayer, after which he took a seat facing his hearers. The cast of his frame and features betokened the possession of considerable muscular power, the compressed lips and deep-set eyes evincing great determination. He commenced the proceedings by giving out the hymn beginning—

There is LIFE for a LOOK at the Crucified One;
There is life at this moment for thee;
Then look, sinner—look on O Him and be saved—
Unto Him who was nail'd to the tree.

In reading the hymn, his utterance was extremely rapid, while his disregard of punctuation rather perplexed his hearers, but everyone present having been supplied with a copy of the hymn, all were enabled to join in the singing. The last line of each verse was repeated again and again with evident relish, thus—

Who was nail'd to the tree,
Who was nail'd to the tree,
Unto Him who was nail'd to the tree.

At the conclusion of the hymn, Mr. Weaver commenced a long and powerful prayer, in which he mentioned how he had come to London to preach the Gospel, to teach the people to fall in love with Jesus, and to show how cheaply they might procure the blessings of eternal life. His language was often most ungrammatical, his metaphors devoid of taste, and his style utterly destitute of polish, yet there was a strange earnestness, a burning fire, a rugged eloquence in his homely yet searching words, which caused even the most indifferent to listen. He had strange materials to deal with. It needed but a glance at the vast assemblage bowing in prayer, or responding with loud "Amen's" or "Glory" to the exhortations of the man who was praying on their behalf, to perceive that the majority had been gathered together out of the courts and lanes, and belonged to a class conspicuous by its absence from ordinary places of worship. After his prayer, he read a chapter of Scripture, interspersing it with numerous remarks, often of an anecdotal character, sometimes with a touch of sarcastic drollery which provoked a smile, yet which was invariably followed by a remark that left his hearers more grave and thoughtful-looking than ever. Then followed the hymn beginning—

When I survey the wondrous cross
On which the Prince of Glory died,
My richest gain I count but loss,
And our contempt on all my pride.

He next commenced his discourse, and said he had selected a short text because many of his hearers had short memories. They were wonderfully clever in remembering what was bad, and equally ready to forget what was good. His text, therefore, would be two words only, from the chapter he had read. Those two words were, "precious blood." His language was essentially of a figurative character, abounding in simple parables. He reminded his hearers that on all railways there were three lights, white, green, and red, denoting respectively safety, caution, and danger. His discourse would relate mainly to the green light—caution. He then proceeded to explain why the blood of Jesus was precious. It was of no use talking of liberty to prisoners unless we could show them how to gain their freedom; or to tell a man perishing of thirst in the desert where water was to be found, unless we also told him how to get it. In like manner, it would be of no use speaking to them of the "precious blood," unless it could be made really precious to them. The chief portion of his address consisted of anecdotes and parables, to which the crowd listened with almost breathless interest. He spoke of a young man of notoriously bad character who, after hearing him on one occasion, had become deeply repentant of the evil courses into which he had fallen. Eager to save the young man, Mr. Weaver took him home with him in a cab. As they went through the streets, the young man desired the cabman to stop at the door of a respectable house. It was the home from which his evil practices had exiled him. He knocked at the door. It was opened by the father, who gazed sadly yet sternly at the miserable object that cowered and knelt on the cold white doorstep. The young man entreated forgiveness, but the door was mercilessly shut on the poor wretch who lay, seemingly more dead than alive, at the feet of Mr. Weaver. But even as the door was closing on him, a girlish voice was heard exclaiming, "Oh! it's brother John!" On arriving at Mr. Weaver's, the poor outcast began weeping violently, not because of his father's sternness, he had deserved that, but because of his little sister's exclamation, "Oh! it's brother John!" That unmanned him completely. But while the tears were yet falling down his cheeks there came a knock at the door. It was the little sister, sent by the parents to fetch home the poor prodigal. She had come in a cab and back went she in proud triumph, with "brother John" and Mr. Weaver. No words can re-produce the touching pathos with which Mr. Weaver related this simple history, and deduced therefrom the beautiful lesson of how even the most guilty might make their peace with heaven. All the time that he was speaking, great hard-featured men and harder-featured women might be observed sobbing bitterly, even like children; while, up in the gallery, the crowd of semi-savage Lambeth "roughs" could be seen gazing intently at the speaker, as if they would drink in every word spoken by him; and when at last he told them how the son had become reconciled to his injured parents, a general sigh of relief, followed by a deep "Glory," showed how strongly his hearers had realised the vivid picture set before them.

While in Edinburgh he was spoken to by a young woman, who asked him to kiss the infant carried in her arms. He complied with the strange request, and then the woman asked if he could remember her. Of course this was difficult to one, like Mr. Weaver, who was continually seeing hundreds of fresh faces every day. At length she exclaimed, "I'm Meggie." Then he recollected how, some nine years previously, he had assisted at some "midnight meetings," at which his attention had become directed to a young woman, who appeared deeply touched by his words of earnest remonstrance. He ascertained from her that she was willing to return home to her parents if they would receive her. Mr. Weaver promised to attempt to effect a reconciliation. He proceeded with her to within a short distance of their house, when, leaving her standing, in mingled fear and shame, in the street, he went and knocked at the door. It was opened by a grey-headed old man, in whose eyes the tears were visible. Mr. Weaver gave his name, and was asked to enter. He did so, and in the parlour found an old lady holding a newspaper in her hands and weeping bitterly. He thought this very strange, but it appeared that the newspaper contained an account of the midnight meetings, and that old couple had been hoping that their erring daughter Meggie might have been present, and have listened to words which might have the effect of inducing her to quit her life of shame. "Would you take Meggie back, if she came?" asked Mr. Weaver. "Of course I would," was the instant reply of the heart-stricken mother. Mr. Weaver opened the door, and pointing to the poor, dragged creature, who, in her faded finery and gaudy ornaments, crouched miserably against the wall, said, "There she is." Before he had uttered the words the mother's instinct had foretold her what he was about to say. There was a loud yearning cry, and the next moment the mother was fondly embracing the poor, long-lost wanderer, who sobbed and writhed in anguish and repentance at her feet. In like manner Mr. Weaver related the story of the prodigal son, his hearers never wearying of his address, but by their evident interest continually urging him onwards. It was very late, nine o'clock, before the proceedings terminated, but the people seemed reluctant to depart. They lingered while a short prayer was offered, joined in the closing hymn, and then quietly dispersed.

THE CHRISTIANITY OF CHRIST.

By REV. JOHN CORDNER.

ABOUT ten years ago I met a Franciscan friar on board a Mediterranean steamer. He was free in informing me of his own religious position, and ready also to inquire about mine. When I told him that I was a Unitarian, he said he had been a missionary at Hong Kong when Sir John Bowring was there—that he had met Sir John, who was a Unitarian and a good man; but then, he added, a Unitarian is not a Christian. I attempted to reason with him, but found him immovable. To every thing I said, he simply repeated, a Unitarian is not a Christian. With the view of bringing him to reason, I fell back on his own method and simply repeated, a Franciscan is not a Christian. This led him to explanation. Then I inquired if he accepted the Lord Jesus Christ as a competent teacher and guide in religion. He bowed reverently and replied, "most certainly." Then, I rejoined, hath he not said: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and mind, and thy neighbour as thyself; on these two commands hang all the law and the prophets?" Has he not said: "This do, and thou shalt live?" My Franciscan friend paused and swept his eyes round sea and sky, and slowly answered, yes. Then said I, if a Unitarian follows this teaching of Jesus, and in his spirit does that to which Christ promises eternal life, is he not a Christian and an heir of eternal life? He answered that he dare not deny it. When I heard this, I felt that Jesus Christ was indeed a reconciler, not only between man and God, but also between man and man. I felt that in the simplicity and sublimity of his doctrine there was that which would bring harmony, peace, and life eternal to all intelligent existence.

Truly, my Italian friend and I stood at opposite points on the great circle of Christian theology. But as I looked into his calm and earnest face, and heard him speak of his missionary work in foreign lands, I had no doubt of his being a Christian, accepted of our common Master. And while in services rendered for Christ's cause I felt he had the advantage of me, I felt that in my own simpler and more humane theology I had the advantage of him. For, while he was perplexed as to my position, I had no perplexity concerning his. There, at least, I knew that I was the true catholic, and not he. He looked at Christianity as presented by the Sacerdotal Corporation called the Church. I looked at Christianity as presented by its first and great Teacher—even Christ himself. To be a Christian, according to his conception, was to believe a given dogmatic system and to bow before a priestly authority. To be a Christian, according to my conception, was to love God and man, and be faithful in this twofold service after the manner and in the spirit of Jesus Christ.

BISHOPS AND THE VOLUNTARY PRINCIPLE.

It was hardly to be expected that the Bishops of the English Church, constituting as they do the crowning glory of an established hierarchy, should fail to look askance at the voluntary principle, which is the mainstay of schismatical Dissent. But it was carrying their aversion very far to throw cold water upon it, even as a means of increasing the number and efficiency of their own order. Lord LYTTELTON, with the view of supplying the alleged need of Episcopal superintendence in overworked or neglected dioceses, proposed to bring a bill into the House of Lords for adding to the Episcopate a number of working Bishops with an income of not less than £25,000, the funds to be provided by voluntary subscriptions from the laity. But it was evidently felt to be derogatory to the dignity of a Bishop, especially of the English Church, to be anything less than a peer of the realm, residing in a palace, and drawing a princely revenue, not from the precarious generosity of individual laymen, but from fixed ecclesiastical endowments.

According to the celebrated argument of SYDNEY SMITH, it is a cheaper way of attracting men of rank and education into the Church, to establish a comparatively small number of grand prizes, than to distribute the total revenues of the Church in fair proportions among the mass of the working clergy. The average income of a clergyman, if anything like an equal division were made, would not suffice to tempt gentlemen into the clerical profession; but now the humblest curate has the possibility of a prize, and at all events shines with some reflected light from Right Reverend Fathers in God and Spiritual Peers, and feels that he belongs to an order, the highest members of which mix on equal terms with the noblest of the land, and come into familiar contact with the Throne itself.

The lately promoted Bishop of Peterborough, Dr. MAGEE (how happy he must be to have made his escape from the Deanery of Cork and the doomed Irish Establishment!) delighted an audience, chiefly of ladies, last week, by an eloquent denunciation of the voluntary system, that expression having unluckily crept into a report of the Additional Curates Society, in connection with Home Missions of the Church of England.

"The voluntary system required the clergyman to be the mere slave in things temporal to those to whom he was to be the teacher and pastor in things spiritual. The voluntary system degraded—the voluntary principle would make a clergyman the slave of the fanaticism, passions, and ignorance of his flock; while the endowed system gave him a standing ground, which lifted him above such evil influences, and enabled him to be the fearless pastor of his people. To sum it up in one word—upon the endowed principle it was Felix who sometimes trembled before Paul; upon the voluntary system it was Paul that was for ever trembling before Felix."

Dr. MAGEE did not, we suppose, mean to cite PAUL, a fettered prisoner pleading in self-defence before a civil tribunal, as an example of a man preaching with courage and confidence because he had a secure and independent income. Nor would Dr. MAGEE maintain, we imagine, that PAUL, even in relation to the Christian Church, assumed or sought the position of an endowed priest. But, dismissing this singularly inapposite illustration, it would not be difficult to show that the Bishop's invective is contradicted by experience. We undertake to say that, as a rule, the boldest and most fearless of Christian preachers, both in and out of the Established Church, have been those who faithfully and earnestly addressed themselves to the spiritual nature of voluntary hearers, rather than parochial incumbents or ecclesiastical dignitaries whose worldly position could not be materially affected by the estimation in which they were held as preachers and pastors, and whose independence is too apt to degenerate into a sleepy indifference to the spiritual interests of their flocks. The Bishop's argument assumes that the religious element dwells only in the clergy, whereas it is happily the fact that God has implanted a religious nature in every human soul, which needs only to be appealed to aright to yield a prompt and warm response.

A curious comment on the Bishop's eloquence appeared in a letter in the Daily News of Saturday last, from a layman in a London parish, who gives his experience—first, of an able and faithful incumbent, whose income was derived entirely from pew-rents and Easter offerings, and amounted to between £400 and £500 a year:

"No man was ever more honoured in his parish, and as for trembling before any of us, who considered it a privilege to support him, he would have enjoyed the suggestion as a good joke."

After several years, he was succeeded by a man of totally different stamp.

"Within six months there was scarcely one of the organisations by which the members of the congregation had been knit together that was not broken up. Our new minister . . . had had no education in the true sense of the word. He read loudly, and his preaching was noisy and incoherent, utterly without knowledge or ideas, and of a kind utterly to destroy the beneficial effect of the prayers. You may guess what happened. The congregation fell off quarter after quarter and year after year, until the income derived from the pew-rents fell to something like £130. And now I come to that of which I complain, and shall be compelled to differ from the Bishop of Peterborough. This falling off of income was the natural warning to our minister that he was not the man for our parish, and under a natural state of things he must have gone, making way for somebody else, as the good of the Church required. But here the Bishop of Peterborough's favourite system came in, and has fixed this incompetent man upon us. Twice since the utter failure of our minister was demonstrated, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have struck in and augmented our incumbent's income, thus doing the neighbourhood serious injury. I estimate that every hundred pounds they have given to our church has done us two or three hundred pounds' worth of harm. . . . I do not blame them much, for they are doing as most people do who administer dead men's property. I doubt whether any of the great Church societies could afford to act on the same plan. If they did, their subscribers would soon see that the money was being wasted, and supplies would fall off. I think, however, we have a right to complain that whereas our Church can only thrive by a very considerable development of the voluntary system, we find the natural and salutary working of that system arrested by the application of extraneous endowments."

The italics are ours. We are far from denying that the voluntary principle is liable to occasional evils and abuses of its own, and may be inadequate of itself to make due provision for the spiritual needs of the most destitute and degraded classes, in whom the religious nature has yet to be awakened. But as compared with the opposite principle of entire reliance on endowments by the dead, we believe the general results to be greater vitality and earnestness. Human nature being what it is, it is well that even a minister of religion should feel it to be his interest to do his duty earnestly and faithfully, to put his heart into his work—whatsoever his hand findeth to do, to do it with all his might—and to speak the word of divine truth with power, that it may minister grace unto his hearers.

If Bishops are to be regarded as the crowning flower of the principle of a State Establishment, they cannot be said, upon the whole, to have recommended it by their own practice. As a class, they have generally used their influence in defence of every abuse and in resistance to every reform. Lord Chancellor ELDON long ago uttered the satire, all the keener from its unconsciousness, that he could not conceive how there could be anything in slavery inimical to Christianity, for in all his long experience he had never heard a single remonstrance against it from the Right Reverend Bench. Much complaint is now made of the practical absence of Episcopal supervision in the Southern sees, especially in that of Exeter, but we cannot forget that in the active years of the now aged prelate of that see, his activity was invariably exerted in a mischievous direction, so that the period of King Log has probably been less injurious than the preceding period of King STORK.

Upon the whole, we cannot but anticipate healthful and happy results from the probable extension of the voluntary principle in religious matters, whether in Ireland or in England, and whether inside or outside the so-called National Church.

TODMORDEN.—It will be seen from an advertisement that appeared in our columns last week that a full account of the proceedings in connection with the opening of the new church, with an architectural description of the building, &c., has been put forth in a neat little brochure, which will no doubt prove interesting to many of our readers. On Sunday week the services were conducted by the minister of the church, the Rev. Lindsey Taplin, and by his father, the Rev. James Taplin, of Crediton, Devonshire, Mr. Taplin, sen., preaching in the morning. There were large congregations on both occasions.

AMERICAN NOTES.

From a recent enumeration it appears that in the State of Philadelphia there are ninety Roman Catholic convents, all of which are under the care of one Superior, Mother M. Gonzaga.

There is a movement on foot in New York to open the reading-room of the Mercantile Library, and others, on Sunday. The Nation says:

"The main opposition to the proposal, of course, comes from those who fear the disappearance of the 'Sabbath' as a day ostensibly devoted to religious worship. We say ostensibly, because the fact is that it is not really devoted to religious worship, or religious thoughts, or exercises, by any but a very small minority of the population. The young men whom the opening of the libraries would most affect spend their Sundays in bed or in suburban taverns, and the alternative which the religious world has presented to it with regard to them is, not whether they shall be allowed to choose between reading-rooms and church, but between reading-rooms and sloth or vice. The Young Men's Christian Associations, however, as well as a good many other missionary and reformatory agencies, are gradually though slowly becoming convinced of the fact that all kinds of refining and cultivating influences increase people's susceptibility to religious influences, and that a man who even reads newspapers on Sunday is, in nine cases out of ten, a far more hopeful object of the missionary's teaching than the man who spends it loafing or drinking."

In his recently published "Byeways of Europe," Bayard Taylor says:

"I once heard a clergyman, in his sermon, assert that 'the world was perfectly smooth before the fall of Adam, and the present inequalities in its surface were the evidences of human sin.' I was a boy at the time, and I thought to myself, 'How fortunate it is that we are sinners!'"

The Bishop of New Jersey, it is said, has given notice that he will refuse at Confirmation to lay his hands upon the piles of false hair and chignons which disfigure the heads of so many young ladies seeking admission to the church and communion.

In regard to the complaints so often made about sermons, the Rev. A. W. Stevens says, with a good deal of justice:

"No man, unless it be the editor of a daily newspaper, has such a mental tax laid upon him as a minister. To produce, once a week, for say forty-two weeks almost consecutively, a sermon which shall not be a repetition of its predecessor, which shall occupy half an hour in the delivery, and which shall interest, instruct, quicken, and keep awake two or three hundred people of both sexes and all ages, and all tastes and degrees of intelligence, is the task that is imposed upon the minister in connection with what else is required of him. Is it any wonder that some one or more of these forty-two sermons, each year, should be a little below the mark of expectation, especially when each one, perhaps, is contrasted with the last new and brilliant lecture that has been heard, and which the lecturer took three or six months to prepare? And does it ever suggest itself, I wonder, to any hearer that his way of listening to a sermon, his mental and physical condition while listening, affects his judgment of the sermon heard? If the hearer sleep, or be inattentive, or find fault afterwards with the sermon, is it certain, in every instance, that the preacher ought to be blamed for it? Good listening often makes good preaching; for a good sermon cannot produce the effect of a good sermon, unless it be listened to by a good listener with candour and with appreciation."

The following "form of marriage," which was used by the Rev. Saml. Phillips, pastor of Andover, Massachusetts, from 1701 to 1771, throws a startling light on the view which was then taken of the relation between a coloured couple even by religious men. The negro bride and groom, with the witnesses, having been gathered together before the clergyman, the latter used first to address the intending husband and require him to promise that "so far as shall be consistent with the relation which you now sustain as a servant, you will perform the part of a husband toward her; and in particular you promise that you will love her; and that, as you shall have the opportunity and ability, you will take a proper care of her in sickness and in health, in prosperity and adversity." The bride was then required to promise the same things, and—as was also required of the groom in respect of her—to say that she would be "true and faithful to him and cling to him, only so long as God in His providence shall continue his and your abode in such place or places as that you can conveniently come together." The minister then declared to them that for such time as God should continue their place or places of abode as aforesaid, and for so long as they "should behave and conduct themselves as obedient and faithful servants"—"not as eye-servants, men-pleasers"—"toward their respective masters and mistresses," they might consider themselves man and wife. "And finally," he used to say to them, "I exhort and charge you to beware lest you give place to the devil"—who, when he finds men and women in very prosperous circumstances, is apt to stir them up without distinction of colour to great heights of vainglory and haughtiness—"so as to take occasion from the licence now given you to be lifted up with pride, and thereby fall under the displeasure not of man only, but of God also; for it is written that God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble." The ceremony then concluded with prayer.

In a recent lecture Dr. Bellows said:

"Christ is frequently denied in our day as the sent of God; denied by those who reject the historical evidences of his mission, and oftentimes much in the Jewish spirit and temper. It is quite too much the fashion of our times to assert that the most candid inquiry and the profoundest analysis of the Scriptures themselves, leave our religion without a clear historic basis, and Christ dispossessed of any other authority than moral and spiritual pre-eminence. But I can truly say that after such study as I have been able to give, I find no proper grounds for such assertions. And I may say that in our own Liberal ranks have been some of the most earnest and respected attestors to the truth of Christianity and the genuineness and credibility of the New Testament record. All denominations are compelled to use Lardner's great work on the Credibility of the New Testament, Priestley's Letters to an Unbeliever, Norton's immortal work on the Genuineness and Authenticity of the Scriptures, a mighty bulwark against the transcendental and rationalistic views which Germany has rolled in upon the history of the Gospel; and Drs. Channing and Palfrey, and, may I not say, all our recognised Unitarians, have been strenuous defenders of the positive historical faith. Indeed, I know no class of Christians who have more heartily and unqualifiedly confessed Christ in his official character as the sent of God than our own people. It seems to me that the Gospel this very hour is as safely entrenched in the convictions and faith of sound, scholarly, and faithful Unitarians, as anywhere else, for the reason that they hold it distinguished from the popular prejudices and errors, which when they disappear, as sooner or later they must, will, like the snow carrying off in the flood a portion of the precious soil, inevitably bear away some of the faith due to the religion so long confounded with them. I have often said to my respected Orthodox friends in the ministry that we are destined to be the Orthodox of the next age, and may yet safely ride in the harbour of quiet faith, while they shall find themselves tossed and shipwrecked upon the rolling waves of the outer sea; for to believe too much is as perilous to the permanent stability of faith as to believe too little."

The Providence (R.I.) Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church have resolved that "no candidate for membership shall be deemed eligible until he shall have unequivocally and frankly affirmed his abstinence from the use of tobacco during so much of the time of his trial for membership as shall succeed the passage of this rule, nor until he shall have pledged himself in future to abstain from its use, except it be for medical purposes."

The Late Mr. E. Coleman.

THE announcement which we make in another column of the death of this estimable young man will be seen with regret by many of our readers, to whom he had become known as one of the students of the Home Missionary Board. At the conclusion of his ordinary course, nearly a year and a half ago, he took the Owens College Scholarship, and had nearly concluded his extended course of study, and was engaged to enter at Midsummer upon his ministry at Accrington, when he was seized by the sharp attack of illness which has ended in his death. He was interred at the Harpurhey Cemetery on Monday last, and was followed to the grave by the tutors and students of the Home Missionary Board, to all of whom he had endeared himself, and by a number of other friends, including a deputation from the congregation at Accrington. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Beard, who, after an earnest appeal to the fellow-students of the deceased, concluded in the following words:

"If I needed an excuse I should find one in the character of Edmund Coleman. During an acquaintance with him of now nearly four years, I have found him at least as free from faults as the best of the young men with whom I have been connected. With fair intellectual abilities, he possessed a kind and gentle heart, simplicity of manners, readiness to obey and desire to oblige. His was specially a sympathetic nature. Hence, while at ease with the rich and cultured, he was at home with the poor and untaught. Having largely imbibed the spirit of the great Master, he was instinct with a religious influence which, felt wherever he was, came forth naturally and with singular effect in the cottage, at the sick bed, in the Sunday-school. Here I can speak from effects produced by him under my own eyes at Sale. Having, in my desire to place the congregation there on a permanent footing, resolved to revive and establish the Sunday-school, I selected Edmund Coleman for my assistant. Well did he justify my choice. If now the school is, under the circumstances, solid and flourishing—if its various out-of-door ministrations are operating beneficially in many homes and gradually conducing to the formation of a second congregation in the evening, the credit is primarily due to his judicious as well as untiring labours, and many a heart there, both of the young and the adult, will have been saddened by his removal. The more do I regret, the more will you regret, that the congregation which had (as the phrase is) 'secured' his services is widowed by his death. It could not be otherwise: one who was so worthy in health received in sickness kind attentions and loving care. But the self-denying, considerate, and constant services rendered to him by a fellow-student are beyond all praise, and will long remain a memorial to his honour. Others of you, perhaps all, would have done as well, none could have done better."

UNITY IN DIVISION.

IN his opening address at the recent meeting of the Congregational Union of Lancashire, the Rev. G. W. Conder, who took for his subject the present tendencies and future prospects of the Church Catholic, maintained that the denomination to which he belonged was, at least, as little possessed with the spirit of schism and sect as any of the Christian bodies of England, and declared for himself that he was "ready to exchange Sabbath ministrations with Episcopalians, Methodists, and all the other Protestant sects." It would not be denied, he thought, that the sharply-defined doctrinal divisions of the Church, mostly designated by the name of some human founder of a school, had begun to merge into one another, and melt away from view. What was common to both sides was coming to be regarded, as it was in fact, as of greater importance than the one thing that caused division. And he then proceeded to speak thus well on the subject:

"Wide intervals, indeed, still separate some of the sects; but the gulfs of division are beginning imperceptibly to contract themselves, and the speech which we hold across them is of a less, anathematic kind than heretofore. Greater equality of culture in the teachers and members of the various bodies is doing much (as it always tends to do) to soften asperities and produce greater mutual respect. Sectarian arrogance is becoming more and more an offence in the general esteem. The growth of knowledge on all sides has made many of us more conscious of our own ignorance, and greatly diluted our dogmatism; and the Church at large seems much more willing now to believe an item of her own creed—'Now abideth faith, hope, charity; but the greatest of these is charity.' Even now in our times a vast stride might be taken in the direction of a real unity—all that is desirable, if Christian men everywhere would cease to attempt it from without, and look and strive for it wholly from within. Here is the great heresy in this matter—that of believing you can get a unity of living atoms by cement, by parchment, by scaffolding, by machinery; whereas the only unity possible to living things is that which comes of inward growth and spontaneous consent. Christ alone, and not the creeds, can ever make us one. We outgrow the creeds, but never leave Christ behind. What is there that hinders the mutual co-operation and communion, the interchange of ministrations and the like, between all the Christian bodies of England to-day? Certainly not the essential diversities of doctrine that exist—no, but the narrowness and sectarianism of the men who hold them. Why cannot we all agree to divide the home evangelistic and foreign missionary work between us in such a way as never to clash and oppose but after the most Christian and economical fashion? 'Alas for the rarity of Christian charity!' We ought to do it. We could do it to-morrow on a grand scale, if not universally, if we had not, in varying degrees, it may be more of the spirit of sect than of the spirit of Christ. I would not that one of us should diminish by one atom his zeal for what he holds to be an essential of the Christian creed, but I would that every one of us should hold it also with a large-souled noble charity, that yearns as Christ himself yearned for the oneness of his church. Nor do I think that anything more than this spiritual unity, thus recognised and manifested by mutual communion and co-operation, is necessary to the realisation of the perfect idea of the Catholic Church. An absolute coincidence of interpretation and organisation, in the absence of any divinely given formula of creed or constitution, may be, and I think will be, for ever impossible. It is quite needless. We have four evangelists—but one Gospel; we may have half-a-dozen or a score of Christian bodies—but one Church; all the more one for not being organised into a visible oneness. If the world sees us at worship together, differing but not striving, co-operating instead of disputing, it will recognise our oneness, and be all the more ready to exclaim, 'See how these Christians love one another,' for the fact that we do not see exactly eye to eye."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE FISHERMAN.

FISHERMAN, speak to me; why so lonely
Sailing away when the boats come home?
"I have a little one, I must find him,
Out where the sunset kindles the foam.
"Dying he talked to the wild green water,
Out of his window he watched the spray;
How should the daisies have power to keep him?
Somewhere the sea-gulls watch him at play.
"Empty and cold is the shore without him,
Empty and dry must it ever be;
Let me alone, for the sea consoles me,
Out in the waters he waits for me.
"Empty and cold is the house without him,
Empty and dark through the open door;
Will he not laugh when he hears me coming?
Coming to carry him home once more!"
Bars of wet sunshine the boat sprang over,
Shaking her sails into sheets of gold;
Back through the moonlight she drifted darkly,
Rocking at random, empty and cold.

INSTANTLY KILLED.

Is Count Tolstoi's "Sevastopol in May," published in Hours at Home (American), there is a very remarkable description of the death of a man who is, as the living say, "instantly killed;" but to him, the dying man, his death seems a different matter: Michailof looked behind him. The shining point of the bomb seemed to stand at the zenith—in that position where it is impossible to tell its direction. But that lasted only a minute; the bomb came quicker and quicker, nearer and nearer, so that you could see the sparks from the tube and hear the fatal whistling, and directed its course straight at the middle of the battalion.

"Lie down," cried a voice.
Michailof and Praskukin lay down on the ground. Praskukin, tightly closing his eyes, heard only how the bomb fell heavily somewhere very near on the hard ground. A second passed—it seemed an hour—and the bomb did not burst. Praskukin began to be afraid that he had done a cowardly act without any reason, that perhaps the bomb had fallen far away and that he only thought he heard the fuse fizzing. He opened his eyes and saw with satisfaction that Michailof lay immovable on the ground near his legs. But his eyes at that moment met the sparkling fuse of the whirling bomb not a yard from him. A horror—a cold horror excluding all other thoughts and feelings—took possession of him. He covered his face with his hands.

Another second passed—a second in which a whole world of feelings, thoughts, hopes, and recollections passed through his mind.

"Whom will it kill; me or Michailof? or both together? If it hits me, where will it hit? in the head, then it's all over; if it hits my leg, they will cut it off and I shall ask them to do it by all means with chloroform—and I can still get through alive. But perhaps it will only kill Michailof—then I can tell how we were walking together, and he was killed and I was splattered with blood. No, it's nearer to me—it will kill me!"

Then he recollected the twelve rubles that he owed Michailof; he recollected also another debt at Petersburg that he ought to have paid long ago; a gipsy air that he had sung in the evening came into his head. The girl whom he loved appeared to his imagination in a cap with lilac ribbons; he remembered a man whom he had insulted years before and who had never paid it back, although at the same time with these and a thousand other remembrances the feeling of his present circumstances—the expectation of death—never for a moment quitted him. "However, perhaps it will not burst," he thought, and with despairing decision wanted to open his eyes. But at that instant through his still shut lids he saw a red fire, and with a horrible noise something hit him in the middle of the breast.

"Thank God! I am only bruised," was his first thought, and he wanted to feel at his breast, but his hands seemed to be bound down, and a weight to keep down his head. The soldiers shone in his eyes and he unconsciously counted them; "one, two, three soldiers, and that one whose overcoat has slipped down is an officer," he thought. Then he saw flashes, and he thought, "what are they firing from, mortars or cannon?" Probably cannon. They are firing again; and there are more soldiers: five, six, seven soldiers, and they all go past." He all at once became afraid that they would leave him there. He wanted to cry out that he was wounded; but his mouth was so dry that his tongue stuck to his palate and a horrible thirst tormented him. He felt how wet he was about the breast. "Really I fell into some blood when I lay down," he thought, and yielding more and more to the fear that the soldiers who were going past would leave him there, he collected all his forces and tried to cry out, "Take me along," but instead of that he groaned so horribly that it was awful to hear his own voice. Then some red fires danced in his eyes, and it seemed to him that the soldiers were laying stones on him; the fires danced quicker and quicker, the stones which they laid on him oppressed him more and more. He made an effort to throw off the stones, stretched out, and then neither saw, nor heard, nor thought, nor felt. He was killed on the spot by a fragment of shell in the middle of his breast.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XIX.

THE WRONG CEREMONY.

An old gentleman of eighty-four having taken to the altar a young damsel of about sixteen, the clergyman said to him, "The font is at the other end of the church." "What do I want with the font?" asked the old gentleman. "Oh! I beg your pardon," said the clerical wit, "I thought you had brought this child to be christened!"

BAPTISM UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

Few persons have had so much to bear in the act of being baptised as Angus, King of Munster, who was a convert of St. Patrick's. According to tradition, about the year 445 the Saint, after converting a large number of people in Ossory, entered Munster. Arriving near Cashel, King Angus, who had already gained some knowledge of Christianity, came forth to meet him with the utmost reverence, and requested baptism at his hands. The Saint willingly complied with his request. His courtiers assembled with royal state to assist at the ceremony. St. Patrick carried in his hand, as usual, his crozier; at the end of this there was a large iron spike, by which he could plant it firmly in the ground beside him while preaching or exercising his episcopal functions. On this occasion, however, he struck it down into the King's foot, and did not perceive his mistake until—

The royal foot transfixed, the gushing blood
Enriched the pavement with a noble flood.

The ceremony had concluded, and the prince neither moved nor complained of the severe suffering he had endured. When the Saint expressed his deep regret for such an occurrence, Angus merely replied that he believed it to be part of the ceremony, and did not appear to consider any suffering of consequence at such a moment.

AN ALARMING QUESTION.

In the life of the Rev. Thomas Collins, an eminent Methodist preacher, lately published, we meet with the following anecdote. Colwall, one of the places which he had to visit, lay beyond a moor, divided by an unbridged brook; at a shallow of the brook the neighbouring peasants had carefully deposited stepping stones; there, and at no other point, might the stream be crossed. The likelihood was small of a stranger on that pathless wild just hitting upon the proper spot. Mr. Collins, therefore, called at the nearest marshide hut to get a guide. His custom, to use his own phrase, was "To feel the pulse of every soul he conversed with." In that walk, however, topics common to wayfarers had uprisen, and ere he was aware the ford was gained. Faithful to his invariable rule—without preface, as time for it was gone—he solemnly asked, "Have you made your peace with God?" The man looked confused, as if he could make nothing of such a query. To put the matter more distinctly, with voice deepening to its lowest tone, Mr. Collins inquired, "Are you prepared to die?" The man turned pale, and, retreating a step or two, replied, in trembling accents, "Sir, I hope you mean no harm!" Stories of "Burking" and "body-snatching" just then had thrilled the country with horror, surpassing anything in the recent panic of garroting. When on that lone heath, by the level light of the declining sun, the stranger saw the left hand fishing for coin—not easily caught in so thinly stocked a pocket—while the right hand of the strong-limbed Evangelist accidentally held up—with apparent menace—a stout oaken staff, he expected nothing less—what could he?—than that a blow to fell him, and a pitch plaster to stop his breath, would be the immediate signal of such doom-suggesting questions. It required many affectionate Christian words to restore the poor fellow's confidence at last.

ANIMALS TRIED AND CONVICTED.

In the course of his researches, Dr. White, the historian of the Huguenots, has come across some odd incidents of the solemn trial, execution, and excommunication of dumb animals. "Marterie quotes the case of a bull that was condemned in 1499 to be hanged for having 'par furiosité, estant aux champs, occis et mis à mort un joine filz de l'age de quatorze ans.' In the archives of Lille there is the certificate of the execution of a pig for having killed and eaten a child. When examining the city muniments at Dijon, I came upon some letters from Nicolas le Jane, lieutenant-general of the bailiwick of Mâcon (18th September, 1474), commanding the treasurer of the Mâconnaise to pay the provost of Mâcon sixty sols tournois for hanging a pig which had killed a child. In this case a new gibbet had been built, the ladder and pulley alone costing ten s's tournois." No one seems to have disputed the injustice of this material punishment, but a nice question arose as to the point of excommunication. Many jurists maintained that, as animals were never in communion, they could not be excommunicated. Nevertheless, the Bishop's Court was the most common resort in all such cases, and Dr. White gives a full account of a singular trial which was protracted through several years in the little town of St. Julien in Savoy. The green caterpillars had done immense damage to the vineyards in 1545, and an action for damages was formally brought against them. Counsel were appointed for the defendants, speeches were spoken, arguments urged, and the whole proceeding went on with the utmost gravity. It issued in a compromise, by which the good people of St. Julien offered the caterpillars "a place of sufficient pasture without the vineyards of St. Julien, such as they can live upon, so that they may no longer eat and lay waste the vineyards aforesaid." Whether the insects accepted this compromise, and whether, if they did, they kept faithfully to the bargain, is not recorded in the archives.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

ON Monday evening the thirty-fifth annual meeting was held at the Memorial Hall. After tea, the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A., presided. In opening the meeting, he said, the institution on behalf of which we have met together is one which can never lose its interest for any of us, and during the past year its operations have been carried on in such a way as, I hope, to encourage us in further efforts and to make us feel that every effort that we can bestow falls short of results which we wish to bring about. We must all rejoice that we have at last housed the Hulme branch of the mission in its new building. (Hear, hear.) To all those working that branch it must be an unmixed gratification to feel that they have large healthy rooms in which they may carry on their schools and also public worship; but to those who have laboured to gather together the funds there is still great regret that the building is burdened by a heavy debt. Instead of opening it free from incumbrance, we feel that we have before us a time of arduous canvassing and earnest imploring of those who ought to give of their abundance to place that building free from embarrassing liabilities. That will be a duty for the incoming committee; and I hope when we gather together again there will not be a single penny of debt on that branch of our work. We have again adopted the plan of circulating the reports previous to the annual meeting. It has this advantage: that we are not obliged to restrict the length of the report, and although we may miss the pleasure of hearing the tones of Mr. Harrop's voice, still we have had the advantage of reading it at leisure and considering its suggestions with more care than we could do in the hurry of an annual meeting. Those who have read that report have doubtless experienced very mingled feelings. While they have felt that there is no appreciable diminution in the enormous mass of evil about us, they must also have been cheered by the belief that our mission is doing something to save the lost and to preserve men from sinking into the condition of the lost. Our missionary can, of course, only give us samples of what is coming under his experience. Cases are classified, and many of the evils are brought before us in a striking, effective way, and none more so than the evils which arise from the want of thrift and prudence in the management of the homes of the poor. It seems to me that there is much to reflect upon here, for we are deeply impressed with the fact of how much wretchedness, and crime arising out of wretchedness, could be avoided if only home affection could be sweetened and made more faithful, and the ordinary comforts could be made more common than they are at present. It is told in the report how from untidiness and neglect on the part of wives, husbands are driven into courses of crime. Surely here there is an opportunity for great usefulness on the part of ladies. There are, I feel sure, numbers in our well-to-do classes that waste in frivolity time that might be given to raising up their less fortunate sisters; and one of the great advantages of our Mission is this, that it constitutes itself a medium through which the different classes of society may be brought together—by which the rich may meet the poor, and bring to bear upon them some of the higher influences of their own state. Those who wish so to exercise a Christian influence have in our mission a means to effect this. Our missionary could at once, for any persons who have time, find fields of usefulness; and I cannot think that the Mission performs its full duty so long as our minister is simply engaged to labour on our behalf, and alone. It must be so to some extent, but I believe we might all do more than we have done—we might all imitate the example of him who went about doing good on a larger scale than we have hitherto believed possible. What we want is a deeper love, a more earnest purpose, a profounder conviction of human brotherhood, and more living faith in the immortality and the infinite importance of every human soul, and a deeper and more heartfelt grief at the sin which degrades it. If we felt these things, we should be ready for more earnest effort and greater self-denial, and our Mission, instead of struggling on with feeble life, performing only half the good of which it is capable, conducted as it is by only a few earnest, faithful men, would be well supported by all classes—by all members of our congregations—and assisted by abundant personal help, which would make it indeed a saving influence in society, and enable it to spread largely in this city the pure principles of righteousness and religion which we profess—(hear, hear)—and the gain to ourselves would be a thousandfold. There is no man who hath left father and mother, husband and wife, sister and brother, for the kingdom of God's sake, who does not receive a thousandfold—who does not gain a nobler self-denial, a larger and a grander faith, a purer hope, a wider benevolence, and a loftier communion with the Saviour of men and the Father whom he served. It is well that we should meet together to think over these things, and it is one of the benefits of our annual gathering that it keeps before the prosperous classes the condition of those about them, which, without such meetings, might go on unnoticed. We cannot read such reports as are furnished from year to year without at least having our minds deeply impressed with a more earnest desire to do something to change the present state of our so-called civilisation, and to bring about that state of things which we feel would be the result of the prevalence of Christian principles; and when I do not say there would be no poverty and no distress—but when poverty and distress would have the sting taken out of them—when there would be more love and a truer culture—and when all men would feel that they stood on one common level before God, in mutual honour and peace as His children. (Applause.)

The Rev. J. BLACK, in a thoughtful speech, moved a very cordial vote of sympathy with the missionaries, thanking the Rev. J. Harrop for his valuable report, and also giving to the Rev. B. Walker a hearty welcome as the missionary at Rochdale-road, which was seconded by Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE.

Addresses in response were then delivered by the Revs. J. HARROP and B. WALKER, after which the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL (Secretary) read the committee's report:

"The work of the society for the year had been marked by unusual variety. Early in the year Mr. Robinson had resigned the charge of Rochdale-road, to which the Rev. B. Walker had been appointed for six months, and he is now working there, already with excellent effect. A new master had been appointed for the day-school. Very extensive repairs had been required, owing to the violent storm in the early part of the year, and there was still a deficiency upon them of £104. The Hulme Mission had entered on its new premises in Embden-street, which, they regreted to say, had to be opened with a debt of £301 on them. The attendance on the services and the schools had increased since the removal." The report closed by presenting for adoption certain resolutions directing the settlement of the property at both the stations on trust "to be held at the use and disposal of the society for the promotion of its objects, namely, the diffusion of religious and other elevating influences by ministering among the poor in Manchester and the neighbourhood in such wise that no denominational or sectarian name or test shall at any time or in any form be introduced into the management of the trust."

Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE read the financial statement, which showed in hand £24. 8s. 7d., as against £42. 16s. 4d. last year. The nett amount which the society had had to contribute, had been, at Rochdale-road Mission £214. 10s. 11d., and at Embden-street £250. 10s. 6d. In the special funds there was owing at Rochdale-road, for repairs and rebuilding class rooms, and damage done by storm, £104. 0s. 10d. The total cost of Embden-street schools had been £2,940. 18s. 10d., and £300 worth of invested property had had to be sold to meet part of this; but, as mentioned in the report, a large deficiency still remained. Mr. Darbishire made an earnest appeal for more liberal and efficient support.

The adoption of the reports was carried on the motion of the Rev. WM. GASKELL, seconded by Mr. C. J. HERFORD; and, on the motion of the Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, seconded by Mr. THOS. BRITAIN, the committee and officers for the ensuing year were appointed.

In addition to those taking part in the meeting there were present the Rev. W. H. Herford, B.A., Messrs. Richd. Aspden, J. Armstrong, G. J. Taylor, H. Bowman, and Dr. Marcus.

INTELLIGENCE.

BARNARD CASTLE.—A meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening last, the Rev. Wm. Elliott in the chair. The treasurer submitted a statement of the finances relating to the building fund, from which it appeared that satisfactory progress was being made with the subscription list. Mr. Joseph Lee was appointed on behalf of the congregation to solicit donations from friends in the provincial districts. A letter was read from the Rev. J. J. Taylor, principal of Manchester New College, heartily wishing the congregation success in the effort which they are now making to erect a place of worship worthy of their past history and their present numbers and zeal. A sketch of the proposed building, kindly prepared by Mr. Harrison, of Manchester, was laid before the meeting, and a committee appointed to consider the same and to manage the matters connected with the new property. The Rev. J. C. Street, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, was received as a deputation from the Northumberland and Durham District Missionary Association, to confer with the congregation on the subject of making Barnard Castle the centre of a district for missionary effort, embracing Crook, Darlington, Bishop Auckland, &c., and proposing that one of the missionaries employed by the association should reside at Barnard Castle. The conditions, pecuniary and otherwise, laid down by Mr. Street were acceded to by the congregation.

CREWE.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached on Sunday week by the Rev. W. Gaskell, M.A. In the evening we had the largest congregation there has been in the chapel since it was opened. The annual tea meeting held the following evening was well attended, and much cheered by the unexpected presence of Thomas Avison, Esq., of Liverpool. We had also the pleasure on this occasion to welcome amongst us for the first time the Rev. James McDonald, who has lately settled in Nantwich.

DERBY.—On Wednesday, March 31st, a new organ was opened in the Friargate chapel, the service being conducted by the Rev. William Oates. The musical arrangements were presided over by the organist of St. Alkmund's church, and on the following Tuesday evening there was a public performance on the organ by the organist of the Roman Catholic Church. The instrument is a powerful and brilliant-toned one, with twenty stops, and two octaves and a third of pedals, and it has been pronounced by competent judges to be remarkably fine and complete for its size. It has been built by Mr. Porritt, of Leicester, at a cost of £220. The whole of the funds for the purchase of the organ have been raised by the zealous efforts of members of the congregation, in conjunction with their late minister.

HINCKLEY.—The teachers and children of the Great Meeting Sunday-schools have embraced the opportunity of the recent marriage of their valued superintendent, Mr. A. Atkins, to present him with a small token of their esteem and regard, consisting of an elegant gold pencil-case, with which another small trinket was enclosed in a note by one of the teachers, which was answered by a letter of graceful acknowledgment by Mr. Atkins.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—We understand that the annual meeting of this association will be held on Whit Thursday, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and not at Radley's Hotel, as heretofore, and that the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A. will preside on the occasion.

MANCHESTER: 'ROCHDALE-ROAD MISSION.—The tenth annual soirée was held on Saturday evening, the 24th inst. About sixty-five persons sat down to tea, after which the Rev. B. Walker occupied the chair. Mr. A. Jones read the report for session 1868-9, which showed that the society numbered thirty members. During the session essays and lectures of a very beneficial and instructive character had been given. The society had done much good, and an appeal was made for new members. The report was then adopted. Mr. Harry Rawson then delivered an address on the benefits which arise from societies of this description; and, by way of encouragement, enrolled himself as one of the members, and his example was followed by several other gentlemen, after which the meeting was closed with prayer.

NEWCHURCH.—On Saturday afternoon the annual meeting of the United Mutual Improvement Societies was held at the above place. About fifty members were present. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. J. Freeston, and reports read of the societies at Todmorden, Rochdale (which indicated much progress), and Newchurch. The meeting was addressed by the chairman and other members. A number of minerals and fossils collected in the neighbourhood by a member of the Newchurch society were described by Mr. Aiken, and it was thought this feature of the meeting might in future be extended with great profit to the members.

PADHAM.—On Tuesday evening week a tea-party took place in the school-room, Mr. J. Anderton presiding. The object was to present a harmonium and baton to Mr. F. Holland, who had laboured nearly forty years as a teacher, and also as leader and conductor of the singers. Mr. Whittaker made the presentation in a very cordial address on behalf of the teachers, scholars, and friends of the Unitarian Sunday-school. Mr. Holland acknowledged the gift with much feeling. He did not expect being rewarded, and he was not working for any reward, but because he loved the work. He thanked them for the kindness they had shown him.—The instrument is in a mahogany case, and has several stops; it is valued at sixteen guineas. The baton is of ivory, beautifully carved, and valued at two and a-half guineas.

THE COMING WEEK.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

At the Annual Meeting, held at University Hall, Gordon-square, on the 10th May, 1869, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, M.P., in the chair, the following resolutions were passed:

Moved by the CHAIRMAN, seconded by the Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN—

1. That the Reports of the Treasurer and Committee be received and adopted, and, together with the Reports of the Missionaries, be printed and circulated.

Moved by Mr. A. LAWRENCE, seconded by Mr. E. ENFIELD—

2. That this meeting tenders its best thanks to the Rev. S. A. Steinhilber for his services yesterday in aid of this Society.

Moved by Rev. S. A. STEINHILBER, seconded by Mr. T. C. CLAYDEN—

3. That this meeting desires to express its unabated interest in the work of the Mission, and the warmest appreciation of the faithful efforts of the Missionaries; and trusts that, as new modes of action are suggested by which the influence of the Mission may be extended, means will be found for carrying them into execution.

Moved by the Rev. J. MARTINEAU, seconded by Mr. H. PALMER—

4. That this Meeting gratefully acknowledges the measure of success which has attended the several branches of the Mission during the past year, and thankfully recognises the value of the services rendered by those who have co-operated with the Missionaries in carrying on the work.

Moved by the Rev. Dr. SADLER, seconded by the Rev. J. WORTHINGTON—

5. That this Meeting rejoices to hear the satisfactory reports of the Day Schools, and would express its thanks to the several Teachers for the manner in which they have been conducted, and its belief that by the education of the children they are efficiently aiding in the work of the moral and religious improvement of the poor.

Moved by Mr. F. COLLIER, seconded by Mr. S. S. TAYLER—

That the following gentlemen be the officers for the ensuing year:—Treasurer, Mr. P. M. Martineau. Committee, Rev. P. W. Clayton, Rev. J. C. Means, Messrs. T. C. Clarke, J. T. Hart, J. S. Lister, R. A. Marsden, A. Preston, H. Sharpe, Jun., J. Warren, E. Worsley (with power to add to their number, not to exceed twelve), auditors, Messrs. Archer Simons and Russell Scott, Jun. Hon. Secretary, Mr. E. Enfield.

On the motion of the Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, the thanks of the meeting were given to the Lord Mayor for his kindness in presiding on this occasion.

DUNDEE UNITARIAN CHURCH.

Subscriptions from the friends of the cause of Unitarian Christianity are solicited on behalf of the Building Fund. The present meeting place (a public hall) costs about £40 annually, available only on Sundays. If the congregation, which is purely of a missionary character, could be relieved of this expense, the cause would be nearly self-supporting. Last year £104 were raised for congregational purposes. About £1,500 will be needed.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

News has been received of the baptism, in one of the churches of the London Missionary Society, of the Queen of Madagascar, together with some of her officers of State. The Bishop whom it is proposed to send out will arrive, therefore, a little too late.

In the recent debates on religious liberty in the Spanish Cortes, one of the speakers estimated the annual emoluments of the clergy at £10,400,000.

A correspondent of the Daily Telegraph gives an account of the Festival of the Holy Blood, which he saw celebrated at Bruges the other day. Girls dressed in white, tricked out with golden garlands and wings to represent angels; an innumerable company of priests, with crucifixes and images; boys in red, carrying banners, with the Pontifical arms, and escutcheons festooned together with golden chains to represent the Immaculate Conception, the Sacramental Jubilee of Pius IX., and the Œcumenic Council; cavalry and military bands; men scattering imitation flowers; blind men led by deaf and dumb men; archbishops and bishops in their golden mitres, bestowing benedictions, made up an immense procession, for the purpose of bearing about the swarming streets the most precious treasure of Bruges—a chasse or reliquary containing a few drops of the blood of our Saviour, squeezed by Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus from the sponge, after washing the body which they had taken down from the cross!

We learn from the Record that it is right to speak of "such Ultramontanists as Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bruce, and Sir J. D. Coleridge." The previous week it taught us to call the Marquis of Salisbury, the Earl of Carnarvon, and some other peers, "sacerdotal Ultramontanists!"

From the annual report of the Bible Society it appears that the receipts from ordinary sources for the year ending March 31 reached the sum of £176,489. 5s. 1d. To this must be added £1,500. 10s. 7d. received for the China fund, £3,645. 0s. 4d. for the special fund for Spain, and £6,317. 13s. 9d. further contributions to the building fund, making a total of £187,952. 9s. 9d. The ordinary payments had amounted to £173,542. 13s. 1d., and adding the sum paid on account of the Jubilee, China, and Spain funds, the total had reached £178,139. 10s. 4d. If to this sum were added £9,397. 12s. 1d. paid on account of the society's new premises, the total expenditure of the year had amounted to £187,537. 2s. 5d. The society was under engagements to the extent of £98,651. 18s. 2d. The issues of the society for the year had been as follows:—From the dépôt at home, 1,129,618; from dépôts abroad, 1,011,002 copies. The total issues of the society now amounted to 57,210,485 copies. When the Rev. Thos. Charles, of Bala, conceived the idea of a Bible Society for Wales, then for England, and shortly afterwards for the world, he could scarcely have had any conception to what it would grow.

According to the Record, at the recent marriage of the Hon. C. L. Wood, president of the English Church Mission, with Lady Alice Courtenay, at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, "the Ritualistic foolery" exceeded anything seen at a wedding before. "Not a few of those present were greatly scandalised at the idolatrous prostration before the altar by some of those who officiated. The grovelling attitude of the Hon. and Rev. Canon Courtenay, whom Mr. Disraeli declined to promote to the Deanery of Exeter, was particularly conspicuous; and at one time, as we are informed, scarcely anything but his heels were visible."

The Rock states that a fund is being raised for the defence of the Rev. Charles Voysey, whom the Archbishop of York has undertaken to prosecute for heresies, vented in "The Sling and the Stone," and other publications. Among the names on the committee are those of Lord Amberley, Sir Charles Lyell, Professor Jowett, and the Dean of Westminster.

Mrs. H. Law, who has been lecturing in some of the large towns as a freethinker, caused great excitement in Nottingham on Sunday evening. She was addressing a large crowd in the market-place, and denouncing in her usual outrageous manner all forms of religion, when Mr. Dupe, "a converted butcher," appeared upon the scene, and mounting a cab called on his followers, who had mustered in force, to join in a hymn, and for a few minutes the lady's voice was drowned by this. Three other preachers planted themselves around the stand from which she was speaking, and the din, as may be supposed, was deafening. At length cabbage heads began to fly about, and there was every likelihood of a fight between the two parties, when the mayor came on the ground with a body of police, and compelled the crowd to disperse. Not to be defeated, however, the freethinking lady retreated to another market-place, where she preached on the French Revolution till a shower of rain induced her congregation to take the liberty of dispersing.

A week or two since we read in the English Independent that the Rev. J. A. Picton had resigned the charge of the Gallowtree-gate congregation, Leicester, and that a meeting had passed a resolution "heartily and earnestly assuring Mr. Picton of its high appreciation of his ministrations, and of its sympathy with him under present circumstances; and further, that the requirements of the town indicate the necessity of a church being formed on a freer and more liberal basis." Knowing something of Mr. Picton, and respecting him as a sincere and earnest inquirer after Christian truth, we were anxious to learn what the circumstances were which had led him to sever his connection with his congregation. We are now informed that he wished to go a little faster than his church were disposed to go, and considered that, instead of a creed being insisted on as a test for church membership, a certificate or an admission from the minister ought to be sufficient. The majority of the "church," it seems, were against him, and he therefore sent in his resignation at once, and accepted an invitation to succeed the Rev. W. Kirkus in his pastorate at Hackney.

The theological statute has again been introduced in the Oxford Congregation, according to the provisions of which, a student may, after passing Moderations in his fifth term, a period a little over a year from his matriculation, be relieved from all secular studies, and obtain the degree of B.A. for attainments purely theological. A fourth class, which will qualify for the same degree, may be obtained simply by a knowledge of St. Paul's Epistles in the original Greek, and of some one subject, such as dogmatic theology or ecclesiastical history, in addition to the trifling theological knowledge now required of all candidates for a degree. The work thus demanded is so small that young men preparing for orders will be strongly tempted to take this road to their degree. From what was said by two or three of the promoters of the statute, it seems likewise that there is a probability that not merely knowledge will be expected but "sound" opinions at the examinations, and the theological animosity already existing at Oxford be intensified, and the value of a degree be very much lowered.

On Tuesday, the annual session of the Congregational Union was held in London. The Rev. R. W. Dale, of Birmingham, the chairman for the year, delivered an address, lasting for nearly two hours, upon the leading questions of the day, and pointed out that the living personal Christ, and not dogmatic teachings and theories, was the answer to every one of them. From the report it appeared that the income of the Union for the year had been £5,570. 3s. 7d., and that a large number of publications had been circulated.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Madrid correspondent of the Star writes:

"The avidity with which religious information is sought is something astounding. The propagandism commenced years ago; but the Rev. Dr. Rule, a Wesleyan, who was at Gibraltar in 1836, appears to be most prominently connected with the first organised effort for disseminating the principles of religious freedom. He found an energetic coadjutor in Donna Marguerite de Barrea, originally a nun. This woman married, became a widow, fell into poverty, became a domestic servant, and ultimately took service in Dr. Rule's family at Cadiz. In later times the persecution suffered by Vatanoros and his companions stimulated the spirit of inquiry, and people turned against the power which sentenced men to death for simply reading the Scriptures. In November, last year, the London Religious Tract Society commenced its labours. A small number of tracts found immediate circulation. A stall was then established at the entrance of a passage in the Carrera di San Geronimo, which was speedily furnished with copies of the Gospels and with Bibles. At first these were given away, but the demand exceeded the supply, and the concourse was so great it was found necessary to sell the books. As many as 3,000 copies of the Gospels were sold in one day. Upwards of 5,000,000 of tracts have been given away, and on Good Friday the Puerta del Sol resembled a vast reading-room, for almost every promenade had a tract. It is estimated that 200,000 Gospels have been disposed of, and an edition of 1,000,000 is now being printed. Then, apart from the regular Sunday Protestant services, others are held in the week, which are attended by women in considerable numbers. One lady here is very energetic and bold. She was in Valladolid a year or two ago, her purpose being to distribute Bibles. She attended Catholic service at the cathedral there, and when it was over she walked quietly up to the altar and laid a copy of the Scriptures upon it. She was arrested and imprisoned, but shortly afterwards liberated, powerful influence having been exercised in her favour. There is now an opening for the circulation of any number of tracts, and many Roman Catholic priests are prepared to profess Protestantism."

The Church News, in an article on the Spanish Protestants, thus speaks out its mind:

"We have no sympathy whatever with continental Protestantism: we believe it to be both heretical and schismatical, to be without the Faith, without sacraments, and without orders, and to be but an advanced guard of infidelity. But we do not regret the establishment of these schismatical congregations in Spain; we rejoice to hear of the zeal of the ministers, and their labours among the people, not that we think they will do good to the people themselves, but that we think they will rouse the Spanish Church out of lethargy. Cholera was a scourge, but a necessary one. It taught us to carry off our sewage, and to whitewash dirty walls; and we are in hopes that the pest of Protestantism now invading Spain may teach the Church of that land to purify and reform what is bad, superstitious, and profane in its rites, its administration, and the mode of life of its clergy."

The Economist says it is clear that the Cortes is not a "Catholic" assembly, and in Catholic countries the alternatives are usually Catholicism and disbelief. The ancient syllogism—Christianity is Catholicism; Catholicism is false, therefore Christianity is false—still impresses the minds of Spaniards, most of whom have scarcely heard of any other form of Christian doctrine. How deep down this infidelity has spread is a question upon which no certainty is possible. It must not be forgotten that in all Catholic countries Liberals, even when themselves very moderate, are under a strong temptation to elect men of extreme anti-religious opinions, for the same reason which induces so many towns in Austria to elect Jews. Such men can be trusted not to yield to the Church, and to the Continental Liberal "the Church" is still a potent influence with which it is his permanent duty to contend. The members, therefore, of the Spanish Cortes are likely to be many degrees more hostile to religion than their constituents are.

Bishops just now seem rather at a discount. The Church Times says:

"Taught by the experience of the past, we are by no means enthusiastic in favour of augmenting the number of our ecclesiastical rulers at the present time. As to the debate on Lord Lytton's Bill, we are glad to find ourselves at one with the Guardian in the belief that the bishops, by the tone of their speeches, make more converts to the policy of disestablishment in one evening than the Liberation Society could do in twenty years. They have virtually asserted that spiritual peerages and Episcopal duties are incompatible."

The Christian World remarks,

"That restless individual, the Rev. Brewin Grant, who never seems to be happy out of hot water, threatens to disturb the meetings of the Congregational Union. His name has been omitted from the list of ministers published in the Congregational Year-book, and he has the vanity to suppose that his having taken sides with the Tories against Mr. Gladstone's measure for doing an act of justice to Ireland is the cause of the omission. Of course there is no truth whatever in the assertion, which is simply and pitifully absurd. In answer to his petition for restoration, the Assembly need only refer him to the standing rule of admission to the roll, and instruct him to act upon it if he really wishes his name to appear therein again. It is very possible, indeed, that some more perfect method than the one now acted upon in respect of the insertion and omission of names may be devised; but at all events it is quite certain that Mr. Grant has no special cause of complaint, and ought to be told so in a way not to be mistaken either by himself or by those State-Churchmen and Unitarians, who, in the Record and the Inquirer, are gleefully patting him on the back."

In addressing a meeting of electors at Liskeard the other night, Mr. Horsman said:

"No doubt the disestablishment of the Irish Church would affect the English Church. Whether it did so for good or evil would depend upon the course taken by the dignitaries of the English Church when the question came before the House of Lords. If the Bishops maintained that the two Churches were inseparably connected, and that if one went the other must, he should say, 'The Lord have mercy on the establishment that is tied to the Irish Church!'

In commencing his annual visitation at Chorley on Sunday, the archdeacon of Manchester seems to have spoken on one or two points sensibly and liberally. He doubted the policy which had led the House of Lords to alter the Church Rates Bill so as to retain the old machinery, though the power to work it was gone. He said:

"He feared the forms thus jealously reserved might check that spirit of liberality, without which, in these times, a church could not live, and which the levying of church rates had already too much weakened. He feared that what was the duty of all might be thrown upon a few, and that they would be all the slower in learning the lesson which Roman Catholics and Dissenters alike taught them—that the fabrics and the service of their churches ought to be supported by the free, unanimous, and generous contributions of all who benefited by them." "Real friends of the church must feel that the old lines were no longer tenable, that all recent legislation led rather towards the recognition of all forms of religion than to the protection or exaltation of one above the rest, and that under those circumstances it might be wise to educate the Church to rely on its own inherent resources, and on its faithful and unquestioned members." "Last year he recommended the offertory as the easiest and most scriptural way of collecting the contributions of all who, according to their means, should be ready to give. He did not in the least degree withdraw that recommendation. He believed it to be sound and good, and that it needed only to be approved. He knew no other way by which the whole body of the faithful could bear their share of the common burden. It had been largely and generally blessed."

The Guardian, after remarking that the Irish clergy appear to be awakening to the fact that the Anglo-Catholic Church must cease to exist, as an Establishment, in their country, adds:

"If the Church is to win its way into the hearts of the people of Ireland—if she is to be a living, useful Church, in the future—the clergy and laity must put their shoulders to the wheel, and show the people that her life, and her power for usefulness, do not lie in State patronage and State support, but in her Divine origin, and in her inherent strength and vitality."

In a recent lecture the Rev. J. C. Ryle justly described the Act of Uniformity as a wretched Act, by means of which 2,000 of the best clergy of the age were turned out of the Church of England and lost to her ranks for ever. One of the Church papers having called his statement in question, he confirms it by references to various works of authority, and shows that not 2,000 but 2,257 were ejected, and contends that it is one of the causes of the sad heresies and divisions of the present day. It laid the foundation of an immense mass of Nonconformity, and inflicted wounds on the Church of England which will never be healed.

As we mentioned a fortnight ago, the English Independent, in arguing against "the dissolution of the church into the congregation," declared that this was the "simple and solitary cause" of the "uniform declension of the Presbyterian churches of the eighteenth century into Unitarianism," and likewise attributed "solely to this one cause" the rise of Unitarianism in Independent Churches of America. On this the Leicester Chronicle and Mercury of Saturday has the following pithy commentary:

"It appears, then, from this allegation of the English Independent, that Evangelical Dissent is only saved from heterodoxy by the mode of organisation which religious communities adopt; the truth in itself having no potency apart from ecclesiastical organisation. But for the barrier interposed between the 'church' and the congregation, therefore, Unitarianism would be invincible. Christian churches are not safe from the inroads of that system in consequence of any inherent vitality or power in the orthodox doctrines themselves, we understand the writer to say, but only by virtue of the ecclesiastical machinery with which they are associated. Abolish the machinery, and Unitarianism is supreme. Surrender the shell, and the kernel ceases to exist. Such is the teaching of the English Independent. We confess we were hardly prepared for such a large admission on the part of the professed organ of English Independency. It must be highly gratifying to the Inquirer, and the Unitarian body, to find that so small a matter as external form and social discipline is avowed to be all that hinders Independent churches from becoming Unitarians by wholesale. The inference must be that the tenets of those churches are quite secondary concerns—that their truth has but feeble influence—if the organisation be all-in-all. We fancy that this kind of doctrine has long existed on a very large scale. The Church of Rome in effect holds it entirely—the Church of England, as a State Church, partially—and it underlies the conceptions of all those who believe that religion is not a personal affair, but a something derivable from and associated with an external authority. If it be so, our ideas of infallible Churches and State Churches require considerable modification, in accordance with the principles laid down by the English Independent."

Reviewing a work entitled "England versus Rome," in noticing its argument for the sufficiency of Scripture, the Guardian considers the quotations to the point from the Bible itself to be simply irrelevant, and says:

"The 'Scriptures' of the 2nd of Timothy are the Old Testament without the New. And even had both been included, Scripture may be 'profitable' without being complete. The denunciations at the end of Deuteronomy and the Apocrypha belong respectively to the books to which they are appended. And Pharisaic tradition contradicted the Law as well as added to it. Mr. Swete writes, indeed, as if he held still the old conventional fiction, that the Scriptures were written with the formal purpose of revealing the faith ab initio. Surely there is but one real argument in the case, although that is a conclusive one. The New Testament has come to be to us, by the force of circumstances, what it was not to the first Christians—viz., the sole sufficient evidence of fundamental doctrine, simply because there actually is no other. Give us fair proof—such as a good and reasonable Christian man ought to accept—that the Apostles taught any essential doctrine to which the New Testament does not even allude, and of course we must admit that doctrine. But there is no such doctrine, and there is no such proof."

A correspondent of the same paper writes:

"You will perhaps receive expostulations from other quarters against your remarks on disestablishment; and therefore I may be allowed to assure you, on the other side, that the feeling among those whom I meet is taking very much the form of an earnest wish that all Bishops, save those near London, should cease to be Peers. I have known the whole scheme for Confirmations in this diocese (Exeter) thrown over for three months, when we had all our candidates ready, by Bishop Phillpotts flying up to London for a debate. I have been forty years a Priest, and never (except once in 1833 with Bishop J. B. Sumner) had anything like a confidential conversation with a Bishop."

At the annual meeting of the British and Foreign School Society, Earl Russell, who presided, spoke in favour of carrying out, under certain circumstances, the rating principle, and expressed the opinion that any system of training should be accompanied by a course of religious teaching. At the same time he said:

"We stand here for the support of that Christianity which should animate us all, leaving to the churches and chapels of the land to disseminate those views of Christian doctrine which they believe to be conformable to truth. For my own part, it has happened to me lately to consult the various formularies of our various Churches—those of our own Church of England, of the Presbyterian Church, and of the Roman Catholic Church—but I find in none of them so good a sermon as the Sermon on the Mount. I find in none of them so plain, and so wholesome, and so holy a creed as that which was given by Jesus Christ to his disciples and to the world. It is that doctrine that we have given in our British schools. . . . It is, I consider, a great misfortune that at the beginning of its school career, now more than sixty years ago, the Established Church did not consent to proceed on the same principle—viz., to give that religious instruction which they thought right according to the doctrines of the Church of England, but omitting all distinctive religious teaching in the schools, and combining all in their schools through the teaching of the Bible."

As a set-off against the proposal of Mr. Davidson that Unitarians should be "summarily suppressed" in Perth, we may give a passage or two from a powerful sermon preached on Sunday last, by the Rev. Mr. Wallace, the Independent minister in that town, as reported by the Dundee Advertiser. Enlarging on the influence of Christ's humanity, he said:

"You believe in Christ as God, but depend upon it if you do not know Christ the man your other belief goes for naught." No man was ever saved solely by a belief in Christ's divinity. There are thousands of men who live in that belief, but who lead most God-forgotten lives. You speak against Unitarianism; let it alone. You frown upon the Unitarian; let him alone, he may be a better man than you. I am no Unitarian, but I believe that thousands of them are going into the Kingdom of God, because they lead nobler lives than some of us do.

We speak of Christ's Divinity, but let me tell you, Christ himself dwelt very little upon that in his teaching, for he knew as a man alone he could lead men, and he delighted to speak of himself as man, as the Son of man." "You speak of the power of a book. I tell you the power of a book is nothing to the power of a life. There is no influence more God-like, no influence deeper, greater, and mightier, than the influence of the true man—of a true man's life. My hearers, Jesus Christ is not as a book, not as a philosophy, not as a theology, not as a man of science in his system of truth; but as a great, true, living, loving, human soul, with whom we may meet every day, and every hour of every day. 'Whom having not seen we love,' Christ draws us to himself as a man."

REVIEWS.

The Edinburgh Review. April, 1869.

THE leading article treats of Confucius in a learned and appreciative manner, according to him a higher rank as a moral and even religious teacher than Dr. Legge, with all his interest in the Chinese philosopher, has been willing to concede. Of the value of his moral teaching there is no question. But his religious doctrine is very scanty; a blank, which the reviewer is perhaps inclined to fill up as readily with affirmations as other critics have interpreted it in a negative sense. Thus: when Confucius speaks of Heaven rather than of God, the reviewer thinks the vagueness implies less a vagueness in the sage's conception of an eternal and omnipotent power, than a desire to avoid expressions with regard to the Deity which would lead the people to low and degrading belief in gods many and lords many. His great regard for the filial relation, with its duties and its amenities, leads him to make the Emperor the Father of his people, and to find in him, as an earthly ruler, the personal authority which the idea of Heaven failed to provide in a personal Deity. His regard for funeral ceremonies may be the substitute for that doctrine of a future life which his honest sense of ignorance forbade him to entertain or teach. And, in general, he is silent as to the supernatural. Had he foreseen the door he would thus leave open for the introduction of the degrading superstitions of modern China, he might have felt it his duty to provide against such a result. Instead of leaving the field of the unknown altogether undescribed, he might have expressed his modest ignorance in some definite form, which should have prevented others from supplying the void with gross and degrading superstitions. His private and public life were blameless and conscientious, and his philosophy, though wanting in imagination and in "faith," has repeatedly "caught glimpses of a heaven far beyond the range of its ordinary ken and vision," and benefited his nation through a long succession of ages.

An article on the Settlement of Ulster gives a valuable contribution to an understanding of the Irish land question. It enters, in the latter part, into ecclesiastical matters, and praises Mr. Gladstone's measure for its justice and ability in accomplishing a work which the public feeling of the whole country has selected him to undertake, "not so much from regard to his genius, conscientiousness, and zeal, as because he fitly represents the feelings and tendencies of the country and the age."

Church Comprehension. A Letter to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P. Longmans.

THE letter before us is a calm and dispassionate view of the existing state of religious parties in England, and a calm, comprehensive, and truly large and liberal consideration of the mode in which our present miserable sectarian divisions and isolations may be healed, and something in the shape of a national, orderly, equitable, and dignified ecclesiastical administration take their place. It is obvious that we must refer our readers to the letter itself for the details of the mode in which it is proposed to carry out this bold, free, and yet comprehensive scheme. But we may, at least, say that we fully endorse the opinion of the Rev. C. Voysey, first communicated to the author's publisher, and then, by Mr. Voysey's permission, made known to the public, that "The pamphlet surprises me by its mastery of practical details, and delights me by its wise and liberal spirit."

The first principle which the author of the letter advocates as essential to the re-adjustment of our National Church is the admission of variety of opinion. He reasons, we think conclusively, in saying—

"We appeal to thoughtful Christian minds of every sect, and would ask them this question—Do you not think if the Saviour whom we acknowledge had intended his church to be founded on a dogmatic formula, do you not think that he would have left us that formula, or caused it to be given us by the hands of his Apostles? If any one should reply that the Gospel, the words of Christ, or the letters of the Apostles are dogmatic, in some respects—for that, indeed, religion cannot be conceived of except as involving, or existing under, some dogmatic form—we are not unwilling to accept the statement. But we would add to it the remark that we ought then to keep to the Gospel itself, the words of Christ, or of his Apostles, that we ought to keep to them, and only ask for assent to dogmatic forms in so far as they place such forms before us."—pp. 41, 42.

It being conceded, therefore, that the proposed and inevitable freedom of interpretation and of speech would lead to "the members of the Church grouping themselves round certain centres, according as they found the tone of thought and sentiment there prevailing, adapted to edify, to comfort, to guide, and to strengthen their different minds," our author proceeds to describe this acknowledged and admitted state of things as far better than the present, and says

"So rich and varied a store of thought and sentiment, of moral and spiritual instruction and impulse, would, by God's grace, be the heritage of the future Church. But even in the presence of such diversities, if their experience be an evil, we should not be in any worse position than we are at this moment. Exactly such and so great are the diversities now before our eyes in English Christianity; and along with them, too, an amount of controversial asperity and unbrotherly alienation far more injurious than the differences themselves—in fact, leading to the latter their main importance."—p. 47.

He would contemplate, then, without dismay nay with satisfaction, Mr. Voysey, Dr. Cumming, Mr. Spurgeon, Dr. Pusey, Mr. Maurice, Professor Mansell, Dr. R. Williams, and other varieties of Churchmen, with the Congregationalist, Methodist, and Unitarian, advocating freely their respective convictions, in their several places of worship, as now—only, with mutual allowance, instead of mutual rancour and condemnation, and he ventures to think that the latter unchristian feelings would be checked not strengthened.

"If all these different preachers and teachers were brought to think of each other as equal members of the one visible Church of Christ, and of the one great Church of a Christian nation—each possessing the same rights and privileges as every one else; each accountable only to the great Judge of all for what he might say to his hearers, and for the practical influence of his words upon their lives, we venture to affirm that it would not tend to lessen this feeling of responsibility, but only to increase it, if every man engaged in the work of the ministry felt that he was speaking as a member, not of some little sectarian Church, but of the one great Church of England in the widest extent in which it could exist as a Christian Church."—p. 47.

This, strange and horrible as it may appear to many of the infallibles of the Christian Church, is the only form in which a National Church can now exist; and if it is not to be allowed to exist in this, it can no longer be allowed to exist in any other—it must be destroyed. At least we trust the huge injustice and folly are not to be perpetrated in England, which, on a small scale, under peculiar circumstances, we are permitting to be perpetrated in Ireland—the divestment of the nation, by itself of its own property and all its control over it, and the selection, and investment with it, of one sect, already inequitably intolerated exclusive though temporary possession of it. Our author does not blink the difficulty arising from the existence of a non-Christian and a Roman Catholic population, and does not dream of their possible comprehension in the Christian Church of England. The first he would simply leave free and untaxed for any ecclesiastical purpose. This is all he thinks such a minority could justly claim. To the Roman Catholics he would restore an equitable portion of the ecclesiastical property of the country. In re-distributing the revenues he would take all existing churches and chapels, and where not already possessed of endowments adequate to their congregations and requirements, he would endow them to the required extent. Supposing there may be 33,000 of such places he would distribute the revenues in the following proportions:

Class I.	8,000 at £250 equal to	£2,000,000
" II.	8,000 at £180	" £1,440,000
" III.	12,000 at £150	" £1,800,000
" IV.	10,000 at £120	" £1,200,000

Total £6,440,000

There would still be "a surplus of £560,000 out of which to meet expenses of management, and to form the nucleus of a surplus fund available for other purposes."

In all churches and chapels aided by the national funds a proportion of the building should be reserved for the free use of the people. Those congregations which declined to do this, would not receive from the national funds, but would still belong to the National Church under the legal conditions. Each Church should have its district assigned to it, not necessarily, but generally, so as to preserve as far as possible the parochial system of local responsibility and local superintendence and work.

In Church government our author would leave the existing communities as far as they desired it in general possession of their present officers and government. He thinks that time would obliterate many of these divisions, and lead to the adoption of some prevailing forms. The Episcopal branch would retain its Bishops and its ordination, but they would interchange services with all other, even not Episcopally ordained, ministers, and congregations would have an equal latitude of choice in the appointment of their ministers. The number of bishops and dioceses would probably be augmented, but the whole united church would be sufficiently represented by the archbishops in the House of Lords. The liturgy should be revised so as to approximate more to the words of Scripture. There would be courts for deciding differences—with power of suspension or deprivation in cases of immorality. A minimum of education would be required in every minister of the national Church, but this would not preclude lay aid. In describing such contemplated arrangements we do not, of course, commit ourselves in any way to an assent to them. We especially think that no revision of the liturgy can be successful, which forcibly alters anything in it. The principle adopted must be at present—as in the American Book of Common Prayer—that of alternative, and permitted change—not exacted change. To persons unaccustomed to speculations of the kind, proposals such as are made in this letter may appear at first very wild and impossible, but they are nevertheless many of them very well worthy of adoption, and all worthy of consideration.

PROGRESS.

THE Ven. John Sinclair, Archdeacon of Middlesex, delivered a charge the other day which the Fall Mall regards as "a curious illustration of the style of reasoning prevalent amongst that fortunate class which is allowed to talk indefinitely without any danger of being answered." The text on which he dilated was "Progress." Our contemporary, while demurring to some of his conclusions, does not desire to argue the general question with him, but, taking up the application of his theory to Church Establishments, it says:—"The presumption which he apparently intends to combat is the very common one, sound or unsound, that the progress of society in various ways tends to make Church Establishments impossible, that there is a kind of repulsive force which is more and more distinctly separating Church from State, and bursting the bonds which have hitherto held them together. To rebut this presumption he should have shown that there is nothing in progress, as the word is understood by intelligent people, which tends to weaken the connection, and that an establishment is as compatible with modern as with ancient forms of society. What he actually states is as follows:—From the earliest times, he says, the Church was ready to accept endowments: to which we may add that it is likely enough to show the same graceful readiness to all future times. Again, nobody imagined that Constantine did anything retrogressive when he disestablished heathendom and placed the Church in union with the State. Further, the voluntary principle was not thought of when the barbarians were converted to Christianity, nor is it sanctioned by the English Episcopalians or Dissenters, or by Scotch Presbyterians, or by Lutherans, Calvinists, or Zwinglians on the Continent. 'The decision of the Church thus repeatedly pronounced might,' he says, 'have been expected to preclude all further controversy, and to place beyond dispute the fact that endowment and establishment were in accordance with and not opposed to the spirit of Christianity, and were in their tendency progressive and not unprogressive measures.' Leaving for a moment the first point, the second is truly remarkable. If there is no such thing as progress, the decision of people who lived many centuries ago may be conclusive; if there is such a thing, their decisions are of course liable to be entirely upset. When we are arguing as to whether we are wiser than our ancestors, it is a truly remarkable argument to say we must be wrong because we differ from them. If there is one point in which progress is more palpable than another it is precisely this, that the division of Church and State is one of the distinctive differences between ancient and modern times, and that the whole tendency of affairs for centuries has been to make that distinction broader and deeper.

We refuse to accept the decision of the reformers in this matter for the same reason that we refuse to accept their political or economical doctrines; simply, that is, because the accumulated experience of successive generations has taught us to look at matters from an entirely different point of view. And to allege that because they decided otherwise the measure could not be progressive, is as much as to say that because they thought that people ought to be burnt for heresy, therefore we are wrong in refusing to burn Dr. Colenso. Precisely as good a case might be made out on the very same grounds for proving that persecution is 'progressive and not retrogressive,' and that toleration is contrary to the spirit of Christianity. It is quite open to a clergyman to maintain that doctrine if he pleases; but a man must put on a black gown and a pair of bands and ascend a pulpit before he can expect to assert it without contradiction and ridicule. Even then he must take care that his words are not taken down and printed in the public papers.

There is, of course, the further question—and it is the really important one—as to whether the proposed change is contrary to the spirit of Christianity. If everything which Christian ministers have ever denounced on that ground is to be taken as contrary to progress, we certainly believe that progress would be considerably impeded. It is true, as Archdeacon Sinclair says, that if Christian doctrines be true they cannot be changed; and it is equally true that if mathematics be true we shall never discover that two and two don't make four. But Christians have brought much discredit on truth by undertaking the defence of indefensible doctrines; just as men of science have discredited their authority by declaring that we should never be able to do things which we are now doing every day. When they leave the safe ground of the Thirty-nine Articles to indulge in political and social questions, they are apt to get into very unfortunate blunders, and it is specially to be lamented that they should give any ground for the totally unfounded assertion that Christianity is in any way antagonistic to progress. The Archdeacon is, we fear, taking the right way to instil that notion into ill-regulated minds when he dilates upon progress, in an argument which, if it proves anything, proves that all the most characteristic results of progress are opposed to all ecclesiastical—not to all Christian—authority.

RELIGION AND HOLIDAYS.

ONE of the charges which the latest form of unbelief has brought against Christianity is that it is not secular enough, does not sufficiently extol and insist upon the common work and business of the world. Supposing that there were some foundation for this charge, it might at any rate be fairly replied: "The work of the world can very well take care of itself, Christianity has taken care of our holidays."

Take the world through there is no lack of incitement to labour. Even if the Bible had no admonition to be diligent in business, as well as fervent in spirit; even if St. PAUL had never penned that noble word, "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as unto the Lord," we do not suppose there would have been much less work done throughout Christendom. Cold, hunger, thirst have their own way of stating their claims and enforcing toil and industry for their satisfaction. Civilization brings new wants if it supplies increased means, and the hardiest sceptic would scarcely venture to say that the world's business does not receive sufficient attention and energy. So the best work of religion in this matter has rather been the rescuing some portions of life from work. Our common speech bears witness to its having done this. What is our word holiday but the old holy-day, the day on which religion stepped in and said to men, this day thou shalt do no work, it shall be kept as a festival before God? So it was in the old Hebrew times with that blessed Sabbath which one day in each week brought peace and rest to all toilers, in the name of God—even to the ox and the ass, the servant and the maid, and "the stranger that is within thy gates." So it was also with those great yearly festivals, when the people went up joyfully to their holy city and blessed the God of ISRAEL for His mercies of long past times, not with sad faces and mournful worship, but with songs and sacrifices and the festive meetings of friends. It was only the Pharisees of a later day who perverted the old way, and though they could not spoil the great festivals, turned the weekly day of rest into a burden to the heart and conscience.

And this merciful work of the old religion was continued by the Christian Church. It also made its holy-days into holidays. It handed on those old Hebrew festivals; sometimes grafted them with new names and holier meaning on the sacred times of Paganism. Its calendar of saints' days was a mighty act for the limitation of the hours of labour. With a wise humanity it made its holy-days men's happiest seasons, linking its processions, its commemorative worship, with all the mirth and pleasure of great popular festivals. Every time men speak of a holiday they are bearing witness to the fact that religion has been the one authoritative influence which has been really able to grapple with worldliness and stop the machinery in this great workshop of a world. Therefore we would have men cling to the old religious associations of such seasons. Let the religion be a healthy and a happy one and it need not hinder their pleasure while it will mingle with it a higher element of thankfulness and reverence, and so make it more useful and refreshing. So we would still have the old commandment remembered, to keep holy the Sabbath-day,—holy not in the Pharisees' sense, but in the old Hebrew sense to which CHRIST appealed,—sacred from any labour that man's true need can spare. Thus also, as Christmas, Good Friday, Easter-day come round, it seems to us heathenish for Christian people to set apart no hour and keep no quiet corner of their hearts for thoughts of those ancient and most enduring mercies in memory of which these seasons are set apart.

And thus also, now that another of the great holidays is at hand, thoughts of the ancient consecration should be interwoven with the present happiness. Even as a mere holiday, there is something to be thoughtful about, to bless God for, in this Whitsuntide, at any rate as it is familiar to our readers in the North of England, and especially in the busy manufacturing districts. Not only does it occur when the country is in the very fullest and sweetest beauty of the spring, but it is especially the holiday of the poor, and of children, the time of all others when the dwellers in our crowded cities breathe the fresh air and see the pleasant sights of the country. It is a time when rich and poor enjoy themselves much together, and a spirit of sympathy pervades their enjoyment, which even though religion be never mentioned, has in it something eminently Christian. But this need not be all, and should not be all. The story which the time recalls should not be forgotten. We are not blind to its critical difficulties and perplexities, but there is much more in it than these. Behind the imperfect record lies the great fact of a tremendous spiritual experience in which was born the consciousness of God's spirit as an influence not confined to prophets and apostles, but "poured out on all flesh," and close to God's humblest child as to CHRIST himself; and out of which the fishermen of Galilee, before ambitious and timid, came forth with the new purpose and the new spirit which made them the fearless missionaries of that Christian faith which is God's greatest blessing to mankind.

Mr. Robert Leighton.

Nor a few of our readers, we know, have, like ourselves, highly appreciated the poems which have, from time to time, appeared in our columns with the initials of the above name affixed to them, and will share in our regret that the mind which framed them will afford us like pleasure no more. By those, however, who loved him best his departure, though at the comparatively early age of forty-seven, and in the very prime of his faculties, can only be regarded as a desirable release from long-continued, weary suffering. In noticing his death, the Liverpool Mercury says:—"For the past six months he was wholly confined to his bedroom, and for the last two to an armchair, it having become impossible for him to bear lifting into bed, or to obtain rest in any other position than that afforded by the chair. To say that in this condition he bore his sufferings with a fortitude nothing less than heroic is to give but weak expression to the truth. Throughout the whole of this protracted trial, with the prospect of death as its only termination, the paroxysms of physical pain over, his habitual serenity never deserted him. Friends who visited him lost their equanimity, but never left his presence without its restoration. One who knew and loved him well writes—"A deeply religious spirit, far above the jangle of the creeds; a faith in God unquenchable by any event, a perception of Him in all his works and ways, and hence a love of nature amounting to a passion; a sweet humanity which found a soul of good in everything, a child-like delight in all forms of beauty, and an ability to see it where to others it had no existence; a vivid interest in all the moving questions of the day, with clear views of their relation to the progress of the human race; and, combined with all, a perennial cheerfulness, and even humour, pathetic in its more recent manifestations—these are the features of character which have endeared him to the friends who have during the latter weary months hung round him with anxious interest." While some sorrowful thought cannot but be awakened by his removal, we may humbly trust that his spirit has only passed from the pains of earth to receive the fulfilment of its purest aspirations and holiest desires, and has already proved, to use his own words,

"The truth that Death is but a form of speech,
And is no more the loss of life to the Dead
Than sunset loss of light to the sunken sun,
Who marched as freely down this cloudless eve
As when he clomb the morn all pearled with dew."

AMERICAN NOTES.

It is stated that Mr. Robert Collyer's new church at Chicago, which is to be completed next month, will cost about 160,000 dollars.

A newspaper published in the region of Lakes Memphremagog and Winnepesaukee remarks that "the fish in Lake Holleyhunkemunk, Maine, are superior to those of either Lake Weeleyobacock or Moosetockmeganuc. Those of Chauhungogungamaung were very fine, but they all got choked to death in trying to tell where they lived."

All things in America—rivers, prairies, lakes—are on the very largest scale: so we need not be surprised at learning that on the banks of the Cruguay there has lately been erected the largest kitchen in the world. It covers 20,000 square feet; each of its boilers will contain 12,000lb. of flesh, and eighty head of cattle must be slaughtered every hour in order to keep them all at work. The kitchen is erected as a speculation in order to supply the "five quarters" of the world with Liebig's extract of meat.

A Free-trade meeting has been held in Brooklyn, with the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher in the chair, confessing himself a convert from Protectionist theories.

According to the Philadelphia Ledger, the coloured man has made another step towards social equality.

He is now considered fit to contend in prize-fights with whites. In this respect England, we believe, has had the start of America; for, if we mistake not, the great Molyneux was, at least, a mulatto.

The Liberal Christian informs us that a wealthy lady of New York has purchased and furnished a handsome brown-stone house on Twenty-third street, and opened it as a Club-House for women. Miss Anthony will carry on the Revolution in the basement; the Sorosis and Working-woman's Association have rooms in the third storey; the parlours will be kept for receptions and evening parties; a number of female artists have taken a room for a studio, and the remaining rooms will be reserved for the use of women visiting the city who do not care to go to an hotel.

Josh Billings says faith is a better article than pashunce. Faith sumtimes is an evidence of brains, and pashunce quite often is only numbness.

We observe that the Rev. Thos. Timmins, lately of Bridgewater, has arrived in America, and took part in a Conference held at Norton, Massachusetts.

Mr. Motley will be the sixth citizen of Massachusetts representing the United States at the English Court. His predecessors from that State have been John Quincy Adams, Abbott Lawrence, George Bancroft, Edward Everett, and Charles Francis Adams.

It has been stated on more occasions than one by Mr. W. E. Forster, and likewise by others, that the compulsory system of education does not exist in any part of the United States; but the abstract of the "Statutes relating to Public Schools" in Massachusetts shows that this is a mistake. The law of the State compels every person having a child between the ages of eight and fourteen under his control to send that child to school at least twelve weeks in every year. Neglect of this renders the parent or guardian liable to a fine of twenty dollars, from which, however, he may gain exemption on the plea of poverty, or if he can prove that the child has already received instruction, or that his mental or bodily condition unfits him for it. Every town is compelled to keep a school or schools open at least six months in the year. If there are 500 families or householders it must also maintain a high school. The town refusing to raise the requisite funds shall forfeit not less than 500 nor more than 1,000 dollars, to be paid into the treasury of the country. A school committee is to be chosen at a town meeting annually by written ballots, and teachers in the schools must have a certificate from this committee, who have also the power to require the daily reading of some portion of the Bible. If any scholar is not furnished by his parents with the requisite books, they may be supplied at the expense of the town, but the cost is added to the next annual tax on the parents, unless they can claim exemption on the ground of poverty. The treasurer of every town or city is bound to prosecute "truants" under a penalty of twenty dollars. Every city or town is compelled to make proper provision for the education of children "wandering about in the streets" between the ages of seven and sixteen. Children who will not go to school may be committed to a reformatory or other suitable institution for any period not exceeding two years. Warrants issued are returnable "before any trial justice or judge of a police-court." The children of drunken parents may be taken away and sent to school. These laws are put into force every day.

RUSSIAN DISSENTERS.

ATTENTION having been recently drawn to the various sects of dissenters from the Russian Church, the Pall Mall has been at the pains of collecting information relative to the more eccentric of them from Haxthausen and other sources, and the following particulars, abridged from its account, will be interesting to some of our readers.

The wildest among the Russian fanatics are the Morelschiki, or Immolators. Their leading idea is to mortify the flesh for the sake of saving the soul, and in order to do this efficiently they have recourse to various means of mutilation and death. Sects inculcating the virtues of suicide and murder naturally do all they can to keep their existence a secret, but every now and then a horrible story comes from the interior of some gloomy forest or dreary waste, which tells how some of these wretched people have died. Sometimes a deep pit is dug in the earth and half filled with wood and straw. This is set alight, and when the whole mass is in a blaze they leap into the pit and are consumed, wildly singing hymns as they burn. At other times they meet in a wooden house, round which they have piled heaps of straw; and in it they deliberately burn themselves to death, their neighbours looking quietly on; for the act is a sacred one; the victims are undergoing "baptism by fire." Some years ago, a congregation of immortals assembled at a spot on the left bank of the Volga, and agreed to put each other to death. But after six and thirty of them had fallen the desire of life awoke in a young woman, and she fled to a neighbouring village. The people repaired to the scene of action, and found two of the murderers still alive, and forty-seven persons dead. The two who were taken were knouted—exulting at every stroke at the martyrdom they were undergoing. It is to this sect that the Scopisi belong, of whom we gave some account a month ago.

Next in singularity come the Khisti, or Scourgers—the Flagellants of the Middle Ages—whose notion of a religious service is a wild dance accompanied by severe castigation. In the middle of the room where they meet stands a vessel containing water, and to this they go from time to time, in order to wet their heads or to drink out of their hands. Then they resume their stamping and flogging, till they fall down utterly exhausted, or convulsions seize them, during which they utter ravings which they call prophecies. Every Easter night, one of his secretaries told Haxthausen, the fanatics "all assemble for a great solemnity, the worship of the Mother of God. A virgin, fifteen years of age, whom they have induced to act the part by tempting promises, is bound, and placed in a tub of warm water; some old women come and first make a large incision in the left breast, then cut it off, and stanch the blood in a wonderfully short time. Other barbarities follow, too shocking to be told. During these operations a mystical picture of the Holy Spirit is put into the victim's hand, in order that she may be absorbed in regarding it." Afterwards a wild dance takes place round the tub, kept up by the whole congregation till their strength is exhausted. The girls who have been thus mutilated are ever afterwards considered sacred. At the age of nineteen or twenty they are said to look like women of fifty or sixty, and they generally die before reaching their thirtieth year.

Another singular sect, which existed formerly, was the Esloviesniki, or the Dumb, but they seem to have died out. Scarcely anything is known about them, for as soon as anyone joined the community he became mute, and from that time forward no articulate sound ever escaped his lips. Various attempts were made at different times to torture them into speaking, but always in vain. A governor-general of Siberia, in the time of Catherine II., ordered them to be tortured in the most horrible manner. The soles of their feet were tickled, and melted sealing-wax was dropped upon their bodies; but they did not utter a sound.

Other erratic sects are the Molokani and the Dukhoborts. The former are so styled by the people, on account of the quantity of milk (Moloko) they consume, but they call themselves "true Christians." The sect has existed about a century, during which time its members have generally led peaceful and steady lives, in many respects resembling those of the Moravians. Now and then, however, they are carried away by outbursts of fanaticism, as on one occasion when a Molokan rushed into the midst of a Church procession, seized a picture of a saint, threw it on the ground, and trampled upon it. At first the bystanders stood silently aghast, but soon recovering from the shock they put the offender to death. In 1833 a fanatic named Terenty began to preach repentance to the Molokani. He gave himself out as the prophet Elias, ordered them to desist from all work and give themselves up exclusively to praying and singing hymns, announced that the millennium was close at hand, and ultimately fixed a day on which he promised to ascend to heaven before their eyes. When the day came he appeared in a carriage, and ordered the crowd which had assembled to meet him, composed of many thousands of the sect from all parts of Russia, to kneel down and pray with him. He then flapped his arms and tried to fly; but he only fell heavily to the ground, injuring a woman in his fall. A great uproar followed, and his disappointed disciples handed him over to the police, who sent him to prison. After his release he recovered some of his influence over the Molokani, to whom he preached the coming end of the world till the day of his death.

When Napoleon was in Russia they imagined that he was the "Lion of the Valley of Jehoshaphat," who was destined to overthrow the false Emperor, and restore the throne of the white Czar. So the Tambof Molokani appointed a deputation from their body to go clothed in white and present an address to him in the year 1812. The deputies made their way through little Russia and Poland, as far as the Vistula, but there they were made prisoners. One of them escaped and got safely home; the rest were never heard of again. Liprandi, in the report he drew up for the government in 1853, says that "the Napoleonovshchina, or sect of worshippers of Napoleon, reappeared in 1820 at Byelostok, and at Pskoff, and again in 1844 at Moscow." Those at Moscow meet with the utmost secrecy in a private stone house in the middle of the town. There, after performing other rites, they prostrate themselves before a bust of Napoleon as before a divinity. For them Napoleon is still living, and they believe that some day he will return from Siberia, together with the Emperor Peter III. Then Peter will mount the throne of the world, and Napoleon will command the legions of the faithful under him. The police contrived, in 1846, to get hold of certain secret pictures belonging to the sect. These were printed on very thin paper, in order that, being slipped between the leaves of books and atlases, they might get passed on unseen from hand to hand; and represented Napoleon ascending into heaven.

From among the Molokani have arisen the Dukhoborts or soul-wrestlers, who hold that the Dukhoborets is God, and cannot sin, but the non-Dukhoborets is radically wicked—all that he does, even what appears to be good is sin. One of their characteristics is the remarkably handsome forms both of the men and the women, and the health and strength they display. This is partly to be accounted for by the fact that they put to death every child that is delicate or deformed. The soul, they say, being the likeness of God, must dwell in a worthy, noble, and vigorous body. If we find it in a weak and poor one, we are bound to free it from its ignoble prison; it then chooses for itself, according to the law of the transmigration of souls, another and a better body. Such child murder gives little pain to the parents, for their theory is that the soul, the image of God, recognises no earthly father or mother, and that there is only one father, the totality of God, who lives in every individual; and one mother, universal matter or nature, the earth. Consequently, the Dukhoborts never call their parents "father" or "mother," but only "old man" and "old woman;" and a parent does not speak of "my" children, but of "ours," meaning the community's. The career of their great chief, Kapustin by name, had something in common with that of John of Leyden. He must have been no common man who, though merely an uncultivated Russian peasant, was able to create, and maintain for several years, a complete theocratic State, comprising 4,000 persons—a platonic Utopia founded upon religious, Christian, and Gnostic principles. It was near the Sea of Azof that the Dukhoborts settled, and there Kapustin, who had persuaded them that the soul of Christ dwelt in his body, ruled them despotically. In 1814 he was imprisoned, but was soon liberated on bail. After a time he disappeared, and it was not till long after he was dead that the cave in which he had spent the last years of his life became known to the public. After his death the colony fell into disorder. The Council of Elders which ruled it became a terrible inquisitorial tribunal. Torture and death followed close upon the slightest sign of an intention to go over to the Russian Church. Within a few years about two hundred people disappeared, leaving scarcely a trace behind; an investigation by the authorities, too late to prevent the mischief, revealed a dreadful state of things: bodies were found buried alive, and many mutilated. In 1842 and the following year most of the Dukhoborts were transplanted to the Caucasus.

Such are a few of the strangest offshoots from the main body of Russian dissent.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

HOPE'S ARGUMENT.

We give ourselves much trouble lest to die
Should be to lose this conscious life, and pass
Impersonally into earth and sky,
Lost in the general mass.

And yet it is our deepest ecstasy
To pass through love into another's life—
To yield this rooted self all up, and be
All husband or all wife.

And deeper still the joy of a rapt soul,
Whose self is sunk in earth, dead as the sod;
Whose will has passed into divine control,
And being into God.

If thus to lose self be ecstatic gain,
Wherefore this trouble for the loss of breath?
Ay, ay, but will the ecstasy remain
An ecstasy in death?

So leans the argument: the more we die
To the restraining earth, the more we rise
Into the rapt beatitudes that lie
Hidden to mortal eyes.

At last death is the severing of all
Entanglement or tie that binds to earth;
The cutting of the cord umbilical
That frees the higher birth.

R. LEIGHTON.

A JAPANESE HOUSE.

THE American writer, Carleton, thus describes a Japanese dwelling: A shopkeeper who has curious things for sale, invites us to enter his house. The room on the street is his shop. The whole front part is open, door and window all one, without sash or panes of glass; wide open by day closed with wooden shutters at night. We step in and look at his work-boxes of fancy wood, his tea trays and lacquered ware, glove-boxes, fans, and great variety of nick-nacks, and then pass from the shop into the house. The parlour is a platform raised about two feet from the ground, covered with matting. There are a few low stools, pictures by Japanese artists on the wall; pots and pans, in one corner; tea-cups, saucers, bowls and plates of nice porcelain ware on a shelf, a roll of mats in another corner, which will be spread upon the floor at night for bedding. We are in the presence of the shopkeeper's wife and daughter—the daughter a young lady perhaps twenty years old. Both of the ladies are dressed in the extreme lowliness of fashion—no waist, no underclothing, nothing but a skirt! The shopkeeper's wife bustles about, sets the stools aside, disappears behind a screen, and reappears with a mahogany stuffed chair, and with many a smile and nod and wink, motions us to the seat, then herself crouches upon the floor at our feet, shows us photographs of Nagasaki and other works of art. We have an opportunity to study her features. She is small of stature, has long black hair nicely combed, smooth, braided, done up neatly, and tastefully adorned with artificial flowers. She has a pug nose, high and prominent cheek bones, a broad forehead and small black eyes, a tawny complexion with a tinge of peach bloom on her cheeks, a homely mouth, and a red lip. Not many artists would give such features to their idea of perfect beauty, but for all that there is a pleasing expression of the countenance when animated, or when she smiles; but when the smile becomes a laugh, and the lips part, we see two rows of showy teeth, black as jet. We think of a coal hod, or of looking into a knot-hole opened into a dark room! More than this, the lady has pulled out every hair of her eyebrows. Thereby hangs a story. The legend is that years ago a beautiful princess of Japan, in order to show her devotion to her husband, blackened her teeth and pulled out her eyebrows—making herself hideous in the sight of all gallants, and so all loving wives follow her example. There is but little to see in a Japanese house. The partitions between rooms are movable paper screens, and in most houses of the lower and middling classes there is but one room, and the entire furniture might be packed on a hand-cart.

A 'BUS TO JERUSALEM.

WE remember, some years ago, being startled to read an advertisement of an omnibus plying several times a day between the Pæreus and Athens; but there is something still more startling in the following passage from a recent letter to the Times: "The ease with which Jerusalem can now be reached will attract more visitors every year. It must be admitted that there are still disagreements to be faced. But the Government of the Sultan is doing a good deal to ease the path of the Christian pilgrim. There is, for instance, a road—an actual chaussée—in the course of construction from Jaffa to Jerusalem—a distance of thirty-six miles. The engineering is rude, and the road itself offers much opposition to the passage of vehicles, but still some time or other it will be finished, and there is already—yes, there is indeed—an omnibus to Jerusalem, driven by one of the last surviving or staying Americans of the 'Jaffa Colony;' the 'bus can only go part of the way, and how it is drawn over the rocks and stones in the way must be a wonder to those who have to ride between the Holy City and the ancient port. Whether anything will ever be done to make Joppa accessible in any weather but a dead calm it is hard to say; but it is the natural port of Jerusalem—a ride of eleven hours brings one from the beach to the City of David."

CHRISTIAN HEATHENISM.

IN the "Life of Rev. Thomas Collins," of whom we had an anecdote a week or two since, we find the following among his experiences. Writing of a day in October, 1852, he says:—"On Monday I went a pilgrimage to Elstow, to see the birthplace of Bunyan. The house has been rebuilt. We entered the cottage that occupies the site; it is small, having but one lower and one upper room, with a pantry under the stairs. A strong, old beam is the only remnant of the original cot. In consideration of a gratuity, we were permitted to take some small splinters for my relic-loving friends. While my companion got them, I said to the woman, 'That timber is from an ancient tree; but I know of an older, it is called the tree of life.' 'Indeed,' she replied, 'I never heard of such a tree.' 'Never heard of it?' I said. 'A well-known book tells of it; the first part of which was written by a man whose name was Moses; one David also added another part. Do you know that book?" "Well, I'm no scholar, Sir. I can't read, so I don't know anything about books." This ignorance of the Bible, and, of all places on the earth, in John Bunyan's cottage, astonished me. On leaving, in the street we met a grey-haired man; wishing, if I might, to gather up any floating local traditions, I accosted him. "Old friend," said I, "we have come a long way this morning to look at the birthplace of one John Bunyan, who was born in these parts. Do you know anything about him?" "What was he, Sir?" "Well, they tell me that he was a great preacher." "A great preacher! I know nothing about such as them. I goes to Church." Thinking I might speak with the man of Jesus, though I had failed concerning John, I asked, "Do you know the Head of the Church?" "The Head of the Church," he repeated inquiringly, "The Head of the Church? It must be old Whitbread, sure enough." "What? a brewer the head of the Church?" "Must be him, Sir; he owns all the parish!" Passing on, I tried another venerable-looking villager, "Do you know anything of John Bunyan?" "I've heard of him." "What have you heard?" "Well, they tell me that he was oft in jail?" "Oft in jail? Why, how was that? Did he poach the quality's game? or did he knock people in the highway? or what?" "Well, Sir, I can't say; but they do say he was oft in jail."

WESTERN UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN UNION.

A MEETING of this society was held on Wednesday week at Taunton, when the devotional services were conducted by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., of Bridgewater, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Clifton, from Mat. x. 27, "What ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the house tops," the subject being the Unitarian position, and the duties arising out of it.

There was a collation in the schoolroom in the afternoon, to which visitors, of whom there was a goodly number, were invited. After dinner the chair was taken by the minister of the chapel, the Rev. Philip Henry Wicksteed, M.A. After "The Queen," which was received with the usual honours, the Rev. Wm. James, of Bristol, gave the time-honoured toast, "Civil and religious liberty all the world over." A vote of thanks to Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Odgers, for their services in the morning, was carried with great earnestness, moved by Rev. Wm. Arthur Jones, and seconded by Mr. James. The hospitalities of the congregation having been acknowledged by the visitors, the meeting broke up.

In the evening a tea meeting was held in the two schoolrooms, at which there was a large attendance, and it was found necessary to adjourn to the chapel. The Rev. Wm. James, of Bristol, took the chair. In his opening address he referred in feeling terms to his early recollection of the congregation assembling in that chapel, and to his friendship with the ministers who had preceded Mr. Wicksteed in the occupation of that pulpit. He then enlarged upon the present aspect of the religious world, and urged the importance of holding forth to the world those great principles of religious liberty and religious truth for the support and advocacy of which this association was established.

At the request of the president, the Rev. W. A. Jones gave a brief account of the state and constitution of the French Protestant Churches. He said that it had been his privilege for nearly two years to attend the services of that church in different places in the South of France, and he treasured amongst his happiest memories the friendly intercourse he enjoyed with members of that communion both lay and clerical. In many respects their mode of worship closely resembled that to which they were accustomed in Mary-street Chapel. There was a liturgical service of very much the same character, which the minister supplemented by free prayers, partaking of his individual religious experience and adapted to the special circumstances of the people or of individuals. In one respect the liturgy differed from theirs, namely, in that it contained the Apostles' Creed. "I thought he himself, as they all knew, was unwilling formally to acknowledge any creed other than that which might be expressed in the words of Christ or his Apostles, the Apostles' Creed most Unitarian Christians might with very slight modifications repeat and adopt. This being really the only doctrinal test to which the ministers of the French Protestant Church were subject, it had come about that a large number of laymen and clergymen entertained and professed religious views which are substantially the same as those which the Unitarians of England had held. The Protestant Church in France was a State Church. In common with the Roman Catholic Church, it was under the direction of the Minister of Religion. Yet from its constitution the people were not without due power and influence. A register was kept in each church—revised every year—of every member. The public profession and participation in the Communion was the only test. The members of the churches elected laymen to serve on the consistory or managing body of the district. The selection and appointment of ministers vested in this body of representatives. In this way the prevailing religious sentiment of the majority found expression, but as a consequence the minority, often very considerable, was unprovided for. In the church with which he had been most intimately connected there were three pastors or ministers; one being what would be termed orthodox, another evangelical in the tone of his religious services, but holding a very modified form of the doctrines of orthodoxy, and the third was an avowed Unitarian, whose ordinary discourses could not have been distinguished from those which are usually heard in our pulpits in England. In one particular he thought the French Protestant service was defective. They did not attend sufficiently to the devotional element. Music and psalmody, which added so much to the power and influence of public worship, were neglected, and one important element of our religious nature was left to a great extent untouched.

The Rev. J. E. CARPENTER spoke on "Unity of Spirit amidst diversity of Religious Sentiments." Having enlarged upon the impossibility of bringing all people to see alike on all subjects, especially religious doctrines, he went on to show how that all religious bodies hold in common great principles of religious truth and duty, which might be and should be the basis of action and generous co-operation in all benevolent and philanthropic works. The great work for which Christ came into the world remained still undone, and would remain unaccomplished as long as sin and ignorance, wrong and injustice existed among the children of men. The churches had still much to do before the Will of God would be done on earth as it was done in Heaven. And that object would not be attained until they each recognised that amidst the diversity of religious opinions it was possible to act together in obedience to the spirit of love to God and man.

The Rev. J. E. ODGERS was heartily welcomed by the Chairman as a fellow-labourer in this district, and spoke on the relation of the pulpit to the present times.

Mr. JOHN WORSLEY, of Bristol, as Treasurer of the Union, explained its operations, and urged its claim upon more general support.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED addressed the meeting on the education of the people and its importance to the national progress and safety, and

The Rev. W. MATTHEWS, of Yeovil, spoke of the difficulties of missionary work, and on the state of feeling among the working-classes in relation to public worship, and the duty of Unitarians to make greater and special efforts to interest them on the subject of religion.

The Chairman then closed the proceedings with prayer and the benediction.

LEEDS: THE RETIREMENT OF REV. THOMAS HINCKS.

OUR readers will have shared the feeling of deep regret with which we announced, about two months ago, that Mr. Hincks, on endeavouring to resume his pulpit after the year's rest and absence kindly afforded him by the Mill Hill congregation, found himself unequal to the effort, and had felt obliged to give up all idea of continuing in active ministerial service for the present. His people felt that they had no alternative but to accept his resignation, which was read on Sunday, March 14, and a meeting of the congregation was held the day following, when it was accepted. At this meeting very deep appreciation of Mr. Hincks's services was expressed, and the sympathy manifested was very strong. It was resolved to raise a sum of money which might be a substantial help to Mr. Hincks, and a large amount was contributed in the room. This, however, has been very greatly increased, and a few days ago was presented to Mr. Hincks with the following letter, signed by the members of the deputation:

Leeds, 5th May, 1869.

Dear Mr. Hincks,—We have been requested by the Mill Hill congregation to present to you, on their behalf, the amount herewith in cash, £1,777. 18s., as a token of their regard and affection towards you, on your resigning your charge as their pastor. Nearly every member of your late congregation has subscribed spontaneously to that object; and whilst they sincerely deplore the circumstances, arising from the state of your health, which have compelled you to send in that resignation, they cannot allow so long, so interesting, and so valued a connection to close without again expressing to you their high appreciation of you as a friend, a scholar, a gentleman, and a Christian; the gratitude they feel for your beautiful and impressive devotional services as their minister; and for the high spiritual and Christian character which it has been your constant endeavour to impress upon the minds, hearts, and consciences of your hearers, as the one object in life above all others to be steadfastly aimed at and sought after.

We hope and pray that, under God's blessing, a year or two of relaxation from your high duties will fully restore you to health and strength, and to the ministry of the Unitarian body, of which you have been one of the brightest ornaments; and we shall ever be delighted to hear of your happiness, as well as that of Mrs. Hincks and your daughters.

We feel it our duty to say that the contributors to the sum of money which we have the pleasure to present, urged the desirability of your investing the same in some permanent and safe security, as a provision not only for your life, but for the benefit of Mr. Hincks and your daughters. We second that advice, and shall be at any time most willing to afford you any information which may assist you to carry out that view.—Believe us, dear Sir, yours most sincerely and faithfully,

ARTHUR LUPTON.

J. D. LUCCOCK.

WILLIAM BROWN.

To the Rev. Thomas Hincks, B.A.

Thus have our Mill Hill friends been deprived of beloved pastors twice within fifteen years through broken health, and each time have they shown the same large-hearted liberality. We are glad that they are not now, as on the previous occasion, to have the pain of a long interregnum, having secured the services of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter as their future minister.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—We learn that the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Oakfield Road Church, Clifton, has accepted an invitation to become the minister of the Mill-hill Chapel, Leeds, in succession to the Rev. Thomas Hincks, B.A., and will enter upon his ministry there in three months' time; the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., late of Banbridge, has been appointed minister of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, in succession to the Rev. P. W. Clayden, now of Kentish Town.

BURNLEY.—On Sunday last two sermons were preached in the Mechanics' Institution by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., on behalf of the Sunday-school. The congregations were good, and the collections amounted to £13.

DOB-LANE, FAIRFORTH.—The annual sermons in aid of the chapel fund were preached on the last Sunday in April, by the Revs. Brooke Herford and Jas. Drummond, B.A. The offertories amounted to about £8. On the Sunday following, the annual meeting of the trustees and congregation was held. After tea, Harry Rawson, Esq., of Manchester (one of the trustees), took the chair. The report, read by the secretary, Mr. Thomas Wyld, stated that while the attendance at the services had been about the same as last year the receipts from the offertory were somewhat less, owing, no doubt, at least in part, to the bad state of trade in the neighbourhood. The school and its connected institutions were in a healthy state. Two new classes had been held during a part of the year: the one a sewing class, under the direction of Mrs. Cadman and Miss Ruth Allen. This class had just presented the chapel committee with a beautiful baptismal bowl, as a mark of interest and goodwill. The other class referred to was a religious improvement class, conducted by the minister, to aid the teachers in their work, and numbering more than thirty members. The usual election of officers for the year having taken place, the subject of chanting came before the meeting, and it was resolved to adopt, if obtainable, the chant book used at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester. The chairman next called the attention of the meeting to the death of Mr. Barratt, of Southport, which had reduced the trustees to half the number originally appointed. It was necessary to fill up the vacancies by electing six more. The meeting then decided on three members of the congregation and three gentlemen outside, who, if they consented, should be elected at a special meeting to be held as soon as possible. The meeting was briefly addressed by the Rev. W. G. Cadman, Mr. Luke Pollitt, and others.

HEYWOOD.—The annual sermons on behalf of the Unitarian Sunday-school of this place were preached on the 9th instant, by the Rev. John Wright, B.A., of Bury, when collections were made amounting to £26. 1s. 10d.

IDLE.—On Sunday, the 9th inst., the school sermons were preached by the Rev. John Evvan, of Pudsey. There was a numerous attendance at both services, the chapel in the evening being full. The collections, which were greater than on any previous occasion, amounted to £8. 10s. 9d.

LEEDS: THE UNITED SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—The annual sermon to the children in the three Unitarian schools in Leeds was preached in Mill-street Chapel, on Sunday afternoon, the 2nd inst., by the Rev. Benjamin Walker, of Manchester. There was a very large attendance of scholars and friends, and the service was evidently entered into with great interest and spirit.

PRIZES IN SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

To the Editors.—As the letter of Mr. Richard Bartram, in your impression of the 7th inst., will necessarily call the attention of many to the question of Sunday-school prizes who have not hitherto given the subject much thought, and as he has so cogently stated the reasons for withholding the said prizes, will you kindly find room for a few lines on the opposite side of the question?—Mr. Bartram thinks that "prizes in Sunday-schools are more like stimulants given to the sick to keep them alive than the strong meat and wholesome nourishment for the well and healthy." To this let me answer the Sunday-school Prizes are the milk upon which we nourish our babes until their mental digestions are strong enough to take the sometimes harder food of moral example. The unequal terms upon which the various scholars contend is fairly and truthfully stated; but shall we turn away from the task because of its difficulty, and say to the little ones "since it is possible we may treat some of you unfairly we will stop the prizes altogether?" Again, the disadvantages under which some of the children labour are principally in connection with the matter of regular or irregular attendance. With regard to the marks for conduct and lessons is it not the teachers' duty to see that the inequalities are smoothed away? If a teacher has the moral courage to act fairly, and give marks not for the quantity committed to memory but for the diligence evinced by his pupils, he will, by his firmness and honesty, cause them to emulate each other in deserving his reward, and thus improve their moral tone at the same time that they are adding to their knowledge. If it should be objected to this that some of the children would feel they were unfairly dealt with, I must contend that the moral influence of the teacher under whom they would feel this, is worth very little—he has mistaken his vocation, and had better make way for some one more fitted for the office. Let us for the present waive the point as to whether prizes do good or not (although I believe they do), and ask this question—is it fair that the scholar who strives to do, and does better than his companions, should be sent away at the end of the year as empty (except of moral satisfaction) as the lukewarm but regular attendant? I think decidedly not! I would respectfully put it to my fellow-teachers thus: the Sunday-school prize is not the mere object worked for, but the certificate to show that he who gains it has worked; and it depends more upon the moral honesty of the teacher than many of them are aware to see that the labourer (in his class) gets his hire and no more.

BURNLEY UNITARIAN CHURCH.

For several years efforts have been made to raise a Congregation in Burnley. Since the cause was started, the Congregation has increased from about half-a-dozen to an average attendance of 40. The cause has suffered for want of a suitable room. The present meeting-place has many inconveniences, and is a serious obstacle to success. As a better cannot be secured, it has been determined to ERECT A CHAPEL. The aid of friends is earnestly solicited for this object. The proposed Chapel is to accommodate from 330 to 400 at a cost of £1,000 to £1,100 including land.

UNITARIAN WORSHIP AT BLACKPOOL AND SCARBOROUGH.

At the recent Annual Meeting of the Missionary Conference, an association of Unitarian ministers for missionary purposes, it was agreed that an effort should be made to establish religious services, under Unitarian auspices, at Blackpool and Scarborough, as early as feasible in the present year. Blackpool and Scarborough are much frequented by Unitarians during the summer months. For them, as for the extension of the cause of liberal Christianity, it is very desirable that a free Gospel should be preached in those towns. The Committee of the Conference has earnestly to appeal to their Unitarian brethren to aid in carrying out the above object. They need funds to enable them to take the initiatory steps.

NEW UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHAPEL, STRATFORD, LONDON.

The Unitarians at Stratford, having sold the short lease of their former Chapel (which was some distance from the populous part of the town), have purchased a freshhold site in one of the best situations, and are erecting an elegant and comfortable Chapel from a design kindly furnished by Thomas Chastell Clarke, Esq., of London, and will be completed in July, the cost of which, including land, will amount to £1,000. Four members of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—Messrs. Lawrence, Preston, Taylor, and Spears—have been elected, with others at Stratford, as Trustees. The town of Stratford contains a population of 60,000, and is rapidly increasing. The members of the Congregation at present are chiefly persons of humble means, but have generously subscribed nearly £100. Subscriptions are therefore respectfully solicited on behalf of the Building Fund.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

At the Forty-fourth Anniversary, held at Unity Church, Upper-street, Islington, May 19th, 1869, W. J. LAMPART, Esq., President, the following resolutions were, in addition to others of a formal character, passed:

Moved by the Rev. CHARLES BEARD, B.A., and seconded by J. MUNN, Esq.—

That the Reports of the Treasurer and of the General Committee be accepted and approved, and that they be printed and circulated under the direction of the Committee.

Moved by HERBERT NEW, Esq., and seconded by the Rev. H. IERSON, M.A.—

That the hearty thanks of the Association be given to the Rev. James Martineau for his services this day.

Moved by SIR JOHN BOWRING, and seconded by the Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, M.A.—

That the members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association rejoice to have the opportunity of giving a personal and a profoundly respectful welcome to M. Athanase Couquerel; that they cordially thank him for the noble stand he has made in his own great country for true Protestantism and liberal Christianity; and that they desire to record their admiration of his manly and dignified endurance of persecution inflicted upon him by some of his brother Protestants.

Moved by JAMES HEYWOOD, Esq., and seconded by the Rev. D. MAGINNIS—

That this Meeting expresses its sincere gratitude to the Rev. J. J. Taylor, who, since the last annual gathering, has most generously and ably represented the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at the Unitarian Tercentenary Festival held at Torda, in Hungary, and begs to assure Mr. Taylor of its deep sympathy with him in his present illness, and hopes that it may please God that he may soon regain his usual health.

Moved by JOSEPH LUPTON, Esq., and seconded by the Rev. R. SHELLEY—

That the respect and sympathy of this Meeting be given to the various Missionaries who are labouring to promote our views.

Moved by the Rev. F. BISHOP, and seconded by the Rev. E. KELL, M.A.—

That the thanks of the Association be given to the President, Vice-Presidents and Correspondents, to the Treasurer, the Secretaries, the members of the Committee, the Solicitor, and the Auditors, for the efficient and satisfactory manner in which they have, during the past year, discharged their several duties.

Moved by GEORGE BUCKTON, Esq.—

That the President for the ensuing year be Samuel Sharpe, Esq., of London. That to the list of Vice-Presidents be added Messrs. T. Alauworth, T. F. Gibson, T. Hollings, J. B. Smith, Joseph Clephan, T. T. Paget. That in the place of the two retiring members of the Committee, Messrs. J. Troup and T. G. Foster be elected; and that Mr. D. A. Gibbs be chosen as an Auditor; and that the other Officers of the Association be re-appointed for the ensuing year.

At the close of the proceedings, on the motion of the Rev. R. SPEAKS, the following resolution was unanimously adopted—

That this Meeting offers to the Chairman, W. J. Lampart, Esq., its hearty thanks for presiding over the deliberations of this day, and for his Presidency during the past year.

BURNLEY UNITARIAN CHURCH.

For several years efforts have been made to raise a Congregation in Burnley. Since the cause was started, the Congregation has increased from about half-a-dozen to an average attendance of 40. The cause has suffered for want of a suitable room. The present meeting-place has many inconveniences, and is a serious obstacle to success. As a better cannot be secured, it has been determined to ERECT A CHAPEL. The aid of friends is earnestly solicited for this object. The proposed Chapel is to accommodate from 300 to 400 at a cost of £1,000 to £1,100 including land.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A short time since some wealthy natives presented a petition objecting to missionary operations in India. The Rev. S. Knowles now reports from Gondah that he is regularly followed about in his preaching tours by a Mussulman preacher from Fyzabad; an intelligent good-looking man, about 35 years of age, of the Sunni, or orthodox sect. He is described as an eloquent speaker, and as having great influence among his co-religionists. Carrying the Koran and the New Testament together in his wallet, he goes all over Oudh, preaching a regular religious war. His doctrine seems somewhat unworthy of his polemical abilities, for the sum of it is that any missionary or other person who utters a word against the Koran should be knocked down on the spot. Mr. Knowles says that his own journeys have been made much more interesting by this gentleman's opposition.

A protest having been handed to Mr. Macrorie, complaining that he was assuming the position of a Bishop of the Church of England in Natal, he replies, "The assumption is yours, not mine. I am not, and have never claimed to be, a Bishop of the Church of England, inasmuch as no such body can exist out of England; but a Bishop of the Church of Christ, in union and full communion with the branch of that Church established in England." With reference to his supposed assumption of authority, he adds, "I claim no authority over any but those who voluntarily submit themselves to my spiritual office." His position having been spoken of as illegal, he says, "My position is as little illegal as that of a Wesleyan superintendent. I am the elected and consecrated Bishop of a Church which, as it cannot claim the status of a Church established by law, ought not, in the name of that religious liberty which we all prize, to be denied the exercise of the privileges attaching to other religious denominations." If this is a true description of the position which he assumes, we do not see what objection can be made to it. There are two Bishops now before the people, instead of one, and they pay their money and take their choice.

Letters from Jerusalem state that the Marquis of Bute is edifying the dwellers there by his piety and his liberality. He passes hours in tears and prayer at the various spots where the last scenes of the Passion are supposed to have taken place; and his lordship's almoner, Monsignor Capel, preaches in English to large numbers of pilgrims, in the chapel of the Ecce Homo, drawn together by his remarkable eloquence.

The South German Protestants, having received an invitation from Pius IX. to lose no time in returning to the bosom of the Church, have convened a meeting to be held at Worms, on the 31st instant, to return a reply. In the circular which they have issued, after referring to the increasing boldness of the Ultramontanes, they say, "Our dearest treasures, the conquests of more than a century, freedom of thought and liberty of conscience, the independence of the State, and peace between men of different creeds, are attacked by the Encyclical letter and syllabus of 8th December, 1864, and the Œcumenical Council summoned for the 8th December next, is to affix its seal to the principles promulgated more than four years ago by the Pope. Under these circumstances we can be silent no longer." They have therefore called the meeting for the 31st, when a protest will be made against the so-called Apostolical letter, and against the arrogant pretensions of the Ultramontanes. There is to be a procession to Luther's monument, and the proceedings are to be closed by singing his famous hymn.

The Deutsches Volksblatt (Roman Catholic) informs us that certain new plans on the subject of education in Germany are meeting with favour at Rome, which look as if the Pope and his counsellors were afraid of the liberalising effect of the Universities in that country. It is proposed to establish Episcopal special schools for the education of priests, and in this way, by putting it out of their power to attend the universities, to destroy the Catholic theological faculties in them. We must say, we can hardly believe even the Pontifical Government to be so short-sighted as to carry out a plan like this.

The Pope has had a rebuff from the Patriarch of Alexandria concerning his pet scheme of the Council, similar to that which he received a short time since from the Patriarch of Constantinople. The plenipotentiaries of the Holy See having delivered to him an invitation to the Œcumenical, the Patriarch said, while the desire of his Holiness to effect the union of all the Churches of Christ was very commendable, and that for which the whole Oriental Orthodox Church had, through ages past, offered up fervent prayers, there were numerous considerations, and three especially, which rendered the acceptance of the invitation an impossibility:—In the first place, it overthrows and abolishes the equality which exists among the holy Churches of God, and their individual independence, proclaiming that Rome holds uncontrolled sway and sovereign dominion over the other thrones equally self-governing and independent. In the second place, the Pope gives it to be understood that salvation is to be found exclusively in Rome, and there alone Divine grace operates effectually, "whereas the grace of God is not restricted to Rome or to any definite place, but has operated and continues to operate throughout the habitable globe." In the third place, he convokes the Council to assemble on the Festival of the Immaculate Conception of the Mother of the Lord, a dogma wholly unknown to the Church—a recent invention therefore, and by no means a solitary one. If the Pope sincerely desires the pacification and unity of the whole Church of Christ, then let him as a brother, and as an equal among equals, put himself in communication with the other holy Patriarchs, and with them take counsel as to the methods best calculated to secure the end in view; though the best of all methods would be to approximate the modern institutions of Rome to those of more primitive times. Not acting on this principle his Holiness will labour in vain, and only widen further the breach which exists at present. The Patriarch then returned the Papal invitation.

M. Ernest Renan has just announced himself a candidate for Meaux. He professes himself to be opposed to revolutions and to wars, and in favour of the immediate evacuation of Rome. He desires "progress," especially in education, and a lightening of the burdens on land. In religious questions he wishes only for "liberty for the present," and, "for the future, separation of Church and State." His prospects of success are not thought to be great.

Mr. Rodwell and Mr. Le Geyt, both high Ritualists, determined not to be without their lights, have been burning candles on a ledge above the altar. The legality of this, however, is disputed. Singular notions they must have of religion, if they consider candles so essential to it.

The Society for the Revision of the Book of Common Prayer has developed into the Church Reform Association, and held its meeting yesterday week. Its objects are:—1. The amendment of the Book of Common Prayer, under proper authority, by omissions and alterations, especially in the Rubrics and Occasional Services. 2. The reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts, so as to procure a less expensive and more expeditious mode of remedying abuses. 3. The reform of abuses connected with patronage. 4. The modification of the Acts of Uniformity and the complete revision of the Book of Canons, together with the correction of such evils as hinder the extension and mar the usefulness of the Church of England. The Chairman, Lord Ebury, said he believed every member of the Society was of opinion that unless some alteration was made in the Book of Common Prayer, all attempts to purify the Church of abuses would be useless. Certain passages exist in that book which countenance many erroneous doctrines. So long as people are accustomed to look at it, and say it is dangerous to alter it, the Society must be content to work on in a small minority; still, he showed there were many things in their past history to encourage them in their work. The receipts for the past year were stated to be £379. 2s. 6d., and the expenditure £378. 2s. 10d.

At the seventeenth anniversary of the Religious Tract Society, the report stated that the past year had been one of singular activity, both at home and abroad, and above two hundred new tracts and books, and five periodicals, comprising 850,000,000 pages, had been published during the year. The number of publications issued from the depository had exceeded 40,000,000, and the proximate circulation from the formation of the society 1,286,000,000. The total receipts, including the balance left from last year, were £119,170. 0s. 6d., of which £10,488. 10s. 11d. were subscriptions and other free contributions, and £4,818. 9s. 9d. legacies. The total expenditure was £112,611. 3s. 2d.; £3,500 had been invested, and a balance remained in hand of £3,058. 17s. 4d. The Earl of Shaftesbury, who was in the chair, placed the society second only to the Bible Society, and considered it most necessary to counteract the pestilential cheap literature of the day.

The seventy-fifth annual meeting of the London Missionary Society was held last week, when it appeared that it had 156 English ministers, 81 native ordained pastors, 1,140 native preachers, 35,487 church members, and 191,798 native adherents. From English friends there had been received during the past year £4,200; and from native converts £11,647. The fees from boys were £2,101, and from girls £336. The 156 English missionaries of the society in foreign lands constituted the central force and stimulus of a wider agency, numbering 1,200. The accounts received from Polynesia were very encouraging. There were in that country 2,800 members of the Protestant Church; children in Protestant schools, 1,260; whilst the Roman Catholic congregation, members and scholars (natives), amounted only to 700. One of the most interesting events of the past year in reference to Madagascar was the conversion of the young Queen. The income for the year, including £504 for special objects, amounted to £108,847; and, deducting the disbursements, there was a balance in hand of £1,868.

The subject of promiscuous dancing, which has for some time past been troubling the Free Church ministers of Argyleshire, was discussed in full Synod one day last week, when the testimony given seems to have been of a gloomy and depressing kind. "In all parts of Scotland," according to one witness, "the evil was raising its head: in Campbeltown, Lochgilphead, Inverary, even in Rothesay itself, midnight balls, revelry, and their consequences were greatly on the increase." At Lochgilphead there is a ball every year, though the minister "always preaches on the subject previous to its taking place." A deceitful practice has also sprung up of having soirées followed by dancing, so that the clergy who accept what seems an innocent invitation find themselves betrayed into countenancing sinful pastime. As a mere exercise dancing was denounced as a system of "meaningless antics," "a certain shuffling of the limbs which, rationally regarded, was unintelligible and savagely uncouth." The chief wickedness, however, consists in "a concourse of males and females, gathered for the purpose of merriment and gratification." Unfortunately the Synod, though it sat till four o'clock in the morning, did not see how any repressive measures could be enforced.

Dr. F. G. Lee, vicar of All Saints', Lambeth, seems disposed to show himself contumacious. On Sunday, when he was the celebrant, there was not only an elaborate ceremonial, a procession moving round the church to the altar, the members of the choir carrying crosses and banners, but incense was freely used at various stages of the service, and during the communion candles were lighted on the altar.

It is said that much dissatisfaction exists among Irish Churchmen on account of the secret character of the action of the "standing committee," as it was called, appointed at their recent Dublin conference. Several of the Church papers demand to know what it is doing; hint suspicions of its fidelity to the "No surrender" principle laid down for it by the larger body, and call for a full explanation of its proceedings or its dissolution.

At a meeting of the Primitive Methodists, R. Scott, Esq., Chamberlain of the City of London, in describing the progress which they had made, said, Primitive Methodism is only fifty-nine years old, yet it has nearly 3,500 chapels, a very large number of schoolrooms which are used occasionally as chapels, 1,000 travelling preachers who devote their whole time to the work of the ministry, 1,400 local preachers, and at least 400,000 church members and Sabbath-school teachers. There is no other denomination that in fifty-nine years has made so much progress.

The Archbishops of York and Canterbury, if report may be trusted, fluttered the Deans at Lambeth the other day not a little. Having summoned them to a meeting there, at which thirteen were present, the Primate had the hardihood to suggest that the decanal system was capable of reform, and that it was advisable to concert measures for effecting this. His idea appears to have been, that, out of the chapter funds of the richer cathedrals means might be extracted sufficient to found new bishoprics which are thought to be needed in some parts of the country. The Deans, however, looked at the matter, very naturally, in quite a different light, three or four of them, it is said, maintaining that the present system is "unimpeachable," and inclining rather to the opinion that if new episcopates were to be founded they might be endowed from some of the highly paid bishoprics more easily than by any alterations affecting the deaneries. The general result, according to the Times, was that the very reverend dignitaries declined to acquiesce in the suggestion that any reform whatever was desirable.

It having been reported that a lady connected with the Roman Catholic Orphanage at Market Harborough had burned a considerable number of Bibles, the Protestant Alliance sent a gentleman to inquire into the matter. The lady at once admitted that the report was true, and maintained that she "did quite right" as "the Protestant Bible was translated by heretics." She refused to tell how many copies she had burned; but being informed that the subject was referred to in the newspapers, she expressed herself glad of it, and said, "I hope the report will be circulated everywhere that others may follow my example; I am sure it will do good." We can scarcely think that the lady's religious superiors will be of the same opinion.

The Primate has conferred the Archdeaconry of Canterbury (together with a stall in the cathedral worth £1,000 a year) on the Rev. Edward Parry, son of Sir Edward Parry, the Arctic explorer. Mr. Parry was the archbishop's domestic chaplain, and rector of Acton.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS

The Roman correspondent of the Post, announcing the safe arrival of the cannon presented to Pío Nono by the Catholics of Poitiers, says:

"Let us hope they will never be fired off for the Pope, except in festive guise, in accordance with the peaceful presentiments of the Marquis De La-valette. Should Victor Emmanuel finally receive from Pío Nono the kiss of peace, the commander of the Pontifical artillery will not on that account be obliged to exclaim—

'Othello's occupation's gone!'

For salves accompany every principal Church festival in Rome, and it is a complete science to administer them properly. The recent territorial changes in Italy have interfered with some of them, such as the salute of 20 guns on the 24th of June, when the Florentine Minister crossed the bridge of St. Angelo to visit in state the national church of St. John, that day being his festival. There being no longer any Florentine minister, there is, of course, no salute from the castle in his honour. But the venerable mole of Hadrian thunders out a welcome to the solemnity of the Circumcision with 14 guns; the Epiphany with 14; Annunciation, 14; Holy Thursday, during the Papal benediction, 40; Holy Saturday, during the Gloria, 30; Easter Sunday, at dawn, 14; ditto, during the benediction, 50; St. Philip and St. James's Festival, 14; St. Michael, of Mount Gargan, 14; Ascension Day, at dawn, 14; ditto, during the Papal benediction, 40; Pentecost, 14; during the Corpus Domini procession, 80; Procession of the Hospital of Santo Spirito, 8; St. John's Eve, 30; St. Peter's Day, at dawn, 14; ditto, at noon, 15; during St. Ann's procession on the eve, 16; on her festival during the Elevation, 50; Assumption, at dawn, 14; ditto, during the Papal benediction, 40; St. Michael, 14; on the Pope's return from villeggiatura, 30; All Saints', 14; Christmas Eve, 30; ditto, at dawn, 14."

The Rev. P. T. Ouvre, Vicar of Wing, writes to the Guardian:

"If the Church of England is to be in the future the representative Church of a great Christian nation, it must appreciate the developments which the increase of knowledge makes necessary. Its instruments for special purposes, such as the Propagation Society, will be deemed the reflection of its own spirit; and so, if they show narrowness and sectarianism, the Church, of which they are the organs, will be stamped as narrow and sectarian too. The Church of England does now in the persons of its sincere members, represent, I thoroughly believe, all honest forms of Christian thought. There are in it men of extreme views, who are on the very verge of allowable comprehension; but for my part I should be very reluctant to draw a line so as to exclude them, so long as they see their way to remain within its pale."

At the meeting of the Church Reform Association mentioned in "What is Doing," Mr. Charles Buxton, M.P., said:

"What was really wanted, and what must some day be obtained, was a radical reform in the constitution of the Established Church, so as to apply to it more principles of freedom and self-government. While the Established Church was nominally the religion of the whole English people, and practically the religion of the majority, it was absolutely without any power of getting rid of abuses, of adapting itself to the spirit of the age, or of legislating for itself in accordance with the feelings of those who belong to it. It was certainly most extraordinary that an institution so great, so deservedly and deeply beloved, should be fettered in every limb, like a prisoner in a dungeon, instead of being allowed that freedom of movement and that power of constant change which in every other case seemed to be absolutely essential to the maintenance of vigorous and healthy life. No doubt we had a miserable pretence of such machinery in Convocation; but it really performed no function whatever except that of making itself ridiculous and exciting odium against the Church; and as to Parliament, common sense revolted at the idea that it should be invoked to the discussion of purely theological questions, composed as it was of men of all denominations, and many of them conscientiously hostile to the Church. What they wanted was that the Established Church in England should be provided with a parliament of her own. It was true that this might appear to tend in the direction of a separation, but the two things are by no means necessarily connected. There was no real reason why the Church should not have a legislative body of her own that should really represent the mind and feelings of the members of her communion without cutting asunder those bonds by which she was now united to the State. One thing, however, was obviously essential if such a change should ever be carried through, and that was, that the clergy should no longer be considered as the sole representatives and rulers of the Church, but that the laity should be allowed that paramount, that superior influence over her government which was manifestly their right. All would agree that the people were not made for the Church, but the Church was made for the people."

The Saturday Review, after noticing the difficulties which lay in the way of the Irish Church Bill, and which have been so triumphantly surmounted says:

"The reception of it in Ireland has not been among the least efficacious of the causes that have pushed it on. By the Irish Protestants it has been received with a fury which was in itself quite pardonable, but which became contemptible when it betrayed laymen into talk about repeal which in the mouths of Protestant landlords is nonsensical, and betrayed bishops into bursts of coarse and intemperate language about 'garotters' and 'Billy Gladstone.' By the mass of the Irish people the bill has been received with gentle patronage and lukewarm approbation, as a mild instalment of what they deserve and hope to get. Far from frightening or irritating England, the attitude of the Irish has only made England more anxious to get the Irish Church Bill passed. We know perfectly well that the Irish ask many things which it is impossible to give them, which justice itself forbids that we should let them have. But we cannot discuss these darker and more doubtful questions with any inward comfort or satisfaction so long as such a manifestly unjust thing as the Irish Established Church is suffered to remain. Very difficult questions will arise as to what is just when we come to discuss Irish land and Irish education, and England naturally wishes to gain freedom of action on these points by having got the Irish Church out of the way."

The same paper, which considers the Bill to be perhaps the best drawn bill of modern times, says:

"Throughout its whole conception appears one leading principle clearly and consistently followed. Every detail has been most carefully considered with reference to this principle, and has been put in a shape admitting of scarcely any mistake. With all the goodwill in the world, a majority, however overwhelming, could not have carried it through before Whitsuntide if conflicting principles had appeared in the composition of the bill, or if the clauses had not been so shaped as to give practical effect to the wishes of the ministry." "From the day when Mr. Gladstone made his speech explaining what the Government measure was to be, it became evident that the parts of the bill would so fit into each other that it would be exceedingly difficult to take some of those parts and to reject the rest. This has gone far to secure the rapid passage of the bill through the Commons, and it can scarcely fail to operate in the Lords. The Lords may reject the bill altogether, which is in the last degree unlikely; but if they once accept it they will find it very difficult to alter it much, unless they attempt to re-cast the whole basis on which it is framed, which would be equivalent to rejecting it, and would entail the same political consequences."

It is said "furor ministrat arma," but among Orangemen it seems to minister little save folly and vulgar abuse. At a meeting near Portadown, for instance, Archdeacon Saurin ("venerable" man!) varied his speech with a parody, beginning, "Friends, Protestants, Countrymen! we are come to bury Gladstone, not to praise him," and so on, in a style suggestive of a clown at a circus. The Church Bill, he said, would live to bear its evil fruit long after Mr. Gladstone and his deeds were "in the deep bosom of the ocean buried." The spoliation of the Church was but a stepping-stone to "the levelling of Trinity College, the seizure of forfeited estates and the Protestant property of the country, with the hope of rooting out and banishing the whole Protestant population." Then having asked, "How can you put Protestantism and Popery, with its so-called voluntary system, on an equality?" he replied that to do this Mr. Gladstone must give us "the keys of heaven and hell; he must open purgatory to us; and above all, he must allow us the sale of indulgences." They were at the present moment, he continued, "standing on the threshold of the Gladstone abattoir, but were, thank God, not quite disembowelled. The Protestants of Ulster will once more stand shoulder to shoulder; fight hand to hand, and sweep every Fenian rebel and every infringer of their rights out of the country—clear them out—aye, and the Mayor of Cork and his myrmidons into the bargain." And rant like this, we are told, was greatly cheered by the audience.

A Rev. W. Brock, rector of Bishop's Waltham, Hants, has likewise been having his "shy" at the Prime Minister. In a letter addressed to him he says:

"It is an old trick of the Jesuits to choose good names for doing the worst things, and that is just what the Government is now doing. Under the name of 'Liberality' you are abusing your power to put down the Protestant religion and the liberties of England! But if Christian Englishmen can prevent it, God being their helper, you shall not do it. There are thousands and tens of thousands throughout this kingdom whose daily prayer it is that the counsels of Ahithophel may be turned into foolishness, and we have faith in God that, with the House of Lords and our gracious Sovereign the Queen to stop you in your reckless and revolutionary career, your conspiracy against the faith and freedom of the Empire will be exposed and crushed. The time may not be far distant, sir, when 'the vile person' shall no more be called 'liberal'; and I am much mistaken if this last act of our 'Liberal' Home Secretary, undertaken at the bidding of your priestly masters, does not do much to bring matters to a more speedy issue with your measures and your Ministry than you may desire. . . . You are committing sacrilege, you are teaching the people of this country to lie and to steal; you are suborning our gracious Queen to perjury, and these are vile things to do. Retribution must come down upon you for doing them. . . . It will be a consolation to me before I minister at the Lord's table to-day to have lifted up my humble voice thus publicly against your sin."

No occasion to pray that the counsels of Mr. Brock may be turned into foolishness.

On Wednesday, the Dean of Ripon had more than two columns of small print in the Times addressed to Mr. Gladstone, the object of which was to show that, in regard to Romanism and Protestantism, "equality of privilege, the beau ideal of Liberalism, is utterly impracticable." There is a sort of pretentiousness about Dr. McNeile, and his manifestoes acquire a degree of notoriety from being published in the Times, which the Pall Mall considers may perhaps justify it "in paying a little more attention to them than it would be disposed to pay to utterances which did not proceed from so large and loud a speaking trumpet." After giving an abstract of the Dean's argument, if argument it can be called, which is based on certain passages from Thomas Aquinas and the bull "Cena Domini," our contemporary, which doubts "whether it would be possible to put into the same space a greater amount of wild absurdity," says:

"It shows at every step a persistency in wrong-headedness which can only be described as a craze. There is a kind of perversity in coupling together Thomas Aquinas, the bull 'Cena Domini,' the teaching at Maynooth, and the murders in Tipperary, which would be faintly represented by coupling some passage in Paley's 'Moral Philosophy' with some clause in the Queen's proclamation of neutrality, and accounting thereby for the perfidious conduct of this country in the matter of the Alabama. To say that the moral theology of the Roman Catholics or that their canon law justifies agrarian murders is utterly false in fact, and proves gross ignorance of the whole system which is made the object of attack upon the part of the person who attacks it." "Dr. McNeile ought to know that, like all other people of ordinary common sense who have systematically discussed ethical problems, Roman Catholic writers on moral theology recognise the principle of prescription. Probably there is not a professor or student at Maynooth, or in any other Roman Catholic seminary, who would not say that whatever may have been the original vice of the titles of the ancestors of existing Irish landlords to their land it has long since been cured by prescription. The present owners, at all events, hold in good faith and by a reasonable title, and have held for a length of time far greater than that which any system of positive law or any ethical system would recognise as necessary to put an end to all outstanding claims. Besides this, the moral obligation on the possessor of stolen property to make restitution is one thing, the moral right of the person kept out of possession to take it is quite another, and his right to possess himself of it by private assassination is a step, and a very long step, further still. If Dr. McNeille could produce any evidence to show that at Maynooth or elsewhere any Roman Catholic theologian teaches that an Irish peasant now may lawfully—in foro conscientie—shoot an Irish landlord from behind a hedge, because the Irish landlord's ancestor wrongfully acquired lands which were the property of the peasant's ancestor several hundred years ago, he would prove something of importance. As it is, he really proves nothing at all but his own ignorance, and he displays that in a manner which makes it rather a mortifying thing that he should be allowed to put himself forward as a champion of Protestantism."

EDMUND DE PRESSENSE.

OF this eminent French preacher and writer, from whose article in the British Quarterly we gave an extract a fortnight ago, an American gentleman in Paris writes thus:—Of Pressensé we know both little and much. That he is the son of a noble French family, is Protestant and evangelical in his convictions, and was a pupil of Neander, is all we know of his origin and early life. But this is much. French, and of a noble family, he could hardly have lacked early social and scholastic advantages; Protestant and evangelical, he escaped alike the superstitions of Romanism and the excesses of Rationalism; a pupil of Neander, he must have early felt the fascinating charm of profound spirituality, combined with vast erudition. Given these conditions of life, with a noble spirit to occupy them, and we may justly look for a valuable result. Such a result is Pressensé in his life and works. Let us glance at him where every preacher should be seen, in his own pulpit. We found his chapel one Sunday morning, last summer, after much inquiry and more patience. We enter a building bearing no outward semblance of a church; a long passage leads us so far back that the noises of the street die away; we ascend flights of stairs, and at last find ourselves in a spacious chapel. This is plainness itself. Chairs supply the place of pews; the walls are void of ornament, and the sole attraction of the place is evidently not yet come. Seats being free we sit down in the rear of the audience, and wait the pastor's coming. Meantime the congregation comes in and fills every seat. There is a large sprinkling of English and Scotch hearers in the throng. The pastor walks in and begins the service at the appointed minute. The singing and prayers are thoroughly devotional, and the Scripture lessons appropriate to the pastor's theme. As he stands there, we note that he is of middle height; stout, but not too much so; of fair complexion and chesnut hair; clean-shaven and bright-eyed. In a clear, ringing voice, and positive manner, he delivers a sermon remarkable alike for its matter and style. This man is notable for his position, as well as his abilities. He is the leader of that wing of the French Protestant Church which believes in and realises the independence of Church and State. About two hundred such churches exist in France; and their influence on the future of that land is one of its stars of hope. There are several of these in Paris, under the care of Pressensé and his co-labourers. They are active and hopeful.

POPERY IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

THE good people of Laleham ought to have been highly honoured by the exhibition given them on "Holy Thursday" by Father Ignatius, the evangelist of monasticism, and his attendant monks and nuns of the order of St. Benedict. Quiet little Laleham, a village about three miles from Staines, has been chosen by the "Deacon" as a fitting site for a monastery. Here the more advanced Ritualists held what a leading daily paper—deprecating in almost the same breath the use of ridicule by the "very queer evangelists"—calls a field-day. The buildings of the monastery seem to be constructed principally of pasteboard, with paper crosses gummed on in every accessible place, and a barn has been transformed into a chapel. In this barn there was a brilliant display of banners, vestments, candles, flower-pots, and all the other paraphernalia peculiar to Ritualistic adoration. The use of incense was profuse, and we suppose it was for the same purpose as the primitive Christians used it in the catacombs. Certainly there are circumstances which justify the practice, and we will give an instance. A certain Yorkshire schoolmaster (now long dead) was in want of a chapel, and, being of an ingenious turn of mind, he determined after due deliberation on forming one out of his hayloft, which was useless to him. The hayloft was accordingly cleared, and service was in due course performed. We soon discovered, however, that the vacant stable below had been turned into a pig sty, a fact which the ingenious schoolmaster either ignored or did not perceive. For our own sakes and that of the congregation, we wished he had been a Ritualist. But if the primitive Christians were followed in this respect, surely they ought to be followed in others. Did they, we wonder, ever bring in little boys with shaven crowns and wrapped up in swaddling clothes, to perform various acrobatic feats? Had they altars covered with divers colours? Did their young converts worship in dresses gay with flowers of many hues? And above all did they parade the Host through the streets? And yet we must admire the unsectarian character of the church that embraces the Calvinism of a Herbert, the heresy of a Colenso, and the Romanism of a Lyne.

WHAT MAY BE SAID AGAINST MR. GLADSTONE'S BILL.

THE general consent of the Liberal party both in politics and religion to the necessity of some such measure as that for disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church, and the general agreement as to the extraordinary practical merits of Mr. GLADSTONE'S measure, are so remarkable that it fortunately requires no great stretch of candour to consider with fairness what few objections are urged on our own side. We have therefore gladly given insertion to two articles in our last two numbers—one on the weak side of Mr. GLADSTONE'S bill, and the other in the form of a notice of Dr. VANCE SMITH'S pamphlet,* under the signature of both of which, "CH. W.," our readers would have little difficulty in recognising the initials of one of our most respected ministers. It is impossible to help feeling that our friend has put what is to be said against Mr. GLADSTONE'S bill in a very forcible way. He does not disguise his thorough sympathy with the general Liberal opinion "that the Irish Church, as established in its tyrannical and exclusive ascendancy, was the crime of past generations, and is the misfortune of the present." But he thinks that the question is being settled with a rush, and in a way involving mistakes, which, though they may be of small moment in Ireland, would be extensively mischievous if established as a precedent for the settlement of the similar question sure to be eventually raised with regard to the establishment in England. The gist of his objection is this, that whereas the Episcopal Church in Ireland is now in possession of State property, but restricted by State control, this measure will leave it still in possession of State property, but without State control. Thus the measure is to a large extent, as he puts it, not so much one of disendowment as one of re-endowment, and so far as it is re-endowment, re-endowment without conditions. In this our friend sees the gratifying of High Church ambition and the abandonment on the part of the nation of its duty as trustee of this property for the religious use, not of a section of the community but of the whole people. There is a great deal of truth in this view. If the matter could be settled upon abstract principles of right, if we could begin afresh and adjust Irish religious interests apart from the complications of the past, Mr. GLADSTONE would certainly never have proposed to hand over some millions of property to the Episcopal Church, or to any other. But we cannot begin afresh. We have to deal with a state of things of extraordinary complication which has grown up through many centuries and become a part of the very being of Ireland. It is not possible to escape from such a condition by the settlement which may appear to one of the parties concerned to be the most right and just in the abstract. When a nation has been for centuries working in a mistaken direction, and involving itself in the coils of a great wrong, it will generally be found, when the necessity for a change arises, that it is impossible to stir in any direction without involving inconsistencies and compromises which to some must seem like absolute violations of principle. This simply arises from the fact that we have not as long a time to grow out of false positions as to grow into them. A wrong grows up through centuries; when at last it becomes intolerable, its abolition cannot wait as many years. We had the same difficulty in a still more glaring shape in the case of slavery. Here were men keeping their fellow-creatures in bondage and treating them as chattels. Looking to absolute right, the life of the slave-owner was one gigantic theft. On all abstract principles of justice, whatever compensation there was in the matter, was due to the slaves. Looking with unprejudiced eyes upon so gross a wrong, one feels that to propose compensation to the owners was something like proposing compensation to a burglar who is deprived of stolen property, or to a band of Thugs prevented from carrying out their religious privileges in their own particular way. But the masters were compensated. The fact was they were only the inheritors, along with the rest of the community, of a false and vicious system; and the payment made to them was merely the spreading of the cost of doing right over the whole community. And it is the same with regard to the Irish Church. Here is the great, almost universally admitted wrong of Protestant ascendancy. It is felt that it must be done away with. The question will not wait; it has become a burden upon the conscience of enlightened statesmen, such as can no longer be borne. Well, the price we have to pay is the surrendering to the Church, thus deprived of its ascendant position, a certain proportion of the property which has become associated with its very existence.

But how was it possible that this should be avoided? The Irish Church is not a mere department of the State. If it were, all that would be necessary would be to abolish it. But it is a religious institution, and one with a life and an aggregate of activities which will require support when it is disestablished as much as they do now, but for which its whole position up to this time has prevented it making the provision which in the abstract we feel to be the true one. It might perhaps be answered that the State, if allowing it to retain any property, should have maintained its control; but this is precisely the thing which it is growing more and more clear to thoughtful men it is impossible for the State to maintain. At present we, as a part of the nation, have an infinitesimal fraction of control over the Established Church. So have hundreds and thousands who no more belong to that Church than we do. But this state of things is radically wrong. It seems to bring some little gain to freedom, but in the long run it is fatal to it. Men must work out their own salvation from creeds as from everything else, and a liberty that is enforced upon a religious institution by the State is no real solution of the difficulty which arises from the differences of religious conviction. It is to our minds one of the best points in Mr. GLADSTONE's bill that it does not attempt anything of the kind. He leaves the Irish Episcopalians to organise themselves, and not even under the specious plea of retaining a hold over property technically national, has he been betrayed into perpetuating that connexion of the State and the Church which in Ireland has been utterly fatal to wholesome religious life. That his measure is perfect we do not aver; but abstract perfection is unattainable. As the Duke of WELLINGTON said, the greatest general is he who makes the fewest blunders.

THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL AND MODERN BELIEVERS.

(From the Nation, N.Y.)

THE growing laxity of the bonds between Church and State in England, Austria, Italy, and Spain, and the fierce discussions which are raging all over the European continent touching the relations in which the Church should stand to the State in an ideal community, together with the near approach of the meeting of the Œcumenical Council at Rome, are all signs that we have almost reached the close of the first stage in the revolt of freedom against authority which began with the Reformation. What that great revolution really secured for the individual in most civilised countries, was simply the privilege of worshipping God in his own way, subject to certain inconveniences and restrictions. Nobody has, in any European country, until very recently, dissented from the established form of faith without a certain amount of suffering in mind, body, or estate. Either he was excluded from certain offices, or was compelled to contribute to funds from which he reaped no benefit, or was shut out from certain educational advantages, or was subjected to a certain amount of social discredit. This was true even of the most advanced countries. In the less advanced ones, like Spain, it was only by great prudence and self-denial that he avoided getting into gaol or losing his goods. All this was the natural and legitimate consequence of the doctrine, which survived the Reformation, that the State, being a moral person, is bound to have a religion of its own. Now the State having no means of expressing its opinions on any subject, except by means of commands sanctioned by penalties, it could only be religious by adopting some one creed, and slightly persecuting such persons as did not embrace it. What is meant by a State-church is, in short, a church to which the State testifies its devotion by inflicting some penalty on all who do not belong to it.

Such is the influence of habit and of the sentiment of antiquity on the mass of mankind, that there is no knowing how long the Church might have maintained its temporal supremacy if it had not allied itself with political tyranny. If it had only used the "arm of flesh" with moderation, and had contented itself with a moderate amount of deference and profits, it might perhaps have avoided being put on an equality with dissenters for one or two centuries more; but its horror of movement and of change has really precipitated its overthrow as far as this world is concerned. Before the French Revolution the mass of the higher clergy belonged to the aristocratic caste, and naturally sided with the privileged orders against the populace. Since the Revolution, its ranks have everywhere been largely recruited from the people; but the new class of priests and bishops have been just as zealous defenders of the absolute authority of pope and king as the old ones were of the feudal constitution of society. So the revolt has gone on, and, the absolute authority of the crown having been overthrown, the principle of a State religion is sharing its fate.

What is alarming churchmen most, however, is not so much the threatened loss of the temporal supremacy as the spirit in which the revolt against its supremacy is conducted. The fierceness and bitterness of the early Reformers are no longer visible amongst its enemies. Priests run no risk of being mobbed or hanged; converts run no risk of being sacked. There is no enthusiasm whatever in the work of demolition. In the new movement there are no Luthers, or Knoxes, or Gustavuses. Nobody wants either to make martyrs or be a martyr himself. The prevailing temper of the anti-state churchmen, indeed, both in England, Austria, and Italy, is one of contemptuous indifference. They treat the connection between Church and State as an old and rather tiresome joke, of which the world has had more than it can bear. A temper of this kind your genuine ecclesiastic finds it much harder to contend against than real persecuting hatred. Dr. Newman, in one of his farewell sermons before he went over to Rome, spoke of this easy, tolerant spirit of the times as to him the saddest of all modern social phenomena, and declared, with a good deal of insight, that he would prefer superstition, no matter how dark.

A correspondent of the London Times strikingly illustrates this point in describing the complete indifference with which the French public, Catholic though it be, views the approaching meeting of the Œcumenical Council. Nobody seems to care in the least what conclusion that body may reach. If it promulgates any diatribes against modern society, after the manner of the Pope's Syllabus, people will simply pay no attention to them. If it produces any new dogmas for the acceptance of the faithful, the faithful will either try to believe them or not, each individual as he pleases. Let them be easy or hard to swallow, there will be no controversy about them—they will make no recusants or schismatics. All French Catholics are willing to believe anything that the Church may prescribe as worthy of belief, if they can do so without inconvenience; if it be too hard work to believe it, they will simply let it alone. Fuss about it they will not make. In France, too, as in other countries, the meeting of the Council is looked for rather with what may be called antiquarian than with religious interest. People's imagination is impressed most by the fact that it is an ancient assemblage, which has not met for three hundred years, and which, when it last met, was supposed to be capable of revealing literally and exactly the Divine thought on all matters of human concern. It comes before the world now, therefore, rather as a mediæval curiosity than a living force.

An Italian paper, which professes to have seen a list of the subjects to be debated and passed upon by the Council, mentions amongst the number the dogma of the infallibility of the Pope, and of his supremacy over the Council itself, which the Council is to affirm and promulgate; and the doctrine of "the moral necessity of the temporal power," the affirmation of which by the Council will, the Papal authorities flatter themselves, "produce a salutary effect on the ideas of princes and peoples, consolidate the power of the Church," and lead, sooner or later, to the restitution of the provinces usurped by the Revolution. Now, the discussion and promulgation of such doctrines by the Council as the will of the Almighty, so far from affecting "the ideas of princes and peoples," will simply help to heighten the pictorial effect of the show. The Œcumenical Council, talking as moderns talk, and thinking as moderns think, would, as a spectacle, be very imperfect; but, uttering the Divine will with regard to the proper division of the soil of Italy, and authoritatively informing us that any old Italian priest whom the cardinals may select for the office of Pope can never by any possibility be mistaken on any subject on which he deliberately makes up his mind and utters it, the entertainment will be faultless. It will give us a real glimpse, and probably a last one, of the sixteenth century, and will increase the number of the intellectual puzzles which the Church now offers to the inquirer from the outside. He is already a little staggered by the complete repudiation demanded of him by the Church, of the authority of the very reason through which she works his conversion into the true faith; but he will be fairly nonplussed by being called on to accept the dogma of the infallibility of the Pope at the hands of an authority outside the Pope. If the Pope be infallible, there is no need of the Council; and all he has to do to impose on Christians the obligation of accepting him as such, is to promulgate the doctrine himself.

Among the minor incidents which mark the growing wideness of the gulf which separates the Church from the modern world, is the late speech of Senor Castelar in the Spanish Cortes in defence of religious liberty, and in reply to an outspoken assertion of the right of persecution by a priest named Manterola. Few finer bursts of eloquence are to be found in parliamentary annals, and its merit was heightened by the fact that it was uttered in real debate—that is, was spoken impromptu in reply to an opponent who had just sat down. It was in many ways a model parliamentary speech, that of a consummate master of language, dealing with a subject he thoroughly understands, and on which he deeply feels; and its effect was heightened by its being spoken in Madrid, by a Spaniard, before an audience unused for centuries to free speech on any subject, and, above all, on the rights of conscience; and it closed with a peroration by which any audience anywhere might well have been moved. And yet, out of Spain, it will be read mainly as a rhetorical feat. The positions it assails have in other civilised countries been carried; the doctrines it preaches are already, in the rest of Christendom, set down amongst the common-place assumptions to which men hardly think it necessary to refer specifically, either in conversation or debate. To know how far the world has travelled since the days of the Calas, one can hardly do better than watch the fight which the Spanish Liberals are carrying on.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. R. H. Cotton, of Worcester, has accepted the Unitarian pulpit, Padiham, and commenced his labours on Sunday last, May 16th.

AMERICAN NOTES.

An American, who has been recently "among us takin' notes," while, on the whole, his notices are of a favourable kind, justly criticises some of our arrangements, and offers hints from which we might take a lesson. This is the case especially in regard to our travelling arrangements. He considers that our steamers are, in some respects, a disgrace to us as a maritime nation, and, with good reason, contrasts the shouting all orders by the pilot to the boy, and by the boy to the helmsman or the engineer, with the much more agreeable method adopted in his own country of simply pulling a bell once, twice, or thrice, according to the nature of the order to be given.—Our toll system falls under his ridicule. He enters an omnibus; after a drive of about a minute it halts, and a toll collector appears, and there is a squabble respecting the toll. One of his fellow-countrymen, anxious to save time, offered to pay the amount, but the toll collector looked indignant, thinking probably that his right to grumble and stop the way was about to be interfered with. This system, with our fondness for Chancery suits, paying pence to cross a narrow bridge, and more pence to return, are evidences to the American of peculiar national idiosyncrasy.—He enters a railway carriage; but before doing so he compassionates the condition of the engine-driver, who is compelled to face the snow and the hail, and is surprised that Englishmen do not adopt the American plan of providing a glass shelter for engine-drivers. The account which he gives of the sleeping cars in his own country makes us wish we had the sense to adopt so comfortable a system:

"A person who is obliged to travel all night pays a few shillings extra for a berth in a sleeping car, and takes his seat there during the day, having a little extra room and comfort for his money. At night his berth is made up by the waiter, who takes charge of his ticket; he undresses; he puts out his boots; he goes to sleep; he rests undisturbed. In the morning he has arrived at his destination; his clothes are brushed and his boots are blacked; he makes his toilet at a dressing table in a corner of the car; the waiter will shave him—few Americans shave themselves—if he choose; he has only to get his breakfast, and go at once to his business. The traveller in England under the same circumstances pays a few shillings to the guard for the privilege of having two or three seats instead of one."

Our critic acknowledges, however, that in not a few respects English railways have the advantage over American ones. Our stations are superior, and we have fewer accidents. In some localities of his own country, he says, "the railway accidents supply the newspapers with their only local items, and regulate the price of beef." We have also greater ease in travelling; while in America the jolting is so great on some roads that passengers resemble a troupe of acrobats. Our trains are more expeditious; while the slowness of American trains is proverbial. There is a story current that a negro walking along a country road overtook a train, and was invited by the good-natured conductor to "jump aboard, and ride into town." "No, 'tank you, massa," replied Sambo, "I'se in a hurry, I is."—He gives an amusing account of his first experiences among English travellers. For some little time his fellow-passengers were absorbed in their papers, and took no notice of the stranger. In process of time one of them was sufficiently familiar to offer him a fusee. Then, as the ice began to thaw, another gentleman asked him for the loan of one of his newspapers. Ten minutes elapsed. Then a general conversation ensued, and greatly to his delight and astonishment, everybody spoke to him, handed their flasks of spirits, and accepted a transatlantic cigar. At first, he doubted whether his companions were Englishmen, so genial were they—so much like other men. But the following example of British humour convinced him that these men were after all genuine Britons:

"A saturnine gentleman in a corner of the compartment favoured his friend opposite with a brief but harrowing account of his recent release from a ship which had been quarantined for yellow fever. It was to be inferred from his remarks that he had fallen a victim to the pestilence, had but just recovered, and was fearful of communicating the disease to his comrade. This story was very credible, for the relator looked as if jaundice had seized him when the fever left, and deepened his yellow to a dirty brown. His friend responded by narrating his sufferings in a small-pox hospital, from which he had emerged the day before, and describing his compunctions at bringing a disease which might possibly prove contagious into a car so destitute of fresh air. Observing that these stories were told to each other, but at me, and not at once perceiving that they were a roundabout way of hinting that the window near which I sat ought to be lowered, I incidentally remarked in a deprecatory manner that, although yellow fever and small-pox had been my constant diseases for many years, the Asiatic cholera, which was my favourite complaint at present, might not be agreeable to those of the company who were less habituated to such comparatively trifling maladies. Though I still hold that Americans, like educated Irishmen, speak the English language better than Englishmen themselves, there was something in my accent which betrayed my nationality, and as a stranger they gave me welcome. The chaff was explained, the window lowered, and then the sherry and water followed in due course. Nothing could exceed the kindness with which these Englishmen advised me as to what I should do when I reached London in order to gain my hotel safely. My programme was so clearly marked out for me that I had only to follow it and be happy."

It is stated that the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's congregation are raising a fund to present to him for a foreign tour.

The Rev. Robert Laird Collier, who has done excellent work in Chicago, making his church one of the great centres of Christian influence there, requires rest, and is coming to Europe for a four months' vacation.

Another of our ministers, likewise, Dr. Osgood, who succeeded Dr. Dewey, in charge of the Church of the Messiah in New York, and has faithfully laboured there for twenty years, is about to spend some time on this side of the Atlantic, and his numerous friends are raising a testimonial to present to him before his departure.

Our friend Dr. Bellows has been selected as the representative of the United States Sanitary Commission in the National Lincoln Monument. It is proposed likewise by the Monument Association to erect a colossal bronze statue of Dr. Bellows as President and representative of this Commission. "Those who are best acquainted with its history," says the Liberal Christian, "and the work it actually accomplished, will heartily rejoice at this action of the Monument Association as an eminently fitting and deserved memorial of the efforts of one who did more perhaps to originate that Commission, and get it adopted by the Government, than any other, if not all others, and to whose organising ability and untiring efforts is due the success of the most magnificent charity of modern times."

RELEASED.

TO R. L.

RELEASED at last! Released from agony!
The Lord hath answered thus our pleading cry;
And thou hast gone—sweet peace upon thy brow,
In heaven now.
Yes, gone! The perfumed flower he loved so well
No longer hath aerial tale to tell;
The glad green earth, the vocal air, is mute
As broken lute.
Gone? Not gone; for, like a nestling bird,
Creeps back into our heart his quiet word,
And, with the music of a hidden rill,
Sings to us still.
No filmy veil shall fall 'twixt us and thee;
But, rather, thou shalt help our eyes to see
That thou art closer, dearer than before Death oped his door.

EASTER EVE IN ST. PETERSBURG.

THE great church ceremony throughout Russia is the midnight service of Easter Eve, commemorating the all-important event that gives to Sunday itself its Russian name of "Voskresseyn" (Resurrection). Nowhere, according to the St. Petersburg correspondent of the Post, is this pageant more imposing than in the great Isaac Cathedral, remarkable even among the stately churches of the metropolis for the splendour of its golden dome and vast granite monoliths. Threading his way through a labyrinth of wooden stalls, twinkling with small tapers, and heaped with medals, crucifixes, leaden saints, &c., for the benefit of the orthodox, the spectator reaches the principal entrance. The huge carved doors swing heavily back and disclose the already thronged interior: above, the shadowy expanse of the dome; beneath, the mighty arches clothed in floating shadow; while here and there a circle of light round the tall candles casts a fitful glare on the faces of the crowd, who appear and vanish like phantoms. From the central platform rolls the deep voice of the officiating priest, reciting the customary prayers, in that quaint, sonorous Slavonic tongue which has been well-nigh chased from the earth by the spread of modern Russ; while ever and anon the choir breaks in with its measured chant, which dies away among the giant arches in a cadence inexpressibly sweet and plaintive—the characteristic feature of Russian music.

Suddenly, on every side, shoot upward little jets of flame, breaking asunder and circling as they go. Over the tall candles on the altar—round the chandeliers suspended from the lower ceiling—up into the dim vastness of the dome itself, the fire flits like a quickening spirit, leaving in its course endless twinkling points of light, and making the vast pillars stand out like the ribs of some skeleton mammoth under the moonlight of the far north. Then at one stroke the countless faces rise to view: bearded officers, glittering in gold-laced uniform; blase students, glancing around with studied indifference; low-browed peasants, their hard faces softened by devotional fervour; beautiful girls, with long dark hair flowing over their white robes; and many, many more, of every rank and age. Slowly boom out the last strokes of midnight, and suddenly the door of the sanctuary falls back, and the attendant priests, in their high helmet-shaped caps and embroidered robes, sweep down the long vista to the central platform, where lies the coffin that typifies the great sacrifice. In another moment the coffin is raised on the shoulders of four tall deacons, and borne towards the western entrance, the priests following with bowed heads and folded arms, marching in time to a funeral chant. As they vanish through the gate whence they must make the circuit of the entire building, a solemn silence falls on the vast assemblage; all stand mutely expectant, as though awaiting some great event.

Suddenly there arises a distant sound of chanting, coming gradually nearer and nearer, and at length, through the same gate by which it departed, re-enters the procession—but this time in triumph. Sacred banners follow the march now, heads are proudly uplifted instead of drooping, and, mounting the platform, they wave their standards rejoicingly, while the chief priest lifts his hands on high, and shouts in a voice of thunder, "Christ is risen!" Then bursts from the choir the grand Resurrection Anthem, while a sea of bright points surges up through the crowd, as at the same moment thousands of tapers are lighted, and on every side is heard the greeting which will ring throughout the length and breadth of the land, "Christ is risen! He is risen indeed!"

DAVID THE PSALMIST, NOT THE PAINTER.

THE Paris Public tells the following story of Lamartine, which is said to be authentic. He was a poet before he was a statesman, and it so happened that in 1848, when Minister of Foreign Affairs, he was still open to the divine afflatus, and never neglected the inspiration of the moment. If it caught him in the midst of his official duties, his habit was to note it down in his memorandum book, no matter how it consorted with the business entries which preceded and came after it. One day he had recorded a number of applications for subordinate offices in his department, from persons who had either been recommended to him, or in some way had recommended themselves. Soon after, he was seized with the idea that he would devote his "meditations" to King David, the psalmist, for whom, as an immortal poet, he had already expressed his rapturous admiration. He accordingly jotted down in his book, without minding where, the single word "David," which chanced, however, to fall among the applicants for consulships. In due course the list went to the bureau which made out the appointments, and finally the Moniteur announced that "Citizen David" had been made consul at Bremen. Naturally the lucky applicant failed to put in an appearance, or in any way to signify his acceptance of the post or his gratitude for the favour. It then became a question who had recommended him; perhaps the memorandum book would tell. A single glance was enough for the poet-secretary. The next day the Moniteur had a fresh announcement: "Citizen Marchand has been named consul at Bremen, vice Citizen David, transferred to other duties."

THE SOUL.

"JAMES," said a teacher to one of his boys, "what is this I hold in my hand?"

"A watch, sir."

"A little clock," said another.

"Do you see it?"

"Yes, sir."

"How do you know it is a watch?"

"It ticks, sir."

"Very well. Can any of you hear it tick?" All listen. After a little pause:

"Yes, sir, we hear it."

Then he took off the case, and held that in one hand and the watch in the other.

"Now, children, which is the watch?"

"The little one in your right hand, sir."

"Very well again. Now I will put the case aside, put it away down there, in my hat. Now let us see if you can hear the ticking."

"Yes, sir, we hear it," cried several voices.

"Well, the watch can tick, and go, and keep time, you can see, when the case is off and put in my hat. So it is with you, children. Your body is nothing but the case. The soul is inside. The case may be taken off, and buried in the ground; may be cast into the fire, or thrown into the sea; but the soul will live on just as well without the body, as this watch will keep on ticking when the case is laid aside."

MAN'S POWER OF ACCOMMODATION.

In his recently published work "The Polar World," Dr. Hartzog thus explains how it is that explorations can be carried on in regions where the cold is so intense that mercury is generally frozen into a solid body:

"It may well be asked how man is able to bear the excessively low temperature of an Arctic winter, which must appear truly appalling to an inhabitant of the temperate zone. A thick fur clothing, a hut small and low, where the warmth of a fire, or simply of a train-oil lamp suspended in a narrow space, and above all the wonderful power of the human constitution to accommodate itself to every change of climate go far to counteract the rigour of the cold. After a very few days the body develops an increasing warmth as the thermometer descends; for the air being condensed by the cold the lungs inhale at every breath a greater quantity of oxygen, which of course accelerates the internal process of combustion, while, at the same time an increasing appetite, gratified with a copious supply of animal food, of flesh and fat, enriches the blood and enables it to circulate more vigorously. Thus not only the hardy native of the north, but even the healthy traveller, soon gets accustomed to bear without injury the rigours of an Arctic winter. 'The mysterious compensations,' says Kane, 'by which we adapt ourselves to climates are more striking here than in the tropics. In the Polar zone the assault is immediate and sudden, and, unlike the insidious fatality of hot countries, produces its results rapidly. It requires hardly a single winter to tell who are to be the heat-making and acclimated men. Petersen, for instance, who has resided for two years at Apennarik, seldom enters a room with a fire. Another of our party, George Riley, with a vigorous constitution, established habits of free exposure, and active, cheerful temperament, has so inured himself to the cold, that he sleeps on our sledge journeys without a blanket or any other covering than his walking suit, while the outside temperature is thirty degrees."

SYMPATHY.

WHEN bent and bruised beneath the heavy hours,
Defeated ere full bravery is born,
There cometh with some gracious eve or morn
Redeeming beauty, smiling through the powers
Which league against it. Warm, sweet hands in ours
Make us triumphant over biting scorn;
A love-day with the daisy and the corn,
The dew-lipped flower—fair Christ among the flowers—
Gives faithful patience through a world of woe.
So hath God made the bitter yield the sweet,
By tender Sympathy! Where falls the blow
Shall twenty times be kissed and smoothly pressed,
And weary head shall find a calm complete,
Pillowed and soothed upon an eager breast!

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

ON Sunday, May 9th, the annual sermons were preached by the Rev. S. A. Steintal, in the morning at Little Portland-street Chapel, and in the evening at the Free Christian Church, Kentish Town. Sermons were also preached on the same day on behalf of the Mission by the Rev. B. B. Aspland, at Hackney; the Rev. Dr. Sadler, at Hampstead; and the Rev. W. H. Channing, at Bayswater. The collections from these several places produced a larger sum, we understand, than has ever before been raised for the Domestic Mission on a similar occasion. Portland-street, £90. 16s. 11d.; Kentish Town, £7. 7s.; Hampstead, £31; Hackney, £13. The amount from Bayswater was not stated.

On Monday evening the annual meeting was held at University Hall, which was well filled. The Right Hon. the LORD MAYOR, M.P. (Alderman J. C.

Lawrence), occupied the chair, and among the audience were P. Meadows Martineau, Esq. (Treasurer), E. Enfield, Esq. (Secretary), Mr. C. Corkran and Rev. Joseph Heywood (Missionaries), Revs. S. A. Steinthal, J. Worthington (Bolton), C. H. Dall (Calcutta), James Martineau, R. B. Aspland, P. W. Clayden, J. C. Means, Dr. Sadler, T. L. Marshall, H. Solly, T. Rix, John Taylor, W. J. Smyth (late of Godalming); and Messrs. S. W. Browne (Clifton), H. A. Palmer, A. Lawrence, J. Warren, LL.B., P. Higginson, B.A., F. H. Jones, B.A., Lindsey Aspland, LL.D., W. D. Jeremy, M.A., E. Lawrence, LL.B., S. S. Tayler, S. W. Preston, J. Richardson, J. T. Hart, T. Gregory Foster, E. B. Squire, W. N. Green, J. Bentley, P. Worsley, jun., E. Wright, J. Troup, V. J. Collier, F. Collier, T. C. Clarke, A. Simons, I. S. Lister, R. Bartram, J. Wilson.

E. ENFIELD, Esq., read the report of the committee:

It stated that the various operations of the Mission have been carried on quietly and efficiently. Suggestions having been made that it might be advantageous to expend legacies or donations, instead of always investing them, a sub-committee had taken into consideration the general condition of the Mission with a view to these suggestions. Among the principal desiderata are, the want of a large room at the Chapel-street station capable of holding more persons than any in the present building; the establishment of a sanatorium in connection with the same station, like that connected with Spicer-street; the engagement of a female missionary to assist the missionaries in visiting, especially the sick poor. The day schools were reported to be in a satisfactory condition, but there was a want of more room and more pupil teachers, especially at Chapel-street. At Spicer-street the infant schoolroom is found too small for the increased numbers, and the room is to be enlarged at an expenditure of £50, so as to furnish space for twenty more children. The reports of the Government Inspector, Mr. Matthew Arnold, were generally satisfactory as to the condition of all the schools, but as the teaching-staff had not reached the requirements of Article 52, owing to the difficulty of obtaining pupil teachers, the grants had been reduced.

The TREASURER read the financial report, which stated that—

"The receipts for the year amounted to £1,360. 14s., including subscriptions, donations, collections after sermons, capitation grants, interest, and a special donation of £300 from Mrs. Mary Tayler, of Hook. The expenditure has been £1,445. 9s. 10d., including, however, the investment of the £300 donation. The real deficit on the year, is but £24. 8s. 1d., as the treasurer began the year with a deficiency of £60. 7s. 9d."

Long and interesting reports were then read by the missionaries, Mr. Corkran and Mr. Heywood, dwelling in their usual interesting way on the condition of the poor, the causes of distress, and their own various modes of working among them.

Among the more notable points, Mr. CORKRAN dwelt on the need of better organising and centralising our charities for voluntary relief, and strongly deprecated the custom of giving alms indiscriminately. He noticed the marked increase of intelligence and the absence of bitter class feeling amongst the newly-enfranchised voters, so different from the political and party hostility displayed in the first years of his connection with the Mission, twenty-one years ago, when Chartist violence was so ripe. The readers at the library had fallen off in numbers, which he attributed mainly to the very low price of the best standard English authors, and the cheap newspaper: the decline was common, he believed, throughout the metropolis.

Mr. HEYWOOD pleaded for a sanatorium to be established for Chapel-street, there being already two for Spicer-street. Both reports spoke hopefully of the state of things among the poor.

The LORD MAYOR, in moving that the reports be adopted, commented at some length on the various reports. The report of the treasurer, although it did not present a flourishing aspect, gave no cause for discouragement, especially when they were reminded that the sum of £300, being a legacy to the society, had been invested during the year. In regard to the committee's report, some of the most encouraging features are the references made to the visits to the schools of the Government inspector, Mr. Matthew Arnold, whose report was singularly candid, truthful, and minute. Mr. Corkran's report showed an earnestness and depth of sincerity which always characterised his reports, and no one could have heard it without feeling his heart warmed when he spoke so truthfully of the kindness of the poor to each other, and the disposition which was noticed often among the lowest to preserve a virtuous course. He was quite sure that it was the tendency of such reports as these to encourage a more kindly feeling towards the poor, and enable us to form a juster estimate of their trials and virtues. One little matter he heard with regret, the falling off in the number of books taken from the library and reading-room compared with the success of the recreation classes. With regard to the missionaries' reports, he thought they were a little too much disposed to generalise, and what was wanting was evidence of the practical fruits of their labours, which, nevertheless, he believed would be manifest as years roll on.

The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN said he always heard the reports of the missionaries with a deep feeling of personal humiliation; they were a kind of call to go and do some personal work in alleviating the evils of which we heard. But this evening he listened to them with somewhat different feelings from those with which he usually did. He felt that the tone of Mr. Corkran's was especially encouraging, and showed there was more to hope for in the condition of the East of London than he had ventured to believe. He often felt great fears for the future of our civilisation. The revelations that were being made, the statement of the increase of all kinds of distress, and the requirement of increased efforts to promote the emigration of the unemployed, had produced in his own mind feelings of depression for the prospects of the future. Mr. Corkran's report, however, had raised his spirits in contemplating the future of this great city. The Christian church, we were all agreed, was originated for two purposes, the realisation in ourselves of the Christian life, and the embodiment of that religious life in the wide sphere of the world. He always urged upon his people that their church should be an organisation, not for worship alone, but for Christian labour, to endeavour to combat the evils of society around them. It often occurred to him that the Christian church itself may have to take a different form amid the changing conditions of society, and to concentrate in one all the different forms of Christian work, so that each separate congregation should become a perfect manifestation of the spirit and life of Christ. In an organisation of this kind the several Christian churches may find the real field for the development of the graces and virtues of the Christian character. The most blessed work a man can do, the most encouraging work, is just that which is the most painful—going among the sick, the wretched, and the poor, and applying the Gospel to the alleviation of their wants. And whenever he came to those who were engaged in this work, he felt that he must bow down before them as his superiors. He would urge all to give some personal labour and effort in connection with this sphere of labour.

In response to a cordial vote of thanks, moved by Mr. ALFRED LAWRENCE, and seconded by Mr. EDWARD ENFIELD,

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL said that when a preacher had spoken freely what was upon his soul it was a pleasure to find a response from those to whom he had spoken. He had a deep conviction of the great and overwhelming importance of the work in which these Domestic Missions are engaged; for society needs more than ever before these connecting links to bind us one to another, and to bridge over the great chasm that unfortunately divides the rich and the poor. He had to move a resolution of sympathy with Mr. Corkran and Mr. Heywood in their work, and having been a number of years himself engaged in missionary work he knew how grateful it is to have the sympathy of the supporters of the Mission. He had spoken in his sermon the previous day of the joys and privileges of the missionary's life. There is the highest form of ministry at present exercised. They have great difficulties to contend with, and as he walked that day through part of the district in which the missionaries work, although it does not show those signs of abject poverty he expected, and was accustomed to see in Manchester, he saw sights with which many of us are not familiar; he saw great misery, and some courts and alleys not fit for human beings to dwell in. Mr. Steinthal proceeded to give some interesting details of the institutions connected with the Liverpool Mission, spoke highly of sanatoriums, and concluded by uttering an emphatic protest against one of the deepest causes of poverty, distress, and sin—the prevailing intemperance of the community. He entreated them to turn their attention to this subject, and whether or not they agreed with him in the remedies he inculcated and thought the best, he would put it to them that they were bound to find some means which will accomplish the correction of this deplorable and wide-spread evil.

Mr. T. C. CLARKE, in seconding the resolution, said that the Missions were in as healthy a state as they had been for many years. He paid an earnest tribute to the deep, earnest, and successful labours of Mr. Corkran, and the energy, good sense, and judgment of Mr. Heywood, and hoped that Mr. Heywood would be enabled to get sufficient funds for a sanatorium in connection with his Mission. It was necessary now to widen the basis of their operations, and one of the best means of doing this was in more efficient nursing for the sick poor. He thought it very desirable also to have a female missionary to assist the missionaries, especially in visiting and instructing women. This need was felt on account of the absolute want of the presence and sympathy of a very large number of the subscribers in connection with the Mission. He would urge also that the conversion of the sinful and the infusion of the highest religious and spiritual ideas should be kept in view; he wanted to see large congregations connected with the Mission, filled with the spirit of religion.

The Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU moved that this meeting gratefully acknowledge the measure of success that has attended the several branches of the Mission during the past year, and thankfully acknowledges the services of those who have co-operated in carrying on the work. He had only one qualification for moving this resolution, and that was that he had earned no thanks himself, that he stood entirely outside its scope, and was therefore well qualified to be the instrument of expressing the thanks of the meeting. He had much rather deserve thanks than express them, but one of the most difficult lessons to learn is wisely to restrict one's labours and be content with sympathy and approval of labours in which one cannot always bear a personal part. He most heartily appreciated the work in connection with this Mission of those who have time at their disposal, and felt that the more of this voluntary agency we have, the less institutional became the work of the Mission. Institutional work always becomes more or less languid, and requires the perpetual refreshing of a new spirit. He felt inclined to doubt whether we do not create too many new institutions in trying to cure the evils of society, and whether it might not be better that half our institutions should be withdrawn, and the evils, both physical and moral, be left to make their appeal to the individual heart and conscience. But undoubtedly there are portions of the great evils created by our too complicated civilisation which cannot be met but by organisations—hospitals, schools, and missions. In our domestic missions we have a happy combination of agencies which open not only the possibility of a large amount of voluntary work, but a large call for it to accomplish effectively its various agencies. These vast organisations we see around us; these offices and shops of benevolence should be controlled everywhere by the spirit of Christian knowledge and wisdom. The more voluntary agency is introduced the better. He was not afraid of even a much larger amount of the dependence of the poor upon the rich than now exists, provided it be qualified and accompanied by personal knowledge and sympathy. Sometimes political economists drive their doctrine of the necessity of raising the poor to a condition of absolute independence to an extreme. The poor cannot always be so raised as to render it possible for the dependent class entirely to disappear. The ranks of society will continue to exist as they always have existed; they are a part of the providential arrangement of the world, and to endeavour to destroy them is an impossibility. The true way of meeting the evil is by direct and personal contact between the poor and the rich. The reports read that evening were, on the whole, cheering. He quite concurred with the Lord Mayor in thinking it desirable from time to time that they should have direct and positive results. Still, he must add that so long as we are thoroughly satisfied with the perfect fidelity and practical wisdom of those who conduct the Mission we must not ask too closely what has been done. We struggle against the constant rise of sin and misery in the community, and if we can keep it under, that prevention of evil is the chief thing we can do. Suppose these Missions were destroyed, and all other charitable agencies were taken away from our society, where should we be in ten years' time? Even then, although the account may be a modest one of direct positive benefits, we must make up our mind for a perpetual struggle against the weaknesses to which human nature is liable, and so long as in our several circles and in our societies we endeavour to beat down evil, and throw ourselves with our whole souls in the work of social reform, we have reason to be satisfied with the results. Mr. Steinthal deserved their thanks for directing attention to the great evil of intemperance. He could not agree with Mr. Steinthal in the method by which the evil was to be repressed; but he did think it incumbent upon those who were unable to support almost the only practical and vigorous effort to abate the evil, to address themselves to the consideration of what other methods can be adopted. He believed that the ultimate and final hope is the direct individual appeal to the conscience and the improvement of habits. He did not believe in legislative intervention and the machinery of repression; the moral and spiritual appeal was our last hope. But at the same time, it was stupid fanaticism to shut our eyes to the fact that laws may be better or worse with regard to the regulation of the liquor traffic. They should listen to their missionaries on this subject, and in their several stations as citizens and politicians consider this question. Mr. Martineau concluded by expressing his great regret at the absence of the Rev. J. J. Tayler, who was confined to his house by illness.

Mr. H. A. PALMER, in seconding the resolution, referred to the interesting fact that many years ago he, in connection with his revered friends and pastors, Dr. Carpenter and Dr. Estlin, was concerned in establishing the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission at Bristol, of which he was the treasurer. He also paid a tribute of respect to his friend and relative, the late William Wansey, Esq., an old and warm supporter of the London Domestic Mission. It was not long after Dr. Tuckerman, of Boston, U.S., appeared in this country that this Mission was established. Such an institution as this was beneficial, not only upon the poor, it exercised an important reflex influence upon ourselves.

The Rev. Dr. SADLER in moving that this meeting rejoice to hear satisfactory reports of the day schools, adverted to the necessity of having efficient teachers, or else the schools became mere machines instead of spheres of high moral influence. He urged the necessity of personal aid and sympathy; and confessed that he could not help sometimes coveting the power of the Roman Catholic Church, with their organised brotherhoods and sisterhoods. He was sure that the young thirst for activity, and he believed no activity was more after their own heart than that of well-doing. How is it we cannot get their exertions more freely than we do? It seemed to him that if parents would suggest to their daughters that during the interval between finishing their education and settling in life a great part of their time should be devoted to good works, we should never want for such help as has been so earnestly asked to-night. Mr. Wicksteed had once said he felt we should have sisterhoods some time. Can we not have, without any noise or any particular name, a separation from the social and domestic life, simply through the sense of Christian duty and the feeling of Christian love?

The meeting was afterwards addressed by Rev. Jeffery Worthington, Mr. Wightman, Mr. Chadwick, Mr. F. Collier, and Mr. S. S. Tayler, and closed with a hearty acknowledgment (moved by the Rev. R. B. Aspland) of the chairman's readiness to take part in every good cause.

INTELLIGENCE.

Bristol.—On Thursday, the 18th inst., a soirée was held at the Victoria Rooms, of the united congregations of Lewin's-mead Chapel and Oakfield-road Church. The attendance was large, and a great variety of objects of interest were provided for the entertainment of the company, and an excellent selection of music given. The Rev. W. James was in the chair, and expressed the pleasure which he and his friends felt in welcoming the Rev. W. H. Channing once more amongst them. Mr. Channing, in responding, alluded in eloquent terms to the universal spirit of brotherhood which is now abroad. Referring to the good work which Miss Burdett Coutts was doing by bringing the influence of beauty in art into the dark places of our cities, he said it was just this spirit of love that was spreading through all society, bringing in God's springtime to those who had not known it. The question as to the cure of pauperism was the great pressing question of the time, and this evil must be conquered by the influence of that universal charity, spreading everywhere its sunshine. The meeting was also addressed by the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter, and A. N. Blatchford. On Sunday, two eloquent sermons were preached by Mr. Channing, in Oakfield-road Church.

Coseley.—New trustees have at last been appointed to this old chapel, after a delay of about six years, and every hope of success is entertained under the new trust. All the trustees are working men, and closely connected with the congregation. The original deed of this chapel is dated 1720.

Horsham.—The anniversary services of the General Baptist and Free Christian Church, in this town, took place on Sunday last. In the morning, the Rev. J. C. Street, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, conducted worship, and preached an appropriate and stirring sermon from Job ii., 28, 29, on the universal outpouring of God's Spirit. In the afternoon a Lord's Supper service was held, conducted by the preacher of the day in a most appropriate and feeling manner. There were about thirty communicants, and all seemed deeply impressed. In the evening, the members of the congregation and friends took tea together, and afterwards a meeting was held, presided over by the minister, the Rev. J. W. Braithwaite. Addresses were given by the Chairman, Mr. Knight, the Rev. J. C. Street, and Mr. Dendy Agate, of Manchester New College. As at previous anniversaries, friends were present from Brighton, Billingham, Ditchley, and Guildford, and the services are felt to have been the most successful of the kind held for some years.

Kendal.—On Whit-Tuesday the teachers and scholars of the Sunday-school, accompanied by a few friends, in all upwards of 70, went to Windermere on their first pleasure excursion since the re-establishment of the school, and enjoyed themselves in some fields below Orrest Head, where a fine view of the lake is to be had. At three o'clock the party adjourned to Windermere, where an excellent tea awaited them. After this amusements were recommenced and continued till the time for returning home, all having spent a very pleasant day.—The school was commenced on the 14th Feb. last with 14 scholars, and on the 16th May the numbers had gradually increased to 38 under an efficient staff of 12 teachers, a success which must be gratifying to them and to the wellwishers of the school and chapel.

Manchester Sunday School Union.—On Sunday afternoon last, the scholars in connection with all our Manchester schools went to Cross-street Chapel, which they filled in every part. The Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., delivered an address to them from Eccles. xii., 1. There were upwards of two thousand present. As is usual on these occasions the music was remarkably good and the singing most hearty.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—On Wednesday evening, May 12th, the annual Conversation of this congregation was held in the Memorial Hall. The chair was taken by the minister, in consequence of the lamented absence of Mr. Eddowes Bowman, the chapel-warden, who has been confined to his bed for several weeks by illness, from which he is now slowly recovering. Though the soirée had not been made publicly known, a few friends connected with other congregations were present, as Revs. J.

Drummond, J. Harrop, Brooke Herford, and Mr. C. J. Herford. The addresses were brief, and expressed the value attached by all to these social gatherings. The treasurer, Mr. Aspland, spoke with some hopefulness of the financial condition of the society. Mr. Drummond, in deeply earnest words, pointed out that while the condition of the Christian world, both as to beliefs and forms of worship, seems on all sides utterly unsettled, so that it passes human foresight to tell how they will be fixed when the transition period shall be past, there is always support and purpose in the endeavour to realise the highest morality, and carry into action the purest principles. He saw, in the aspect of the present day, signs of both hope and fear for this vital question: whether we as a body are keeping truly up to, or falling away from that lofty ideal of morality which once was our pride.—After votes of thanks, heartily given, the meeting separated.

Nottingham.—A social meeting was held in connection with the Unitarian Chapel, on Monday, the 26th ult. Several hundreds partook of tea. In the evening a public meeting was held in the chapel; the Rev. E. W. Lloyd, Cwmbach, in the chair. A pleasant evening was passed in listening to a "selection" of music, and addresses delivered by the chairman and others. The Rev. Titus Lloyd, minister of the place, took an active part in the proceedings.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's-street.—Our annual Sunday-school services took place on Sunday, the 9th instant. Two excellent sermons were preached by the Rev. E. R. Grant. A gallery was specially erected for the children, in the chancel, and the church was beautifully decorated with flowers for the occasion, many of them brought by the scholars. The offertory for the school fund amounted to £5, which would have been larger but for the very unfavourable weather.

PRIZES IN SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

To the Editors, I have been much interested in the remarks of my friend Richard Bartram on this subject, and after an experience of nearly fifty years, I must bear my testimony against prizes. We have indeed tried them, but without the desired success; while the plan upon which we originally started our Sunday-school, has stood the test of experience, and if honestly and impartially carried out is, I think, calculated to produce a lasting moral effect on the scholars, without exposing them to the evils of competition. Each teacher is furnished with a class list, ruled for one quarter of a year, on which he or she notes the attendance, attention, and conduct of each scholar in the forenoon and afternoon of each Sunday by certain denoting marks, which are transferred to the register book of the whole school from week to week. The last Sundays in March, June, September, and December are devoted to a quarterly recapitulatory examination of each class by its own teachers, when the weekly marks are added to those gained at the examination, and the scholars are stationed and promoted accordingly. In addition to this, the teachers are required to give a summary character of each of their scholars, which is openly announced to them, and recorded in the register book. By this means the scholars are practically taught, that "a good character is the fruit of good conduct," and that this character will be of much greater value to them than any prize. Some of our scholars remain with us for many years, and in after-life are much interested in examining the characters which stand in the register books against their respective names for better or worse. At meetings of our teachers, many of whom were formerly scholars, the old register books are frequently called for, and pored over with unmistakable curiosity, and it may be hoped some profitable self-application. We find no other stimulus requisite, and I sometimes fear that even this is too much of a worldly motive, unless the teachers earnestly impress upon their scholars that their only true motive must be to learn of Jesus how best to serve and please his and our Father in heaven. We need especially to inculcate this devotional spirit on the hearts and minds of our children.—I am, dear sirs, yours very respectfully,

J. W. Dowson.

UNITARIAN WORSHIP AT BLACKPOOL AND SCARBOROUGH.

At the recent Annual Meeting of the Missionary Conference, an association of Unitarian ministers for missionary purposes, it was agreed that an effort should be made to establish religious services, under Unitarian auspices, at Blackpool and Scarborough, as early as possible in the present year.

Blackpool and Scarborough are much frequented by Unitarians during the summer months. For them, as for the tens of thousands of the cause of liberal Christianity, it is very desirable that a free Gospel should be preached in those towns.

The Committee of the Conference beg earnestly to appeal to their Unitarian brethren for aid in carrying out the above object. They need funds to enable them to take the initiatory steps.

BURNLEY UNITARIAN CHURCH.

For several years efforts have been made to raise a Congregation in Burnley. Since the cause was started, the Congregation has increased from about half-a-dozen to an average attendance of 40. The cause has suffered for want of a suitable hall. The present meeting-place has many inconveniences, and is a serious obstacle to success. As a better cannot be secured, it has been determined to erect a CHAPEL. The aid of friends is earnestly solicited for this object. The proposed Chapel is to accommodate from 300 to 400 at a cost of £1,000 to £1,100 including land.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The universal jubilee, so long talked of, is fixed to begin on Tuesday next. The Giornale di Roma publishes the letters apostolic appointing its celebration and enjoining its observance by the Catholic world.

Most persons who have spent any time in Rome will remember an old woman who sells salad at the corner of the Piazza Scosciavalla, and who always cheers vehemently when the Pope passes her stall. In distributing the superfluous gifts made to his Holiness on his recent jubilee, the old lady's devotion was remembered, and rewarded by the present of an enormous cake; and a cobbler, living by the Church of Santa Maria in Transpontina, for like good conduct received a superb pâté which had been sent by the pious Catholics of Strasburg for the delectation of the Santo Padre himself.

There is reason to believe that the day provisionally fixed for the opening of the General Council, namely December 8th, will be adhered to; and in the consistory next month the Pope will promulgate the final instructions for the bishops attending it.

The English Independent informs us that Dr. Ginsberg, who has for some time been engaged in examining the great Continental libraries with a view to the discovery of materials for a recension of the text of the Hebrew Bible, has found and copied several valuable Masoretic MSS., among which is one that he has good reason to believe belonged to Elias Levita, a famous Talmudist of the 9th century. Dr. Ginsberg intends to publish a complete Masora—that is, a kind of concordance of the Hebrew Scriptures, with critical notes upon almost every word and letter—perfected by the collation of every accessible MS., with a list of references to chapter and verse in English, so as to make this hitherto most obscure and difficult work available to all Hebrew scholars.

At the annual festival of the Oxford branch of the English Church Union, Mr. Liddon forcibly urged that the duty of Churchmen, individually and in corporate bodies such as the Church Union, is not in any way to hasten disestablishment, but quietly to prepare for it, so as not to be at a loss how to act when that which is clearly inevitable is actually brought about.

The autumnal meeting of the Congregational Union is to be held at Wolverhampton, and the Rev. J. C. Harrison is appointed chairman.

The Weekly Register gives a report, as current in London Catholic circles, that Mr. Ffoulkes has been formally received back into the Established Church, and that he is about to resume his functions as a clergyman of that communion. The Register does not vouch for the truth of the report, but at the same time says "there can be no doubt but that, after his recent letter to the Archbishop of Westminster, and the general anti-Catholic tone of everything this gentleman has written for some years past, his right place is where he came from—in the Anglican, not in the Catholic camp."

Speaking of the elections in France, the Paris correspondent of the Guardian says that "separation of Church and State," and "suppression of the Budget of Public Worship," is one of the few points on which the Liberal party of all shades seems to be agreed, with the exception, of course, of such men as M. de Montalembert or de Falloux.

The Irish Protestant Defence Association have determined to send a deputation to London "to wait upon such members of the House of Lords as they may think desirable, and urge upon them the necessity of rejecting the Irish Church Bill on the second reading." The deputation is to assemble in London on the 29th inst. It will consist of lay delegates and members of the branch associations throughout Ireland.

The Rock has been much tried and alarmed by two things. One is that the Bishop of London's Fund has been used for other churches than those that are "Low." The other is that "the pest of ritualism" is showing itself among the orthodox Dissenters. On Monday evenings the Psalms are chanted and the prayers are intoned at Surrey Chapel—the Rev. Newman Hall's.

The two sons of Bishop Colenso have arrived in England. One is to study at Oxford, the other at Cambridge.

The misunderstanding which led to the consecration of the Rev. H. L. Jenner, one of the very High Church party, as Bishop of Dunedin, New Zealand, has been followed by unpleasant consequences. He writes:

"The truth is I am nearly wearied out with this business. The isolation, the humiliation of my position, which culminated last Sunday in my having to sit under a lay reader, have well nigh broken me down. I feel inclined to let matters take their chance, give myself no further trouble, and ask my friends to leave me to my fate."

We learn from the correspondent of the Pall Mall that there are several English clergymen in Rome for the purpose of obtaining a recognition of their Anglican ordination, when they say they will be ready, with a number of their brethren, to unite themselves to the Church of Rome. The Pope, however, absolutely refuses their request, and has ordered some theologians to draw up a paper containing the reasons for this non possumus; at the same time, he urges the applicants either to be content with the position of Catholic laymen, or to receive ordination in the Roman Church. The clergymen, however, have expressed their determination to attend the Council.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In "Annals of the Propagation of the Faith," Father Joven, head of the Roman Catholic Mission in Madagascar, gives an account of the conversion of the late Queen, Rasoharina, which leads to the conclusion that one may be turned into a good Catholic, not only without one's consent, but even without knowing it. He says:

"In her extremity, M. Laborde approached the royal patient, who had recovered her full consciousness, and suggested to her some pious considerations, suitable to the great act that was about to be accomplished. She answered by raising her eyes and her arms to heaven. And then as if he were about to magnetise her, he called for a vessel of water, dipped his hands in it, and washed Rasoharina's forehead while pronouncing the sacramental words. None of those present had the least suspicion that this pious stratagem was made use of to regenerate a soul. Thus was baptised the sovereign of Madagascar, on Friday, the 27th March, 1868, at five o'clock in the morning, by virtue of the precious blood the feast of which is celebrated on that day. Three days later, on Monday, the 1st of April, at eleven o'clock at night, she went to heaven, as we confidently trust, to exchange her title as queen for that of patroness of the great African island, a patroness all the more zealous for the conversion of her people, as no one knew better than she did the extent of their miseries and the depth of the darkness in which they are plunged. Glory be to God for all this! and may the noble-hearted man who so faithfully carried out the designs of divine mercy be held in grateful remembrance."

Two or three weeks back we mentioned Senor Castelar's eloquent reply to Canon Monterola in the Spanish Cortes, which even Catholic papers printed and praised. In the concluding stage of the debate on the Constitution, he made another speech, likewise in behalf of religious freedom, not less eloquent than his former one. Castelar is not a Protestant, and even speaks of Protestantism as a faith whose iciness would dry up his soul and conscience; but he is not more tender to Catholicism, which he accuses of having "ruined and impoverished Spain in the name of a religion of peace and goodwill." His chief argument is derived from the nature of religion itself. He says:

"Religion cannot work on our will, if it does not first work on our understanding. What does religion do? It blesses the cradle, guides the first dawn of the intellect to the truth and the first steps of the life to the good; purifies the heart, so that our first loves shall not be as the corrosive poison, but as a liquor full of the sweetest scents; tightens the bonds of the family, not only by the voice of conscience and the sentiment of affection, but by the community of beliefs; places the note of the infinite in art, and the light of the absolute in science; converts the love of country into a worship, and the life of the citizen into a priesthood, and, when the exigencies of society require it, into a martyrdom; and when we approach our last hour, and draw near to the abyss of eternity, sustains and consoles us, promising that our good deeds shall not perish, but remain throughout all time, bound up in the human spirit, and promising us also that the essence of our life shall not evaporate, but shall ascend from region to region until it loses itself in the bosom of its God. But it cannot answer any of these ends if it is not voluntarily accepted; for we cannot teach the lips as truth that which the intellect revolts at and the heart rejects. A religion accepted and not believed degrades rather than elevates, and makes the country which enforces it on its subjects, not the hearth, but the dungeon of the soul."

In a sermon for the Doncaster Infirmary, the Vicar, Dr. Vaughan, spoke thus sensibly on the present transitional state of the Church:

"We are passing more and more—for better or worse—out of a parochial into a congregational life. We are becoming less of a State Church and more of a Free Church—if expressions once used as party watchwords may be employed, for explanation's sake, in a simple and unpolemical manner, in the sanctuary of God's house. It is not for me either to rejoice or lament, out of my own mind, over a transition as momentous as it is inevitable, and I take things as they are, and I would urge you to turn to good account the circumstances in which God's Providence has placed us. Now the lesson which I learn from this change is simple and practical. It is that the Church of each place—that the congregation worshipping in each church—must bestir itself to a livelier and more earnest interest in the management of its own concerns. I have no faith in the multiplication of Church machinery on a large scale—whether it take the form of convocations, conferences, or congresses. These things seem to me to have a tendency to distract the minds of the Church's pastors from their real work and from their alone available influence. What I desire is that the pastor of each church, acting with his own church-officers and church-worshippers, should endeavour soberly and earnestly to arouse, in his own little sphere of action, the zeal and interest of his people in the particular work of the Church, its services, its charities, and its missions, so far as that work depends—and it does mainly, soon perhaps it will entirely, depend—upon voluntary effort. The Church of England is becoming less and less national—less and less territorial—in that sense (I trust in no other) less and less national—more and more independent—more and more congregational. If there is something in this to be deplored, there is at least something to be rejoiced in. The heart of the people must be appealed to for the maintenance of the people's worship."

In the opinion of the Church News no churchmanship is worthy of the name which does not result in confession and fasting communion.

Referring to what Mr. Charles Buxton said at the Church Reform Association, that what the Established Church wants is a real Parliament of its own, the English Independent says, it ought to be clear to him that as long as the Church is subject to a Parliament outside it cannot be allowed a Parliament inside.

At a meeting of the London City Mission, the Rev. B. Cassin, vicar of St. George, Battersea, gave the following illustration of the ignorance prevailing among the men engaged in the gas-works in his parish:

"On one occasion the missionary said to one of them, 'Now, my good friend, suppose that the great wheels of life were to stand still, and we were to be hurried in a moment into eternity, what would become of you?' 'Well, sir,' he replied, 'I don't hold with my wife.' 'I do not exactly see what that has to do with the question,' said the missionary, 'what do you mean?' 'Why, sir, my wife has given up the right old religion, and I like the old one and not the one she believes in.' 'What does she like?' asked the missionary. 'Oh, she goes over there where the parson wears red stripes down his back, and I like the right old religion.' 'What is the right old religion?' 'Well, sir, I never misses a Sunday without reading my Sunday newspaper.' 'Is that your right old religion?' the missionary inquired. 'Well, no, sir, not exactly,' was the answer. 'Do you not say your prayers?' 'Oh, yes, sir, I always say them every night, except when I'm too drunk.' 'What do you say?' 'Well, I always says the Lord's Prayer, and I always says the Belief, and I never misses to say, 'Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, bless the bed that I lie on.' It was almost incredible that in this age of advancement such ignorance could be in the metropolis of England."

The Standard admits that the cathedral system is the weak point of the Church of England, but thinks the best mode of meeting it would be not to cut down the working power of the cathedral, but to develop it and make it really effective. Cathedrals should be the centre of the Church's life and activity in each diocese. Their services should be models to all surrounding churches, both as to their frequency, their heartiness, and their decent and seemly ordering. It might be a question whether the cathedral should be "parochialised," but if such a system as Mr. Hope's be adopted, all the clerical staff should be resident and available either for parochial work or for preaching wherever their aid might be required. The cathedral, in fact, would be the reserve force of the diocese, with its clerical staff qualified for every department of work. The value of a body of carefully-trained preachers to lighten the labours of over-worked incumbents would speedily be apparent, and in cases of emergency the reserve might supply clergymen to take the sole charge of a parish.

In a pastoral to his diocese, Archbishop Manning takes a hopeful view of the prospects of his Church here. He says, "the breathing of the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of Life, has sensibly gone forth over England. We feel it like the coming of spring. God has His purposes for us; and there are some even now in the midst of us who will perhaps see what a few years ago the most hopeful hardly dreamed." He also states that "through the zeal of our clergy and the generosity of our flock no fewer than eleven churches will soon have been added to the diocese since Trinity Sunday last year." The Archbishop would have to make a formidable set-off against this, if he looked to Italy, Austria, France, and Spain, where Rome, instead of gaining adherents, is confessedly losing them by thousands.

The Globe says:

"It is reported, on what appears to be good authority, that the leading wire-pullers amongst Ultramontane Roman Catholics have determined on putting forward Archbishop Manning to advocate the new dogma of the Pope's personal infallibility at an early session of the forthcoming Latin Council. This proposition will be as stoutly resisted by the French prelates, headed by the Archbishop of Paris and Monsignor Dupanloup, as by several of the English Roman Catholic bishops."

In a speech at the meeting of the Irish Evangelical Society, the Rev. F. Tucker thus referred to the treatment of Hibernia by the Motherland:

"O'Connell spoke of his native land as a break-water placed between England and the Atlantic, to bear the first rush of the great waters flowing towards England. Some orator has described Ireland as a stepping-stone let down into the ocean, from which a man may take a great spring and land upon the great continent which lies beyond. I venture upon a somewhat less ambitious simile, which will be appreciated by every father and mother. I see England and Ireland side by side on the map, and Ireland looks like a crib by the side of the parent bed, and that some of us understand to be the chief ornament of the room. But then the child in the cradle is restless, and, as in all such cases, the mother's rest is very much disturbed. What shall we do? Shall we send the crib into another room? Shall we unmoor the island, and drift it away two thousand miles before the setting sun? There is no mother's heart will hear of such a proposition. We must inquire the cause of the child's restlessness, and apply the remedy. If, in seeking, we discover that some stupid nurse has left a great pin sticking in the child's breast—a regular thorn in the flesh—a constant source of irritation—and if we discover besides that the little bed is very badly made, full of lumps and all kinds of inequalities, why then you know what any true mother would do—she will first kiss the child, take out the pin, and then smooth the bed. And that I understand to be what our legislators are doing at this time, and with all my heart I wish them all prosperity."

The Echo imagines a French curé, doubtful as to the rights of Rome and inclined to Protestantism, chancing to stroll a few days since into the Auction Mart. He would have heard a very respectable auctioneer encouraging biddings for the advowson and next presentation to the Rectory and Vicarage of Westborough with that of Dry Doddington, in the diocese of Lincoln, the great inducement being that the present rector was seventy-three years of age, and that therefore the fat living would be sure soon to fall to the purchaser; this old clergyman, whose life became the text of the auctioneer's discourse, having been chosen by the patrons on account of his age and infirmities, in order to increase the selling value of the advowson in the market. It would be quite impossible to render the arguments by which such a system is supported intelligible to the bewildered curé, who would fancy it was a religion of devils, which was thus connected with the Auction Mart. How could you make him understand that, "Here you are, gentlemen; going—going, a fine fat living, with an infirm old parson put in on purpose to raise the value!" was part of a beneficial system?

The Pall Mall thus refers to the same subject:—"There was, the auctioneer stated, good society; he thought he might add good hunting, and, allowing £100 a year to a curate to do the dirty, disagreeable work, such as attending to the sick and dying, there would remain a net profit of about £300 a year for the rector. The outside sum offered for the privilege of attending to the eternal salvation of the inhabitants of the two parishes in question was £4,500. This did not reach the reserve price, and accordingly the living was withdrawn, doubtless to the great disappointment of young divines with 'a call,' but no ready money. The congregations of the two churches must be rather puzzled and much edified by seeing the care of their souls thus brought to the hammer and with such an unsatisfactory result."

It is said that when they were removing the body of O'Connell the other day, and the priests were saying masses to shorten his time in purgatory, one of the crowd cried out, "An' is that all ye can do for the soul of the great Liberather? Shure, then, I might as well be a Protestant and go to heaven at once!" It certainly does seem a little negligent on the part of Dr. Cullen and his priests, if they have the power which they claim, not to have delivered from purgatorial pains the man whom they profess so much to honour before this.

We mentioned last week that it was proposed to send out an Anglican bishop to Madagascar. The Advertiser strongly denounces the scheme. No theory of episcopacy begins with the bishop. A bishop, according to the etymology, is an overseer—one who overlooks, governs, and regulates a Church which is already in existence. But in Madagascar there is no Anglican Church to oversee. As to overseership, or government, it is like providing an accomplished cook, when the question is, "Will there be potatoes enough to keep us alive till the next spring comes round?" The scheme is so absurd that the Advertiser can hardly find patience to discuss it. What authority have people in the West of London to send a bishop or overseer to govern the churches of Madagascar? Episcopacy may be a very good thing when a Church exists which wants government, and feels that want. But to offer a bishop to Antananarivo, which knows no such want; or to the Western coast, where no Christian Church has yet been formed, is, taken altogether, one of the strangest and most senseless ideas that has been mooted, even in this, our very excitable and illogical state of society.

Dr. Cumming, who has been lecturing in Manchester, under the auspices of the Protestant Reformation Society, on "the Signs of the Last Times," made a revelation to his hearers on Wednesday, which must have astonished them, and may well lessen the satisfaction which Roman Catholics have felt in the Marquis of Bute's conversion. It appears that the sum which his lordship gave to the Pope as Peter's pence, when turned into English money, was just 1,260 sovereigns; and as the prophetic doctor says, it is "marvellous to find that precise number had been selected, because it represents, in the opinion of students of prophecy, the duration of the Papacy on earth." Marvellous indeed. After this, none but the veriest of sceptics can doubt that the end of Romanism draweth nigh.

REVIEW:

Can it be true? an Inquiry as to the Endlessness of Future Punishment. By William Miall. Second Edition. London: Stock.

The Doctrine of Eternal Punishment shown to be Irrational, Unscriptural, Untrue. By T. R. M. London: James Burns.

Thoughts on Eternal Punishment. By Joseph Terry. London: F. Pitman.

FRIENDS who have opportunities of becoming acquainted with the state of sentiment in so-called orthodox bodies assure us that the old hard, cruel doctrine of eternal punishment is ceasing to be held by many who professedly belong to them; and proofs multiply upon us to the same effect. A short time since, a correspondent of the Christian World was anxious to have the doctrine discussed in its columns, but was courteously informed that this was scarcely expedient; and a writer in the English Independent started the question, which he said he had sufficient grounds for asking, whether a denial of the doctrine would be sufficient to exclude from membership in Congregational churches, to which no very clear and satisfactory answer was given. In the posthumous volume of Poems by Miss Sarah Williams, some of which have been so greatly admired, and which show such a devout as well as beautiful mind, among her "Questionings" is this:

"Is it so, O Christ in heaven, that the souls we loved so well Must remain in pain eternal, must abide in endless hell?"

And our love avail them nothing—even Thine avail no more?

there nothing that can reach [them—nothing Isbridge the chasm o'er?"

And now it is reported, on apparently good authority, that the Council of the Evangelical Alliance is agitated, and the very existence of the Alliance endangered, by a controversy upon the doctrine of "universal restoration," which has arisen from the Rev. T. R. Birks, an important member of the Alliance, having, in one of his latest works, expressed his belief that the language of Scripture warrants a hope that the whole human race may be eventually restored, and having in consequence incurred the resentment of his colleagues.

The publications the titles of which are given above, and several others that we have received, likewise show that the subject to which they refer is, as Mr. Miall says, "happily engaging the attention of many persons." We gave a favourable notice of his essay on its first appearance, and are glad that a second edition has so soon been called for, and that he is able to give so much matter (80 pages), in so neat a form, at so low a price (sixpence). If any of our readers have orthodox friends that are doubting whether a merciful God can inflict unending torment on any of his creatures, they cannot do better than place in their hands this thoughtful and well-written pamphlet.

T. R. M. does not enter so fully into the subject as Mr. Miall, but in the space of 14 pages, which may be had for twopence, he adduces reasons quite sufficient to convince any one who will attentively consider them that "God is so full of love and mercy that He never punishes except for our good; and as never-ending punishment would not be for our good, it cannot be designed for the lot of any."

Mr. Terry, taking for his motto a thought from Mr. Miall, that "there is nothing which God does or suffers to be done, but is either good in itself, or is intended to develop into good," reasons out his "Thoughts" on the subject in easy, pleasant verse; and after several touching pictures of human love which serve to manifest the divine, the conclusion to which he brings us is:

"As in God's works, so also in the teaching of His Word,
The all-absorbing law of boundless love predominates:
And sooner shall His grand creation cease its wondrous work,
And the infinitude of worlds which roll at His command
Thro' the immeasurable realms of ever-widening space,
Cease to maintain their onward course, and dwindle back to chaos,
Than our great Father's love—the very essence of all life,
And joy, and beauty, and the centre of all future hope—Shall cease to operate on all, and operate for good."

A SWISS FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

SOME three months since there was formed a Liberal Christian Union at Neuchâtel, mainly through the exertions of M. Buisson (Professor of Philosophy in the Academy of that town), and of which several distinguished men, among them M. Athanase Coquerel, M. Réville, and M. Quinet, have signified their approval. Though we may not be able to go all lengths with the movement, we thoroughly sympathise with the spirit in which it has originated, and shall watch its proceedings with interest, and from time to time make them known to our readers.

In the manifesto issued by the promoters of the Union, they state that what they seek is the establishment of a Church without Priests, Religion without Catechisms, Worship without Mysteries, Morality without Theology, God without systems of Dogmatic Belief. Instead of proclaiming revelation through dogmas and miracles, they hold that the true Church of the times will turn to nature and humanity for records of God, whose ever-open volumes they are. It will oppose science to dogma, conscience to tradition, and carry out the principles of the Reformation to their legitimate issues. This religion of the future will cherish and develop all that Christianity has itself drawn from the depths of the human mind, and will disengage this moral element, so as to perpetuate it, from the factitious additions that have been made to it.

The organ of the Union is a small periodical, called L'Emancipation, which appears every Sunday.

The object of this is to unite all those isolated free-thinkers, now scattered through Switzerland, with one another, and likewise with others beyond its borders, so as to form an active organisation, striving to lead them to the pursuit of goodness, the search after truth, and the love of humanity, and at the same time to free them from all restraints on reason and conscience. Its special aim will be to accustom its readers to the discussion of religious questions in a scientific spirit, and to show that all religions are but the natural products of the human mind. Active discussion with the orthodox will also be sought, even with semi-liberal Catholics, while so-called "free-thinkers" will be made to see that the promoters of the Union have a liberty as complete as theirs. They will hold their views as capable of further growth, and not as final truth; and will avoid founding new dogmatic systems on the ruins of the old.

In the second number, it is stated that the Union does not wish to combat any particular doctrines, but the spirit of bigotry and intolerance. Nor does it desire to take up an attitude of mere negative antagonism to established Churches; it seeks rather to wrest from them their present monopoly of religious influence and instruction, by preparing the way for the great humanitarian institution which shall eventually carry on all the work of the Churches as far as it is good or useful, but which shall break entirely with mere traditional systems.

For the present we must conclude our notice of the Union with M. Quinet's interesting letter to M. Buisson:

"Fifteen years ago, struck with the dangers that reason and liberty were running from Catholicism, I exhorted Catholic nations to quit the Roman Church. Every path seemed good for that: either philosophy, or Christianity emancipated at every point. I said to these nations, still lagging in the Middle Ages, 'Every gate is open that leads to liberty—some quickly, some slowly. Choose, but come forth!' Such was my view, fifteen years ago. You, sir, have the advantage over me. You discuss with men who, as Protestants, hold certain things in common with you. Both you and they stand on modern ground. There is liberty amongst you. That unites you in the hour when furthest apart. Upon this common ground discussion can lead to something. It will not guide you into the desert. Farel and his companions in exile were your ancestors.

"There is, sir, one passage in your work which has specially touched me; it ought to touch all candid minds. It is that in which you show so well how the success of a negative controversy will not satisfy you. You aspire to plant something positive in minds and hearts. Yes! this is the fruitful field. Keep to this. Strike this rock; we have all need of living water. May the sincerity of your efforts be understood, even by your adversaries! May such strength of conviction and such courage give fresh vigour to moral life, wherever found! May your example serve to help our unhappy country above all! Alas! in the condition to which she is reduced, often what is as darkness to others would be a light to her. Forgive, sir, my last words being of her.—Your faithful and affectionate

A SENSIBLE BISHOP.

THE Repository (London, 1788; I. 338) contains the following letter from the Bishop of Clonfert to the Rev. Mr. Moore, of Boughton-Blean, near Canterbury:

"A poor man's creed need not be long; but it should be struck in early, and a true and right one. If he believes, as the common proverb says, that he is to die like a dog, he will undoubtedly live like one. The communication of education is certainly a very great blessing to the poor; and had Mandeville, and they who to serve political purposes are for denying all political instruction to the lower classes, only pushed their argument far enough, they might have proved that they had a right to maim or put out the eyes of the common people, in order to make them more manageable and more in the power of their superiors.

"What I have endeavoured to do in my diocese ever since my appointment is this:—There are twenty Catholics to one Protestant in it. To attempt their conversion, or to think of making them read Protestant books, would be in vain. I have therefore circulated amongst them some of the best of their own authors, particularly one Gother, whose writings contain much pure Christianity, useful knowledge, and benevolent sentiments. He wrote eighteen volumes of religious extracts, and died about the year 1686. Unable to make the peasants about me good Protestants, I wish to make them good Catholics, good citizens, and good anything. I have established, too, a Sunday school, open to both Protestants and Catholics, at my residence in the country; have recommended the scheme to my clergy, and hope to have several on foot in the summer."

THE LONDON MEETINGS.

OUR readers will rejoice with us at the thorough success which attended the anniversary meetings held last week in London. On no previous occasion for many years has the attendance been so large, and so considerable a proportion of the speeches really interesting, and very seldom has their spirit been so hearty and unanimous. In another part of our impression will be found a detailed account of the various meetings, with very full reports of the most interesting and important of the addresses, which we commend to the attention of our readers, assuring them that even those who usually skip long speeches on principle will find them at once soul-stirring and interesting.

Foremost among the various meetings come those of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, with Mr. MARTINEAU for preacher and Mr. COQUEREL among the guests. These were sure to attract a large assemblage, but the most interesting feature to those who remember the stormy discussions of recent years, is the spirit of unity by which these meetings were characterised. The Association deserves to succeed. We believe that there is no one of our societies that is better officered, and we know that the members of the committee devote themselves with a diligence and fidelity equalled in very few of our societies to making the work and the influence of the Association a real power for good. We especially rejoice to find that the Rev. R. BROOK ASPLAND has consented to remain as secretary at the post which he has so long and ably filled. Few of our readers know how feeble was the Association at the time when Mr. ASPLAND took the secretaryship. He found an empty exchequer, and liabilities to the extent of hundreds of pounds, and an organisation which attracted little interest or support from our churches. It is now, comparatively speaking, well supported with funds, though in no sense adequately to the resources of our body or to the requirements of its ever-extending work. But better than all, its executive has gradually acquired the confidence of many who formerly stood aloof from it. The discussions of late years have disentangled its proper working from the elements of congregational representation which many feared and opposed. The storms have but cleared the atmosphere, and not evil, but good, is the result. Especially do we rejoice in the thorough recognition by speaker after speaker of the utility, nay necessity, of such united action for the distinct proclamation and upholding of Unitarianism as constitutes the object of this Association. If any of our readers are of that class who talk as if there were no longer any need for us to continue in the isolation of our Unitarian position, let them read the manly avowal of Mr. LAMPORT, that our laity can never enter the pews of the Church of England without meanness until our ministers can with equal freedom enter its pulpits. Or let them read that pithy sentence of the Rev. CHARLES BEARD'S, that just because there never was a time when Unitarianism in disguise more abounded, so there never was a time when it was more necessary that Unitarianism should manifest itself without disguise. We heartily go with all that Mr. MARTINEAU said about the necessity of keeping the constitution of our congregations thoroughly free, but we regard it as the very noblest result of that freedom that we are thus enabled, without binding the doctrine of the future, to declare the honest convictions of the present, and to be thoroughly faithful to the light of to-day without excluding whatever clearer light may dawn on future generations.

The London District Unitarian Association is so purely local that we do not feel called upon to comment at any length upon its proceedings, and indeed the success of our missionary work in other parts of the country is not sufficient to justify any sharp criticisms upon its methods or its failures. Our churches everywhere are, after all, only spelling their way into the great problem of how to touch with the healing power of religious truth the great masses of the people. No where as yet, either in our Domestic Missions or in our District and more distinctively propagandist Missions, have we accomplished any work at all worthy either of our churches or of the opportunity which lies everywhere around them. We believe, indeed, that not in London only, but in all such district efforts to raise up new congregations, there needs something less of mere propagandist zeal, and a great deal more of simple, and in the true sense evangelical piety and fervour. If these little centres of which the Lay Preachers' Union gives such rose-coloured accounts are really, as some of the speakers averred, struggling and almost hopeless causes, with little true religious vitality about them, they are no worse than many in other places. Even the "goodly number of congregations" which Mr. STREET spoke of having founded in connection with the Manchester District Association, resolves itself, on careful investigation, into two, which are hardly more hopeful or prosperous than those about which our London friends are uncomfortably self-conscious. There is, therefore, no need for special discouragement, but there is great need in all our District Associations as well as in that in London, that we fearlessly face the facts of what we are doing or failing to do, and consider whether we are not expecting too much, in thinking that the mere reiterated presentation of truer doctrines will ever gather in or build up living churches. We doubt much whether any appreciable result comes of all this lecturing and discussion into which the Lay Preachers' Union seems to have drifted, and as we read the various meetings which they have held for this purpose we cannot help recalling the advice of an old Methodist to his son, "Tom, if thou'd argue less and pray more, it would be better for thee."

NANTWICH.—On Whit-Monday the congregation, the Sunday scholars, and others held a tea party, which was much enjoyed by all present. After recitations and vocal music, the Rev. J. Macdonald and Messrs. J. Briggs and J. Teasdale, of Crewe, addressed the meeting. The school has only been re-established a few weeks, and the success has much exceeded the expectations of its promoters.

MAXIMS OF S. JOHN OF THE CROSS.

NEVER be scandalised or surprised at what you see and hear, and labour to preserve yourself in complete oblivion of all. If you lived among the angels, and gave heed to what was going on, many things would seem to you not to be good, because you did not understand them. You are to keep your soul in purity before God, and not to suffer the thought of this or that to disturb you.

Jesus Christ is but little known of those who consider themselves his friends; for we see them seeking in him their own comfort, and not his bitter sorrows.

Herein a man may know whether he really loves God: Is he satisfied with anything less than God?

God's intention is, to make us God by participation, He being God by nature: as fire changes everything into fire.

Keep your heart in peace; let nothing in this world disturb it: all things have an end.

Pure spirituality, alone and apart from all created forms, communicates in sweet tranquillity with God; for the knowledge of Him lies in the divine silence.

The Father uttered one Word; that Word is His son, and He utters him for ever in everlasting silence; and the soul to hear It must be silent.

Look upon it as a special mercy of God that people ever speak kindly to you: you do not deserve it.

Be silent about what God may say to you, remembering the words of Scripture (Is. xxiv. 16), "My secret to me."

THE SMITHFIELD OF MADRID.

THE other day some workmen in Madrid had orders to level the ground on a spot formerly called the Quemadero de la Cruz, or "Burning place of the Cross;" that had been the site on which the "Holy Inquisition" celebrated its autos da fe, or acts of faith. The workmen, in digging, came upon layers of charred wood, and rusted links of iron, which had evidently undergone the action of fire; and these were mingled with organic remains—bones, hair, and other animal substances. The relics lay in strata of deposits, like a geological formation—each the record of a batch of agonised victims of the "Holy Office." Mixed, we are told, with the cinders of the stakes to which the poor heretics had been bound were rib bones and thigh bones licked by the flames; skulls scorched and split in the winding-sheet of fire; fragments of calcined skin and ligament; pieces of woollen clothing, the tatters of that yellow San Benito which the condemned were made to wear; braids of plaited hair, not quite destroyed—a testimony that women as well as men had suffered in that ghastly place, "for the greater glory of God." Then there came a layer of sand and soil, covering the next stratum of the same hideous signs; and so from deposit to deposit.

Such a description would read like a mere exaggeration intended to produce a startling effect, if we did not recal some of the accounts given us by trustworthy authorities of the frightful cruelties once enacted in Spain, in the name of religion. For instance, Mariana, the Spanish historian, tells us, that in one year, 1481, two hundred and ninety-eight "heretics" were burned alive in Seville alone, and two thousand in other parts of Andalusia. Llorente, who had access to the archives of the "Holy Office," enables us to judge still better why that piece of opened soil at the Quemadero is so black. He writes that the total number of people burned alive by the Spanish Inquisition, according to its own memorials, was thirty-two thousand; and that number does not include the martyrs who suffered either in the Spanish Colonies or in the islands of Sicily and Sardinia. During the eighteen years of Torquemada's Inquisitorship alone, no fewer than 8,800 poor creatures were given to the flames.

The mementoes of these dreadful times were brought to light at a fortunate moment, and in the debates in the Cortes were used with powerful effect by a young orator, Senor Echegaray, on behalf of religious liberty. "Go," he said, "to the Calle Ancha de Sao Barnardo, turn to the right, and there, near the statue of Daoiz and Velarde, you will see the Quemadero of the Cross. I could have wished that these discussions should have taken place over that horrible spot, so that those who defend religious unity might see it. The Quemadero of the Cross is a grand geological cutting. Nature is a grand book, and it opens its pages to us in the geological strata. The Quemadero is a grand book, and it opens its pages to us in the strata of calcined human bones, earth, coal, then earth, bones, coal again, and so on. Not many days since I saw a boy turning over that rubbish with a stick, and he drew from it three grand discourses in defence of religious liberty, three objects of great eloquence—they were a piece of oxydised iron, a human rib almost all calcined, and a plait of hair, burnt at one of its extremities." Thus the martyrs' rise, as it were, from their ashes, to lift up their solemn testimony against the system which gave such merciless power to priests, and help on the cause of Christian freedom.

THE GENERAL BAPTIST MEETINGS.

THESE gatherings, which begin our Whitsuntide anniversaries, commenced on Monday at Worship-street Chapel by a committee meeting, open to all the members of the assembly.

In the evening, the meeting of the JUVENILE FUND was held. It was attended by about the usual number of persons, and was characterised by its usual cheerful and social character, being a pleasant reunion of the friends and members of the General Baptist Connexion who reach town in time for it. Mr. ALFRED J. MARCHANT was in the chair. The only publication of the Fund this year has been a small card of supplementary hymns. Some grants of money were made to Trowbridge, Portsmouth, and Nottage congregations, chiefly for repairs or improvements; and to Dover and Worship-street Sunday-schools, and grants of tracts to Dover and Nottage. A portion of the fund was reserved for printing any suitable tracts that might be offered to the committee, of whom the junior members were reappointed, with the addition of Mr. D. Batchelor. Mr. T. Dyer was reappointed secretary. The meeting was opened with singing, and closed with singing and prayer.

The GENERAL ASSEMBLY was held the next day, Whit-Tuesday, also at Worship-street. A prayer-meeting was held in the Vestry before breakfast, but the business of the Assembly did not begin till half-past nine, when the Rev. EDWARD R. GRANT, of Portsmouth, was called to the chair, and the Rev. J. F. Kennard, of Billingshurst, and Mr. Albert Badcock, of Cranbrook, were appointed Moderators. The members of the Assembly present during some part or other of the proceedings (besides those already named) were the Revs. Lindsey T. Badcock, of Saffron Walden; J. A. Briggs, of Headcorn; T. B. W. Briggs, of Dover; John B. Lloyd, of Wareham; Titus Lloyd, of Nottage; Samuel Martin, of Trowbridge; Joseph C. Means, of Worship-street; Thos. Rix, of Stratford; and Dr. Sadler, of Hampstead; Messrs. John Bainton, D. Batchelor, F. Dyer, T. N. Dyer, H. Green, Alfred Marchant, Alfred J. Marchant, &c. To these may be added, the Revs. John Lawton, of Berkhamstead, and John G. Pike, of the Commercial-road, ministers of the New Connexion (orthodox) of General Baptists, who, by an ancient rule of the Assembly, revived on this occasion, were admitted to take part in the business.

The public service commenced soon after eleven o'clock. The Rev. ROBERT SPEARS, of London, read the Scriptures, the Rev. L. T. BADCOCK gave out the hymns, the Rev. JOHN LAWTON offered the general prayer, and the Rev. J. B. LLOYD preached from John iv. 54, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe," and concluded the service with prayer. Mr. Lloyd's object was to show that the chief evidence of the divine origin and authority of the Gospel was not the miraculous events, which were known to us only in the records of the past (modern miracles being received only by the most ignorant and fanatical), but the visible Christian Church, which had resulted from it, and the earnest piety and moral excellence which, in all ages, it had undeniably produced. Mr. Lloyd's sermon was listened to with great interest; and was acknowledged in the subsequent meeting of the Assembly by a vote of thanks, moved by the Rev. J. G. PIKE, who expressed the great pleasure with which he had listened to it.

After dinner (which was attended by a larger number of friends than in recent years) the business of the Assembly was resumed, and accounts of the several funds, and the reports of the committee and of the messengers were read. The committee's report noticed with satisfaction in the work of the past year the publication of the General Baptist Messenger, the revived efficiency of the Education Fund (upon which Mr. D. Batchelor, of Portsmouth, had been admitted as a student), the cordial reception given by the Annual Association of the General Baptists of the New Connexion to the deputation appointed by the last Assembly, and the gratifying progress of political events as showing how rapidly public opinion had ripened on the great principles of religious freedom and equality. Both the committee and the messengers urged the desirableness of cherishing closer relations with the New Connexion; and by subsequent resolutions of the Assembly deputations were appointed to two meetings of that body;—viz., the meeting of the London District Conference at Berkhamstead, and the Annual Association at Sheffield. A petition to the House of Lords, in support of the bill for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Irish Church, was also agreed to.

A public tea meeting was held in the evening, the Rev. SAMUEL MARTIN in the chair. The following sentiments were responded to by different speakers, a hymn being sung after each:—"The Christian Church: a tree of many branches but of one root," by the Rev. J. B. Lloyd. "Our Baptist Fathers: may we imitate their faithfulness and zeal," by the Rev. T. B. W. Briggs. "The Saviour ever Present with His People: their guide, their stay, and their trust," by the Rev. F. R. Young, of Swindon. "The Young: the hope of this generation, on the strength of the next," by the Rev. Lindsey T. Badcock. After which the meeting was closed with prayer.

The spirit of the meeting was admirable throughout, the presence and liberal sentiments of the brethren of the New Connexion giving great interest to it. The following ministers, not members of the Assembly, were present at the service or at the evening meeting:—Revs. F. Bishop, of Chesterfield; J. Cooper, of London; L. Huges, of Carrickfergus; E. Kell, of Southampton; A. Lunn, of Chatham; G. Ride, of Chorley; R. Shelley, of Yarmouth; Joseph Smith, of Ipswich; W. Sutherland, of Malton; and John Taylor, of London.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE forty-fourth annual meeting of this Association was held on Wednesday, May 19th, at Umin Church, Islington.

THE SERVICE.

The day was extremely unfavourable, but nevertheless at twelve o'clock the beautiful church was crowded to the doors, with a congregation comprising a large number of ministers and members of the Association from all parts of the country. The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, B.A., of Geo Cross, lead the worship, and the Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU preached from the text (Isaiah lxiii. 16), "Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not; thou, O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer; thy name is from everlasting." He applied this to our own partially isolated position, showing how in the progress of our race religious ideas inevitably changed, so that in spite of our strong reverence for the past, our faith might so much differ from that of patriarchal times, that Abraham might be ignorant of us and Israel acknowledge us not. Chiefly, however, he dwelt on the relation of the human to the divine. While paying a high tribute to Priestley, he pointed out the defects of his system and that of his followers,—theirs, he said, was the worship of causation, they referred everything, good and evil, to the cause of all, insisting so strongly on the doctrine of necessity, that man, according to their views, could hardly be held responsible for his own sins. Channing wrought a great revolution, restoring to man his responsibility, and introducing the worship or religion of conscience. We were advancing a step higher yet towards the worship of the spirit. Combine the three, and we have all those wants provided for which the Trinitarian system professes to satisfy.

Unity Church, which contains a good deal of stained glass, is not one of the lightest, and, in consequence of the weather, had to be partially lighted with gas. During the sermon the gloom kept increasing, until a tremendous crash of thunder startled the congregation, and for twenty minutes or so a storm raged so violently as occasionally to drown the preacher's voice. It will therefore be a special satisfaction to have the sermon, of the power and beauty of which no brief report could give any adequate idea, printed, as it will speedily be.

After an interval of half an hour for refreshments, the Business Meeting was held in the church, and was attended by an unusually large number of members and spectators. Among whom present either at the Business Meeting or the Collation on the following day, were—

Revs. R. B. Aspland and R. Spears, secretaries; W. C. Venning, Esq., treasurer; and the following vice-presidents:—The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, M.P.; Sir John Bowring, F.R.S.; James Heywood, Esq., M.A., F.R.S.; J. Courtauld, Esq., Gosfield-hall, Essex; Herbert New, Esq., Evesham; G. Buckton, Esq., Leeds; Michael Andrews, Esq., Belfast; Joseph Lupton, Esq., Leeds; H. Bicknell, Esq., London; J. Munn, Mayor of Tenterden; also M. le Pasteur Athanas Coquerel, of Paris; the Rev. C. H. Dall, of Calcutta; the Revs. James Martineau, T. Madge, Dr. Sadler, H. Ierson, T. L. Marshall, J. C. Means, J. Taylor, J. Heywood, C. Corkran, James Cooper, P. W. Claydon, T. Hunter, M. C. Gascoigne, T. Rix, J. Phillips, J. E. Applebee, H. Solly, J. Hunt, W. H. Channing, M. C. Conway, J. Marten, of London; G. Barmby, Wakefield; J. Bayley, Cranbrook; C. Beard, Liverpool; J. Bevan, Fudey; F. Bishop, Chesterfield; James Black, Stockport; A. N. Blatford, Bristol; J. W. Braithwaite, Horsham; J. A. Briggs, Headcorn; T. B. W. Briggs, Dover; T. W. Chignell, Exeter; T. Cooper, Framlingham; H. E. Dowson, Geo Cross; R. B. Drummond, Edinburgh; A. Gordon, Liverpool; E. R. Grant, Portsmouth; W. Hargrave, Newport, Isle of Wight; L. Huges, Carrickfergus; R. C. Jones, Derby; E. Kell, Southampton; J. F. Kennard, Billingshurst; E. T. Lloyd, Nottage; J. B. Lloyd, Wareham; A. Lunn, Chatham; R. B. Macellan, Maidstone; D. Maginnis, Stourbridge; A. Macdonald, Lincoln; A. Macdougall, High Garratt; S. Martin, Trowbridge; C. C. Nutter, Banbury; J. E. Odgers, Bridgewater; R. Pilcher, Bradford; G. Ride, Chorley; R. Shaen, Royston; R. Shelley, Yarmouth; J. Shannon, Liverpool; J. L. Short, Sheffield; J. Smith, Ipswich; W. J. Smyth, late of Godalming; J. D. H. Smyth, Norwich; J. C. Street, Newcastle-under-Lyme; H. Williamson, Dundee; A. W. Worthington, Mansfield; Jeffery Worthington, Bolton; R. Yelland, Ringwood; F. R. Young, Swindon. There were also present a large number of the members of our congregations in London, and the following gentlemen from the country:—Dr. Watson, Southampton; R. Pincock, Esq., Mayor of Newport; C. J. Darbishire, Esq., J.P., Bolton; Messrs. C. Jecks and J. Freeman, Norwich; C. T. Bowring, T. Avison. — Thorneley, Liverpool; J. Mace, Tenterden; I. R. Mott, Birmingham; J. Armstrong, Manchester; G. Lee, Barnard Castle; A. Dean, Yarmouth, T. Hands, York; J. Glyde, Ipswich; M. Hunter, jun., and Herbert Bramley, Sheffield; T. Anthony, Much Hadham; A. Leighton, Liverpool; Dr. Greenhow, Leeds; T. Dennis, Northampton. The Rev. J. J. Tayler, Principal of Manchester New College, we regret to say was unable to be present on account of continued ill-health.

The PRESIDENT (W. J. Lamport, Esq.), in opening the proceedings, said: I have been congratulated by one who, of all others, knows the history of this Association best, on having had the honour of being its president during a year of greater prosperity than it has known within the present generation. During the past year, amidst all the differences of opinion which necessarily exist among us, we have had more unity of spirit than has ever been manifested before. (Hear.) There has never been a year in which the committee have been more diligent, or the secretary more zealous. There has never been a year in which the funds to be administered have been larger, or in which those funds have been distributed with more discriminating care—a care all the more necessary because the fact is that this Association cannot make a grant to any object without putting a seal, so to speak, upon that object, and stamping it as one deserving of general support. I am told that the permanent library is increasing so fast on our hands that it will not be long before we shall be compelled to seek for more extensive quarters, and that our book and tract store has been largely increased by contributions from America, arising out of the friendly co-operation of the American Unitarian Association. The reports from local missionary societies are favourable; new chapels are rising in several districts of the country, in which our views of Christian truth are about to be unfolded; and, in point of fact, we have no difficulty staring us in the face but the old difficulty which we seem never to be able to get rid of—the difficulty of finding a sufficient supply of ministers at once able and well-instructed. So far as my own experience goes I have heard no misgivings about the objects and operations of the Association, except such as imply that its work is done. I have been told that the Churches are coming round to us, and that we are wasting our energies, that we are throwing our efforts away in continuing to attempt to build up separatist Churches, when the doors of the great National Church itself are to all appearance soon to be open to us. I do not know how that may be. It may be that the Sibley's last book has not yet been offered to the Church of England, and that there still remains a chance for the establishment of a Church in England really National; but even though that expectation were realised, there are differences of opinion amongst us as to what would be our right position. Some of us think that let come to the Church what may, so long as it remains Established, we, to be consistent, must remain as we are, Dissenters still. Others amongst us, perhaps the larger number, would, on the contrary, hail with gladness a comprehension that would include us all. I am often asked by my Church friends—I daresay others present are often asked the same question—what concessions, what changes would satisfy me and enable me to become a Churchman? Well, my friends, it always appears to me that it would be premature to give a full answer to that question. (Hear, hear.) The time for it is not come. But I have never any difficulty in stating at least one essential pre-requisite, and I always say that to my mind it is impossible—it will be impossible—for us laymen to enter the pews till we know beyond a doubt that our ministers can with clear consciences enter the reading-desks and the pulpits. (Applause.) I know of no compromise more mean than would be an arrangement that should enable the laity to find comfortable places inside the church while the ministers are left out in the cold. (Applause.) For my own part, therefore, I shall wait till my friend Mr. Jerson, and my friend Mr. Aspland, and my friend Mr. Martineau, and other ministerial friends of mine, are able to tell me that if I go to church I shall have a chance of listening to them. (Laughter and applause.) Meanwhile, it seems to me that we have a duty and a work lying plain before us and close to our hands. Do not let us relax in our efforts, do not let us draw our hands in, lest we call down upon us what the Apostle pronounced upon himself—"Woe be unto me if I preach not the gospel." For surely you would have silenced every religious reformer yet if you had bidden him wait to be comprehended in the national church of his country. Neither Peter at Solomon's porch, nor Paul at Mars' Hill, nor Luther, nor Baxter, nor Wesley, could have uttered a word had they waited for comprehension in the national churches of their countries. Let us, then, try to cultivate our little field of duty, and leave the issues to God's providence in God's own time. And certainly, if it has been our privilege, like the Titan, to endeavour to replace in men's minds the dismal foresight of future misery by blessed memories and boundless hopes, it is not for us to complain if, like him, too, upstanding, unsleeping, not bending the knee, we are still compelled to bear our testimony against those false conceptions of the nature and character of the Deity, and of the relations of the Deity towards mankind, which, though at least as old as the grand old Greek tragedy, have still life enough to be the root of half the evils spiritual, moral, and intellectual which afflict our humanity. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. R. BROOK ASPLAND stated that he had the day before received from the president, Mr. Lamport, £100, and from Miss Yates, of Liverpool, £50, donations to the funds of the Association; and from Mr. Ainsworth, of The Floss, £10 as an annual subscription. (Applause.)

The SECRETARY (the Rev. Robert Spears) read the report of the committee, of which the following is an abstract:

At the last Annual Meeting, Mr. E. Mappin, of London, suggested that at least £500 more, annually, might be raised, and generously headed the list with a gift of £50, which has since resulted in the sum named by Mr. Mappin. In addition to this, during the year there have been added to the funds the legacies of Miss Steele, of Kendal, amounting to £683. 9s., and of Mr. Roger Barrow, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, £100; and the roll of members (ministers of churches) has been increased from 60 to 102.

In the Home department reference was made to the Scottish Mission, to which £200 will be granted annually, as soon as another missionary can be added to the two already engaged—the Rev. J. G. Slater, who continues with increasing usefulness at Aberdeen; and the Rev. W. H. Williamson, of Dundee, who has conducted Sunday services, and lectured not only regularly at Dundee, morning and evening, but constantly in the week evenings in the towns of Perth, Forfar, Montrose, Arbroath, St. Andrews, and Kirkcaldy, in halls which have generally been crowded to hear him; and it is proposed to extend missionary labours in the West of Scotland.

Reference was then made to the labours of the Rev. J. C. Street, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and his zealous band of helpers. An extra grant of £100 has been made, to enable the Northumberland and Durham Association to engage another missionary.

Favourable reports of a steady progress are received from both Sunderland and Middlesbrough, and another missionary has been engaged in the North of England in so wide and promising a field. At Barnard Castle the erection of a neat and commodious chapel has been resolved upon.

From these various Associations monthly reports are received from the missionaries, which detail the work done, the progress made in awakening thought upon great theological questions, and the establishment of new centres of public worship and usefulness.

The missionary efforts of the London District Unitarian Society, which has at present eight preaching stations, kept open chiefly through lay agency, have also been aided by the Association.

In Kent and Sussex the committee have engaged for a short period the services of the Rev. James Bayley, to re-open Cranbrook and Northiam, and to help the few zealous friends at Rolvenden. For upwards of ten years the chapel at Northiam had been closed, and now, when services are held, between one and two hundred persons gather in for worship. Rolvenden is also aided, and a service is held every Sunday morning at Cranbrook, but with small success.

In the Foreign Department reference was made to communications with the Unitarians of America, and to the visit of Dr. Bellows last year, and the valuable services he rendered to so many of our churches and associations during his visit. During the past year the sister churches in America have had great prosperity, and liberal views of religion are spreading with amazing rapidity in that great country. Many new centres of Unitarian influence have been established, and old ones rendered more efficient. An intimation has been received from the American Unitarian Association that they would gladly join in establishing a mission Church in Paris, and this matter is now under consideration. A free exchange of books also takes place between the Associations.

The correspondence with the Unitarians of Hungary during the year has been of a more than usually useful character. The representative to their Tercentenary (the Rev. J. J. Tayler), on his return to London in October of 1868, was welcomed with the utmost enthusiasm and gratitude, at the Hanover-square Rooms, by one of the largest meetings of Unitarians ever held in London.

During the present year another Hungarian student may be expected at Manchester New College, a part of the expense being defrayed, as in former years, by the Association.

In Italy the Italian edition of Dr. Channing's Works is being distributed whenever there is an opportunity; and at the request of a resident in Spain a small parcel of tracts has been sent thither.

The committee have not been able as yet to engage a missionary for India. This would cost £400 annually, and the special fund for India is yet much below this. £50 has been voted again to the Rev. W. Roberts, of Madras. The members of the Brahmo Samaj (the religious reformers) are partial to Unitarian literature, and Mr. Roberts is personally known to some of the leaders. He proposes that three native missionaries should be engaged, and believes that they would prepare the way for a European, and that ultimately one-half of the cost might be raised among the different Indian congregations. The committee have authorised Mr. Roberts to engage three devout and intelligent natives for one year. Several valuable parcels of books and tracts have been sent out. During the present year, Mr. Roberts has issued an able defence of Unitarianism in the Tamil language, and he is performing essential service in Madras. He also interests himself in the establishment and support of schools. Grants of money have been made this year from the funds of the Association, to twenty-four different places, amounting to £893.

The Book and Tract Department of the Association has been of immense service. The total number of volumes of books for chapel libraries and tracts for distribution granted during the year to 58 different applicants is 44,700. The committee have in no case refused to vote a supply of tracts on proper application, and desire to make known their readiness to aid ministers by parcels of well-written tracts expository of Unitarianism. Several writers of useful doctrinal tracts have been helped to large editions through the orders of your committee.

Attention has been given, during the past as well as preceding years, to the formation of the Permanent Library. A very considerable number of books and tracts has been purchased, illustrating the progress of religious opinion and the history of Unitarianism, and some valuable gifts of books have been made by their authors and other friends of the Association. It is intended, under certain limitations, to make the library free to all members of the Association.

A renewed effort is being made at the Potteries, through the ministry of the Rev. Noah Green, whose expenses, with a little aid from this Association, are defrayed by the people in the district where he labours. At Cirencester, the services of the Rev. H. Austin have been engaged in the old chapel, which had been closed for many years, and where scarcely one family could be counted on to aid our church. Mr. Austin has admirably succeeded, and has an average of 100 persons attending worship, and a Sunday-school of fifty children and nine teachers. At Lynn, another effort has been resolved upon, and a minister and public hall have been engaged, with the aid of the Association. To several places small grants have been made to meet the expense of printing, or the rent of rooms for lectures.

During the year Deputations have attended several meetings in the country, and report that there are hopeful signs and a hearty zeal among the churches. In many places chapels are being repaired or rebuilt, and not less a sum than £40,000 has been raised for this purpose during the year.

The Petition agreed to at your last annual meeting for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church was among the first presented by Mr. Gladstone.

The Necrology of members includes the names of the Rev. J. P. Malleon, late of Brighton, and the Rev. Edward Talbot; Alderman Robert Heywood, of Bolton; Mr. W. Akroyd, of Stourbridge; Alderman James Williams, Mr. William Clephan, Mr. Henry Briggs, Mr. Henry Crook, Mr. J. T. Lee, Mr. W. Wansey, Mr. J. Brown, Mr. S. Bartlett, and many others, all well known to the Unitarian denomination.

The report concluded by urging the importance of everywhere encouraging devout, morally fit, and intelligent young men, who may appear to have the aptitudes for the Christian ministry, to enter upon a course of training suitable for this holy work, as there is at present, through several causes and increased missionary zeal, a great difficulty in finding preachers and pastors for many of our churches.

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD, in moving the adoption of the report, after speaking of the confidence which the members of the Association placed in its executive, said, that if he might be allowed to pass from the details of the report he would venture to say that as far as he could tell there never was a time when it was more expedient and more necessary that this Association should exist and flourish than at the present moment. (Applause.) He could not at all agree with those persons who seemed to think that the broad and liberal Christianity in other churches at all took off our shoulders the burden of our personal responsibility. (Applause.) On the contrary, it appeared to him that at a time when Unitarianism in disguise was making the most rapid progress, it was more than ever essentially necessary that Unitarianism without disguise should be plainly manifested. (Loud applause.) Let them look for a moment at the condition of what was called the Unitarian controversy; he meant by that not the controversy as to the general scheme of doctrine, which might be supposed to be taught in their churches, but with regard to the particular doctrine of the relation of Christ to God on the one hand, and to humanity on the other. He thought they would agree with him that there had been a great and very remarkable lull in that controversy. They had not heard of clergymen attacking Unitarian ministers or of Unitarian ministers having to defend themselves against clergymen. There had been a period of some twenty or thirty years of comparative rest in regard to this matter—a period of rest which had not been misapplied by them; because, though their attention had been to some extent taken from the foundations of their faith which they believed to be sure, they had drawn far more deeply than ever they did before from the true sources of spiritual life and placed their religion, if not their theology, upon a far sounder basis. It occurred to him the other day to renew his acquaintance with the records of the Liverpool controversy, the fight which Mr. Martineau and two others made against thirteen clergymen in the town of Liverpool; and he was much struck with this, that if, by ill-hap, the Liverpool Unitarians should have to fight the same battle over again, though it would never be fought by them with the same gallantry and depth that it was then fought, it would have to be conducted on an entirely different ground. And why was that? Not that they had changed their ground, but that their opponents had changed theirs, and because during the last few years points which formerly had to be debated and cleared up between the opposite sides were now admitted by both sides. The outworks had been given up, but the citadel remained still to be the object of contention. The outwork of the exclusive and infallible inspiration of Holy Scripture had been given up, and clergymen of a Church which contained such men as Mr. Jowett, and Dean Stanley, and Bishop Colenso could no more come to Unitarians in the way they used to do, and declare that Unitarians denied the inspiration of the Bible, when they knew very well that men in their own Church, and, in fact, all scientific and reasonable men took it as Unitarians did. The doctrine of eternal torments had also been given up. He did not believe that anybody knew—except a person who, from a little literary position which he held, was obliged to read an immense deal of rubbish—the extent to which that was being given up. The doctrine of vicarious atonement was already given up. We did not find any thoughtful or moderate theologian now, in any Church, except, perhaps, the Scotch Church, who accepted and preached the doctrine of a vicarious atonement, the theory of substitution. The death of Christ was now regarded, not as a manifestation of Christ's love to appease the Father's anger, but of a Father's love towards an erring and sinful world. The time was coming when all these outworks having been given up, they would have to fight the old battle once more in regard to the relation of Christ to God on the one hand, and to humanity on the other; but they would fight it with infinitely greater advantage than ever they had been able to fight it before. (Applause.) It was a very singular thing that a shot was fired in that controversy not very long ago—fired by no less a person than Mr. Liddon, the typical preacher of the Church of England, or, at all events, of the High Church party in the Church of England, Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Salisbury, and perhaps a man who had more influence over the youth of Oxford than any other man now living. When he (Mr. Beard) heard the boom of that shot, passing as it were over the battle-plain of theology, he could not but ask himself—"What does this mean, and who hit you? Why is it that you defend the doctrine of the deity of Christ when we, who are supposed to be its impugners, have not specifically attacked it?" It was defended in that book, he believed, simply because Mr. Liddon, who, with all his sacerdotal theories, is a man of religious insight, felt that the time was coming when that doctrine would have to be defended, and when the issue would have to be raised between a Christ who was Almighty God incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth and a Christ in whom was manifested the finest and most consummate union of the human and divine, which might be and was partially manifested in every clear mind and honest heart and conscience. The time was coming when these two theories of Christ would meet face to face for what he believed in England would be their last conflict; when it would be essentially necessary that what truth they had in their power to state should be stated clearly, simply, decisively, and firmly. The time was coming when the Church being liberalised, and orthodoxy losing its old form and shape, and men coming over by myriads without knowing it to the position which Unitarians had long occupied, they would have to uplift the standard of simple honesty and truthfulness about religious conviction. They might be right and they might be wrong, but in regard to one thing they must be right—that men had no right to aggregate themselves into churches which were based upon the denial of religious freedom; they must be right in believing that free men could only rightly aggregate themselves in free churches, and that all theologic speech ought to be clear, honest, open as the noon-day. (Loud applause.)

Mr. JOSEPH MUNN, Mayor of Tenterden, in seconding the resolution, remarked on the fact which came out in the treasurer's report that the annual subscriptions were under £600. This seemed to him to be much too small a sum.

On the motion of HERBERT NEW, Esq., seconded by the Rev. H. IERSON, the hearty thanks of the Association were given, amid very warm acclamation, to the Rev. James Martineau "for his most able, eloquent, and appropriate sermon," and were briefly acknowledged by Mr. MARTINEAU, who concluded by saying he trusted "that this Association will long be foremost in the theology of England, and that it will continue worthily to present the brightest and fullest fruit of Christianity in this country."

Sir JOHN BOWRING, in moving a resolution of welcome to Monsieur Coquerel, said: In my recollections that name is associated with some of the brightest impressions of my earlier life. It is more than half a century since I was in the house of that distinguished woman, Helen Maria Williams—who has written some of the hymns whose melody vibrates in every religious heart. I found her surrounded by the descendants of many of those who had perished in the French Revolution, and by others who were still living. Of those individuals I believe there is scarcely one who has not passed away. There were then two young men, the nephews of Helen Maria Williams—Athanase and Charles Coquerel—who had already obtained some distinction from the intellectual power and desire to advance the cause of civil and religious liberty. Athanase Coquerel's history may be known to some of you. I recollect him when he was first settled in the south of France, where he had gained general applause for eloquence—an applause so widely extended that he was summoned to Amsterdam, where I heard him addressing attentive, I may say enraptured, audiences, and still carrying on the work that was committed to his hands. His brother Charles, probably scarcely less distinguished than himself, did also his great work in the literary and political world. Of later years you know more of Athanase Coquerel. He was one of those who, in 1848, was elected a national representative. In the presence of his son I shall say little of him personally, except this, that he holds a great inheritance, and that if he walk as worthily as his father did, his children and his nation and the Christian world will reverence his name. (Applause.) Sir, some reference has been made to the expectation that a Unitarian Church might be established in Paris. I should be very glad to hear from my rev. friend whether he indulges any reasonable hope that the authority of the Government will be obtained for the establishment of a Church on those broad and general principles which we advocate. I believe, like many other places in Europe, it will be very easy to gather round the Unitarian standard great numbers of influential men and women. I observe the press, half emancipated as it is not only in France, but in Germany and Switzerland, and Spain, is already moving with us, and we find an extent of sympathy, and, I believe, some kind of co-operation of which we have hitherto formed little idea.

The Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, in seconding the motion, said: You have heard some facts from our old friend, Sir John Bowring, whose knowledge of the distinguished family of the Coquerels goes perhaps farther back than the knowledge of any one in this church; but I may claim a knowledge extending back many years, for some of the members of that gifted family were correspondents of my late father, and amongst his papers I found many most interesting letters, especially from Charles Coquerel. Our friend has been called upon to perform a most important duty in his country, to suffer for his adherence to truth, and he has gone through that trial in a way to redound to the honour of the cause with which he is identified. (Applause.) It is indeed a sorrowful thought that Protestants could be found who would offer any indignity to a man like him, but knowing, as some of us have the pleasure of doing, what the powers and eloquence of Mons. Athanase Coquerel are, I can scarcely blame M. Guizot and those who acted with him in that crusade for wishing to silence such a voice. But the folly of persecution was manifested in those proceedings. Although Mons. Coquerel had been silenced in Paris he had not been silenced, and could not be silenced, elsewhere, and he was summoned, north, south, east, and west, to perform important ecclesiastical duties in connection with the Liberal Protestant Churches in France. I feel that it is indeed a great privilege to-day that we can welcome such a friend. (Applause.)

Mr. SHARPE mentioned that Monsieur Coquerel was of the family of the founder of Dr. Williams's Library. M. Coquerel's mother was a Miss Williams.

The resolution having been cordially agreed to, Monsieur COQUEREL addressed the meeting as follows:—Mr. Chairman, even if I had at my disposal your language in a more sufficient degree, I should be overwhelmed at this moment by the feeling of your extreme kindness to me and by the still stronger feeling of gratitude for what my highly-valued and deeply-respected old friend Sir John Bowring, and such a distinguished preacher of the Gospel as Mr. Aspland, and such a scholar as Mr. Sharpe, have just said about my family, about my father, my uncle, and that aunt, whom I remember, when I was a very small child, teaching me the English spelling-book. I am sorry to say I have not profited by her lessons—at least, not so much as I should have liked; but one thing I have profited by, and that is the lessons which my father and uncle gave me, and the deep feeling of Liberal Christianity which I saw pervading their hearts and their lives. I cannot accept the too-flattering words of the resolution that has been voted of hearty welcome by you; but though there is a great deal more than I deserve, I can accept it just as showing the sympathy that exists, and that must exist more and more, between liberal Christians in this country and on the Continent, and especially in France. I accept it as an auspicious announcement of more intercourse between you and us—between those who fight the same combat in France as is fought in other parts of Europe, and which you have been fighting nobly here for a long time, and with increasing success.

Perhaps you will excuse me if, to show the state of opinion in France on the subject of Unitarianism, I relate to you a few circumstances of quite recent occurrence—not very important in themselves, but perhaps suggestive of what the real state of things is. Three weeks ago I preached in Paris—not in such a handsome church as this, not in an edifice with glorious stained glass, as I see here in those beautiful windows, but in a room with a very ugly low ceiling, up three pair of stairs, and where the atmosphere was quite stifling, because the place was crowded. There I preached on the last words of the Lord's Prayer—in fact, it was the end of a series of sermons on that subject; and when I came to these words, "Thine are the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever and ever," I said, what I suppose any preacher from this pulpit would say, that it means that the kingdom and the power and the glory belong to God only—to God Almighty, to God the Father only, and not to any other; and I said that this prayer was used in the Church when the mother of Christ, and Christ himself, had been made partners of that absolute deity that can belong only to one. A week afterwards I preached the same sermon at Havre, where I was delegated as a member of the committee and one of the vice-presidents of our old Bible Society—which has existed more than half a century—to preach the annual sermon in behalf of that society, and, without changing the sermon or the text, I said the same things. When I had said those things the week before in Paris it was in a place where there were certainly no two persons, and perhaps not one, to think otherwise than I did; but at Havre there was one who did not approve it, and who wrote a pamphlet against me the next week. I do not mention this as of any importance; I think a grey-haired man as I am, and who has been in the foremost ranks because he was born there, and it was his duty to remain there—I think a grey-headed man like me can use the comparison which an old statesman in France used lately—"Oh, I am an old umbrella, and I have received so many showers on my head that a drop more or less is nothing at all." In the pamphlet this was said against me:—"Since he is no more a Unitarian, he ought not to preach in a Unitarian church." But the party who wrote that is completely mistaken. Not only am I "no more a Unitarian," but I never was. I never was brought up in that way; and my father, to whose long labours Sir John Bowring paid tribute a moment ago, never was a Unitarian, and Helen Williams, though I cannot answer for her first years, certainly was not in her last. There was a mistake about this. And another mistake was that of calling the Reformed Church in Havre the "Unitarian Church." The Reformed Church of France has no creed; all questions are open questions; and it may happen, and it does happen, that in some places where there are one, or two, or three ministers Unitarians, and succeeding one another, the Church is by accident a Unitarian Church, and it may happen, also, that the reverse takes place. The two facts are not rare, either the one or the other, and no one has a right to say of the pulpit of one of the Reformed Churches of France that it is Unitarian. We have the right to preach in it one opinion or another. Now, when I was excluded from the pulpit of a Church in Paris it was not on that question that the debate was brought. That was not specially the point. From what I heard from Mr. Beard just now it appears that here the question is not limited to that point only. I think the great question is this, and on this we all agree—whether our conscience, our religious feeling, our religious wants, have a right to be what they are out of the pale of some dogmatic system, of whatever description it may be—I think the question is this, that we who believe there is only one God, and not two or three, or more than three, have a right to believe it, and I said in our pulpit the other day that I think I believe on that subject exactly what Christ himself taught and believed. I would rather be in harmony of opinion with him than be in harmony with all the Unitarian theologians of the Roman Catholic Church, or the Protestant Church, or any Church whatever. That question is not at all doubtful to me; but only a part of a wide system of religious liberty. And here I come to answer what Sir John Bowring did me the honour to ask a moment ago, as to whether I thought the Government in France would allow a Unitarian Church to be built and a Unitarian worship to be celebrated in Paris. I have not the slightest doubt on that point, and I more than hope, for I can give the proof. More than a year ago two young ministers of the Gospel and myself asked from the Government leave to preach. We are obliged to ask leave in France for many things which we ought to be able to do without any leave whatever. The persons who had power to give or to withhold leave, in this instance, were the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Public Worship. They both gave it. We said in our letter asking for the permission that we were members of the Reformed Church of France; we did not give a creed of any sort. If we had given an answer to any question asked about our opinions they would have been heretical answers; they would not have been Orthodox answers or Trinitarian answers, because those we cannot afford to give, and we thank God for it. There was nothing of that at all. The names were recognised as not being subversive names—the two ministers found that we were not going to speak on the subversion of the State or against the peace of the nation, and they gave us leave to preach. It is true that we are poor, that we have an ugly room to preach in, and that it is in a part of the town where there are no Protestants, or almost none. Thus, things are going on upon a very small scale, but I have no doubt that if a Unitarian Church were built in Paris, and Unitarian worship to be commenced in the English language, there would be no objection. I will answer this further by saying that I perfectly agree with Sir John when he says that in all religious forms there are men in France at this moment who are quite awake to these two important truths—first, that it is impossible to live and more impossible to bring up children without religion; and secondly, that it is impossible for thinking people to live, and more so to bring up their children in an orthodox form of church. They want, and they feel every day more and more that they want, free worship, free teaching, free religious life. I should most likely astonish many of you if I mentioned the names of celebrated writers who really have given proof of those dispositions and those feelings. In Paris, at this moment, and generally over the whole of the Continent, there are a great number of foremost men, people who are in the vanguard of thought, who, if the gospel were preached to them with liberty, would come in and uphold religion in such a way with all their might; but they cannot do it in the way in which it is presented to them either by the Roman Catholic Church, or by Protestants, who I cannot help thinking are rather more than half Roman Catholics in reality. I end as I began, by thanking you heartily for your extremely kind welcome, and by saying that I accept it not only for myself, but also for that numerous set of men who work, who fight, and who suffer when necessary for our great common cause. (Loud applause.) It is in the name of many unknown friends that I accept your greatly too-flattering welcome.

After a vote acknowledging the services of the Rev. J. J. Tayler in representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at the Unitarian Tercentenary festival, in Hungary, which was moved by Mr. JAMES HEYWOOD, and seconded by the Rev. DAVID MAGINNIS, both of whom referred very warmly to Mr. Tayler's service to our churches, and expressed the very deep regret felt by all at Mr. Tayler's absence through illness, the rest of the business was of the usual official character, election of officers, &c., and has been already sufficiently chronicled in our advertising columns.

MEETING AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The proceedings of the anniversary were brought to a close by a collation at the Crystal Palace on the afternoon of the next day in the grand dining-room overlooking the gardens. The weather, which in the early morning had displayed some of the tempestuous character of the previous day, fortunately cleared up about noon, and assumed all the warmth and brightness of a true May day, which added very much to the enjoyment of the visit. The collation was attended by nearly five hundred guests—by far the largest number that has ever assembled on any of these interesting occasions.

W. J. LAMPORT, Esq., of Liverpool, presided, supported on the right by M. Athanase Coquerel and the Rev. James Martineau, and on the left by the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress. An extremely agreeable feature of the present collation was the introduction of some admirable part-singing by a well-trained body of ladies and gentlemen under the lead of Mr. Charles Hill. After the President, in a few well-chosen phrases, had proposed "Her Majesty the Queen," and the time-honoured sentiment, "Civil and Religious Liberty all the World over," had been responded to by Sir John Bowring,

The Rev. R. SPEARS, secretary, responded to the sentiment, "The British and Foreign Unitarian Association."

The PRESIDENT proposed "Health, Happiness, and Long Life to the Preacher of the Anniversary Sermon." (Loud applause.) At the meeting the day before, Mr. Beard reminded Mr. Martineau of the part he took in the Liverpool controversy. For his part he had the advantage of hearing every lecture which Mr. Martineau preached on that occasion, and he also had the advantage of hearing the first sermon which Mr. Martineau preached before the Unitarian Association. He possessed a copy of that sermon, and he looked upon it as one of the most valuable of his literary possessions.

The Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, after acknowledging in suitable terms the extreme warmth of his reception, said he would not endeavour to express the grateful sense he entertained of the kindness with which they had received his poor efforts in the pulpit the day before, and the deep interest with which he had attended to perform the part that had been assigned to him on the present occasion. It would seem as though the skies smiled upon their social meetings, but endeavoured, as it were, to drown their religious efforts. (Laughter.) He did not know whether that was a kind of reflection of the repute in which they were held by the world at large, which generally gave them credit for social worth and social excellence, but at the same time endeavoured to pelt at their religion and to say they had none of it all. (Laughter.) He trusted that time and experience would correct that impression. For his part he looked with no despondency upon the present state of the world, and the present state of their own country, in relation not only to the propagation of their special opinions, but to the progress of liberal Christianity in whatever form and under whatever guise it might prefer to present itself. What seemed to him a most remarkable feature of the present day was the parallelism or simultaneousness of the same movements of mind in Europe and America. There was not a sect in this country that was undergoing a history and a struggle which had not its counterpart in a corresponding sect in America. The same with regard to the Continent of Europe. This appeared to him to be an indication that, in spite of the different external circumstances which surrounded us, and of the different history from which our churches were derived, there was a common movement of humanity towards that which would at last prove to be a unity of religion, a catholicity greater and nobler and more enduring than anything which had dared to assume that noble name in the past ages of Christendom. He would now quit this topic, and propose this sentiment:—"The Free Churches of every land. May they have leaders as wise and fearless as the French Protestant Church has in M. Athanase Coquerel." (Applause.) Whether the French Protestant Church any longer deserved that honourable name of a free Church might be doubtful. The very course of events which had brought M. Coquerel into such close communion and sympathy with themselves itself confirmed that doubt. Still, at the present instant, in its constitution, in its written basis, the French Protestant Church was a free church, if by a free church was meant a church that had committed itself to no stereotyped creed, but which had left itself open to the natural development of time and experience. Long might M. Coquerel, whether he favoured or whether the unpopular, continue the representative of such a church. For his part he was strongly in favour of the adherence of all liberal and noble-minded men who could do so with a clear conscience, to the church in which they had a right to be placed. He was decidedly against a hasty departure from that church as long as they had the least opportunity of fighting the battle of freedom within its range. But we could not doubt that there was considerable probability that M. Coquerel and noble and high-minded coadjutors in that struggle, might be unable to continue it indefinitely within the limits of the Protestant Church; that they might be driven out and compelled to seek another home, to assume the attitude of Nonconformists in relation to the French Church, and to create a new church upon the soil of their country. In connection with this probability he remembered that a proposal had proceeded from our American brethren to join with the English Association in creating a Unitarian Church in Paris. He could not help doubting whether the proposal was really a wise one; whether it would be desirable that the Liberal Christianity which existed in Paris should be gathered round a centre which was a peculiarly English and American centre—round the centre of Unitarianism; and whether it was not an interference on their part with the natural development of the course of events which would take place if they abstained from stepping upon French ground, and left them to erect their own institutions in their own way. Now, he would ask plainly this question. Here was a great probability that, under the auspices of their distinguished friend—who had shown himself, as a statesman, practically capable of constructing institutions, as well as of thinking out their bases and principles as a theologian—here was a great probability that he might have the power to create a church, upon whatever basis might approve itself to his conscience and the conscience of his friends. The ground was clear; he could lay down any basis that might be proper—there was nothing to pre-judge it; it was completely open to him to lay down the foundations of this new church. Then, what would they have him to do? Would they have him lay down that church on a dogmatic and doctrinal ground? Would they have him write down in a document the very theology which occupied his own mind, and embody that in a creed, and put it into trust deeds, and make it the basis upon which a new church should develop itself in France? (No, no.) He ventured to say that M. Coquerel himself would not accept that principle, but would at once repudiate it and scorn it. It would be, in fact, a complete self-condemnation. For what had been the noble plea which he had urged within the Consistory of the French Protestant Church in Paris? It had been this: "Your constitution is perfectly open; you are orthodox—you are Trinitarian; we are not Trinitarian, and we have as much right to sit in this Consistory, to preach in these churches, and to conduct these institutions as you have: let us in to sit side by side with you—we claim our place." And when they were not permitted to have that place, it was complained of as an injustice. Would they have M. Coquerel himself create a new church upon the very same principle of exclusion and narrowness,—upon an exclusion that should be Unitarian instead of Trinitarian? Surely not. If, therefore, the opportunity were given actually to embody and perpetuate in a new Church in France the very type of theological opinion which seems to be the truest, and which occupies the foremost minds of that country, I say that opportunity would be declined. Would you have him select some one favoured doctrine or principle which is more important than others, and say to those who enter this future church, "You are perfectly free on all other subjects, but on this subject you shall make a declaration?" Would you say, "You shall have private judgment upon nine-tenths of the articles, but upon the remaining one-tenth you shall have a public declaration?" He maintained that that would be contrary to the principles of a free church, contrary to the arguments by which a free church had hitherto been effectually maintained. He trusted the time was coming when the old idea that had prevailed in our ancient churches, of certain essentials as the basis of an ecclesiastical community which should be fixed and unchangeable, would rapidly pass away. He held that, although to each individual there were, and always must be, essentials of theology, those essentials were in their own nature variable, and relative both to the minds of the individual persons and to the mind of successive generations of Christendom. And this, he thought, was distinctly shown by the history of sects. What was laid down as an essential in one age was for the most part some principle which had been ignored and lost sight of, and the opposite of which had been tyrannically enforced and insisted upon, so that the conscience rebelled against the oppression and incubus that had been put upon it, and quitted the community to which it had hitherto been attached, and set up for itself some fresh principle. Thus, at a time when there was a cruel and monstrous preaching of the doctrine of eternal torment, those who were unable to bear a suffering of that kind supported a Church upon the ground of Universalism, and the Universalists based themselves upon that one doctrine in order to utter a protest against the most crying and miserable evil of theology in their time. So at a time of mere formalism, when sacerdotal principles and High Churchism were very prevalent, we had the doctrine of the spiritual vindication by the Quakers. So, in the same manner, their own body set up the doctrine of the unity of God as their protest against the mischiefs of the doctrine of the Trinity. Time after time some one doctrine had been brought into prominence as a protest against the evils of the age. But when a few generations had passed away this prominence had ceased to exist; the evil to which it was opposed had passed away, and other evils had arisen, so that fresh protests were wanted. The old names and the interests which had rallied round them had passed away and become comparatively flat, and the result was that it was impossible to maintain the sects upon their old basis. How was it in America at the present time? We found there was an inherent sympathy between several of the different bodies of liberal Christians that exist there. The Universalists did not like to retain their Universalism apart; the Unitarians did not like to retain their Unitarianism apart; and the Christians did not like to retain their form of Christianity apart; and they were gradually tending towards one another. But the great difficulty was they did not know what to do with their old names. If the names were put aside they would gladly join in one body, and instead of three weak churches they would be one united expression of an approach to Christian unity. If, unhappily, the liberal Protestants of the French Protestant Church should quit the ecclesiastical connection in which they had been born, and should be obliged to set up a church for themselves, he trusted it would be really a free church—a church left to its natural sympathies, and to the gradual and insensible development of its own opinions, according as fresh light might come in from age to age. He believed the time was coming when the liberal Christians of Europe would have to fight a battle more serious and more difficult than any to which they had yet applied themselves. (Hear, hear.) Everywhere we saw that their position was threatened by opposite forces. On one hand, we saw a rapid and large development of pure materialism and secularism, which attempted to deal with human life with a total omission of religion. On the other hand, as if to oppose this, we saw the claims of priesthood and sacerdotalism, in the Catholic Church the ultramontane tendency, and a poor and wretched mockery of the same in the Anglican Church. These forces would close their ranks, and would endeavour to destroy whatever lay between them. The time was come when liberal Christians should forget their divisions and separations, and unite in every civilised country of the world, without stipulating for the particular terms to which each special ecclesiastical connection was historically attached; that they should join together and use their best possible light in order to drive back the opposite hosts of darkness that environed them. (Applause.)

M. COQUEREL, who was received with a great deal of cheering, said he must disclaim the title of leader which was attributed to him in the resolution. He was but one among others who, in their hearts and consciences, held the same views on religion that he did; but he had the advantage of being the person upon whom the first blow had fallen, though there were others who equally deserved it. He quite agreed with what Mr. Martineau had said about churches having their development like plants, or like organic bodies. The church to which he belonged, the Reformed Church of France, had its history. It was at the beginning essentially Calvinistic; but Calvinism was never the name the church assumed—it called itself the Reformed Church. He liked that name, because he thought reform was a thing that could not be done all at once. (Hear.) He thought a Reformed Church was a church that was to be reformed more and more. (Applause.) He and his friends were working for the reform of the church in which they were born; they were doing their duty to her, and were the real and legitimate sons and successors of those who founded that church. The Christian religion itself was but the reform of another religion that went before it, the Jewish religion. In the destinies of humanity, all forms of religion had some portion of truth in them. There never was a perfect religion in the world, and never would be, because religion was the adoration of man, who was imperfect. But, at the same time, all forms of religion were capable of higher development, and it was the duty of good men to try and perfect the church they were born in. After the Reformed Church of France had undergone long persecutions, and had begun to put on new life at the end of the last century, she found that she had lost her creed; and when, in 1787, Louis XVI. gave Protestants the civil rights they had lost, they began immediately to take religious rights. But they did not at the same time revive their old creed—it was forgotten, and remained forgotten; and from that time to the present they had had nothing of the kind in their church. They were a free church in that sense. Afterwards this happened, and here he was going to make an accusation against England. When peace was established in 1815 a number of well-meaning, pious Englishmen came over to visit the Continent. It was quite a treat to them, for they had not been over for a long time—(laughter); they came over with a feeling of pity for the poor Frenchmen, who had been a revolutionary people, and had committed the great sin of beheading a king, though they were not the first in history who had committed that sin. (Laughter.) It was then generally admitted that they were all unbelievers, and the well-meaning, pious people he spoke of took a great deal of trouble to revive religion in France. They, however, thought the darkest and driest Calvinism the only legal form of Protestantism, and they got up a revival. But a revival was a good thing with a mixture of bad elements in it; and that was the case in France. The English who got up that revival did some good, but they also did a great deal of harm. They divided the people; they made many well-meaning, pious, but uninstructed people believe that there had been a great falling-off from religious truth. It was not so, but the consequence was that the church was divided into two parts, and it remained so to the present day. He considered that he was a successor of the old Protestantism of France. Not that it was the same that it was at first, because there was the same difference between them that there is between the acorn and the oak. The acorn had become an oak; the legitimate natural change had come; and the Reformed Church of France was more a Reformed Church than she was at the beginning of her career, and she more deserved the name. That was the natural course of events; but by an artificial movement backwards the English brought many of his countrymen to think that they were infidels and unbelievers, unfaithful to the faith of their fathers. So there came a violent reaction, and that reaction had been acquiring strength; and he thought now it had done its worst and was beginning to outlive itself. But he must say that the English of different denominations had had a great part in what had happened among Protestants in France during the last thirty or forty years. The Calvinists, the orthodox party, had felt themselves supported by their English friends, and they claimed to be the only Protestants in France. But there were some in the Church who said all the English were not with them, and they pointed to the Unitarians as a proof that there was a feeling of Liberal Christianity prevailing in England which the Calvinistic party did not represent. Now, between the Unitarians and himself what was there? A name. He would not say there was nothing in a name. The name of Unitarian he liked and respected. As he said the day before, the Unitarians of England were the vanguard fighting in the battle of religious liberty, and their name deserved to be held in honour and esteem. (Applause.) But as Mr. Martineau had said, the reformed members of the Church of France must not take even such a respectable historical name as theirs; they must preserve the name of Reformed Church, which to them was as comprehensive as the other. They were, in truth, Unitarians. When he heard Mr. Martineau preach, when he heard the prayers and songs, when he heard what had been said in that room, he felt quite at home with them—(applause); he might say he and his friends were flesh of their flesh and bone of their bone. (Applause.) What they had to do, then, in the present phase of the struggle was to try to reform their own Church more completely, to make that Church, which was free, which had no creed, acknowledge the fact, and oblige her, not only to receive them as members and pastors, but to renounce the pretended right of excluding them. (Applause.) When the Consistory of Paris, by the mouth of its most illustrious member, M. Guizot, officially asked him to found a Church out of the pale of theirs, he said he should not. Why? Because he never took the advice of a foe. (Applause.) His meaning was this—that he intended to remain in the Church of his fathers in which he was born; it was his house as much as it was M. Guizot's; and more, because he considered he was more faithful to the principles of the Reformed Church. (Applause.) If he were to think of founding a Dissenting Church, he should be a deserter from a position he had no right to desert. But if he were obliged to choose between having a separate church and renouncing the rights of conscience and the liberty of conscience, then he and his friends would certainly prefer to found a separate Church. In a large town like Paris that was not difficult to do; but there were a great number of Protestant Churches in all sorts of places, where the dividing of a small community into two churches would be an act of imprudence, which they must not commit if they could help it. Besides, there would be other difficulties in the situation which French Protestants occupied in their own country which they must avoid. But if he were going to found a new Church, he would not ask anybody to accept a creed of his. To impose a creed upon another was not right, it was a tyranny. There was an old saying, that if three orthodox Protestants met on a desert island, the first thing they would do would be this: one of them would find in his pocket a creed, and he would try to persuade the second to oblige the third to accept it. (Loud laughter.) He would not do anything of that kind. (Applause.) He loved religious liberty so much that he not only loved the liberty which he wanted himself, but he loved the liberty which his neighbour wanted. (Applause.) Such being the state of things, he thought they were perfectly agreed as to what was their duty in the present circumstances of the Church of France. They must keep where they were as long as they could; and, if they were obliged one day to leave the pale of the Church and found another, then they must not give anybody the right to accuse them of being tyrants, just as they were now complaining of others being tyrants towards them. He knew of only one test which could distinguish one Christian from another, and that was his own declaration. He would leave everybody to believe what they could, not what they would. When a man came and said he was a brother, and he was a Christian, he had not a second question to ask him. (Applause.) He would say to him, "You will live in liberty with free Christians, I accept you; perhaps you may be mistaken on such points, and perhaps I may be." He was no Pope, and he should not like to be one. (Applause.) He had to accuse himself of not having accepted sooner the kind invitations he had received from their body. He had duties which did not permit him to do so. But now, it was a great joy to him to have met them and to have taken part in their services. He should return to France with the very strong wish to promote between liberal Christians in this country and liberal Christians in France more intercourse than had hitherto existed. Their opponents in both countries knew very well how to help one another against them. They had done so for half a century, and would continue to do so. Therefore they, the friends of religious liberty, must cling together; they must love one another, they must help one another, they must live in real Christian community together. That was to him a token and augury of success for the future. He was not afraid of the future. He thought Mr. Martineau was right when he said they had before them a very great struggle. But what struggle was it? The question was whether a man could live without God and without religion, or whether he was obliged to believe anything that had been decreed by the Roman Catholic Church in other times. He could not believe, he would not believe, that the human mind would return so far backward, fall so low, as to accept all the absurd and contradictory things that had been decreed at one time or another by some authority who had no right to do anything of the kind. As to living without God, living without religion, he defied the human mind to do that. It was impossible, it was against our own nature; for as soon as people had decreed that there was no God, there were many who, with their hands on their hearts, exclaimed, "I feel him there!" It was impossible for man to destroy the religious feeling which the Almighty had given him. We could deny it, we could forget it, we could make our way of living so false that we should not recognise the feeling in ourselves; but if we had it not, it would reappear in our children. It was impossible for any length of time to make human society live on the principle of no religion whatever. Then, what was in the way? Why did not all men come to those who professed Christianity? It was because creeds, orthodoxy, dogmas, doctrines, were in the way? Many people said they would not believe in God because they were afraid of the creeds, dogmas, orthodoxy, and doctrines, which their consciences could not accept; and they thought they cut the tree by the root by denying religion and God. They were mistaken, and they would one day find, though they denounced everything appertaining to religion, that religion was living in their souls and in the souls of their children. The works of God we could not destroy; we could spoil them, but we could not destroy them. He was not afraid of what dogmatism, creeds, and intolerance could do, because he thought those things had had their time. They did not answer to the state of public opinion in this country, and in coming times. Very often he thought of that saying, they knew by whom, "Let the dead bury their dead." He was quite certain that intolerance, dogmatism, and creeds were dead; they seemed to be living, but they were not. They were things of another age; they belonged to the past; they had nothing to do with the future, and in the present they dwindled to nothing. Thus we should not be afraid of them. And if liberal Christians were not the most numerous they were the men of the future. They had before them what they had not behind, the enlargement of the public mind, with the religious feeling becoming everywhere more alive and more free. They had before them what was necessary to the human mind, what mankind could not live without—God and liberty. God, because they were His children, and they could not live without their Father; they came from Him and would return to Him; and liberty, because it was not possible to go to Him by any other way. They wanted liberty because they wanted to go to God, because they wanted to go to everything that was good and true. The cause of true religion and true liberty were one; and if they were but faithful to their cause, under whatever name they might fight, under whatever flag they might unfurl, they were quite certain that the world would hereafter belong to their cause. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD proposed "The House of Commons," coupling with the toast the name of the Lord Mayor, M.P. for Lambeth. In the course of a most eloquent speech, he paid a warm tribute to the personal characters of Mr. Bright and Mr. Gladstone, and rejoiced in their advent to power as marking a new era in the history of the government of this country. Referring to the Lord Mayor, he said that "he was entitled to their gratitude for the way in which, on the bench at Guildhall, he had thrown the weight of his magisterial authority on the side of commercial honesty." (Applause.)

The LORD MAYOR was received with great applause, and it is gratifying to find that although almost overwhelmed with the duties of his office, and those of a member of Parliament, he at least of our twenty Unitarian M.P.'s is willing to testify his interest in the Association by coming to its meetings.

In response to the toast of "A Free Press."

The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN called attention to our denominational press, paying a very warm tribute to its value, specifying the Inquirer, Herald, and Theological Review, which he earnestly commended to the increased support they merited.

With the exception of Mr. Martineau and M. Coquerel, whom everyone would gladly have heard at even greater length, the speakers generally made their addresses as brief as they were spirited and interesting, so that when the meeting closed, which it did about seven o'clock, the tables did not present the empty appearance that has hitherto characterised these gatherings at the later part of the proceedings.

STANNINGTON.—On Sunday last the school sermons were preached by the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Leicester. There were good congregations both afternoon and evening. Two very appropriate discourses were followed by collections, which realised the sum of £13. 13s. 1d.

THE LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting of the society was held at its accustomed resort, Radley's Hotel, on Wednesday, under the presidency of JAMES YATES, Esq., M.A., F.R.S. The meeting was fairly but not numerously attended. In the absence of the Treasurer (the Lord Mayor), his brother, Mr. ALFRED LAWRENCE, read his report, from which it appeared that the balance due to the treasurer on the society's account at the end of last year, of about £70, had been reduced to between £20 and £30, but that the Lay Preachers' Union, which began the year with a balance on the wrong side of about £50, and with an annual income of £12. 7s., had increased their indebtedness to more than £200.

Dr. DAVIDSON read the committee's report, which narrated the various attempts to found congregations at Stratford, Woolwich, Walworth-road, Mile End, Clerkenwell, Forest Hill, Hoxton, and Roman-road, Islington, and the varying success which attended those efforts.

At Stratford, the new chapel would probably be opened in the summer, and it was hoped, free of debt. At Woolwich, a station had been lately opened, the expense of which was estimated at about £46 a year, half of which amount it was expected would be defrayed by its congregation.

The lease of the Chapel in the Walworth-road had been renewed for another three years. The doctrines preached there had, it appeared, already exercised some influence over the neighbourhood.

At the East End, one portion of the congregation remained in the society's mission-rooms at 245, Mile-end-road; another section met at present at Cottage-grove, Bow-road, but talk of building a chapel on Stepney-green. A series of Sunday evening discourses in connection with the Mile-end congregation had been delivered by the Rev. J. K. Applebee, in a large hall engaged for the purpose, at which as many as 200 persons had been present.

In Clerkenwell, where the society had for a long time supported a mission station at Plummer's-place, the use of an excellent meeting-house, belonging to the Free-thinking Christians, had been obtained on Tuesday evenings at the mission station. Its school work, week evening lectures, &c., were still carried on; while the Sunday evening services were held in the chapel.

From Forest-hill it is reported that the congregation is growing but slowly. Special reference was made to the services of Mr. S. S. Taylor in connection with this church; and it was noticed that all the current expenses of the worship are defrayed by the members of the congregation themselves.

At Hoxton a small cottage service was held. Here the members who meet had organised themselves into a church, and had appointed officers. A course of lectures had also been delivered at Roman-road, Islington, and interesting discussions had been held at the close of these lectures.

During the past winter upwards of two hundred lectures had been delivered at the various stations on about seventy subjects, embracing all the more important points of Unitarian belief.

During the year, also, the work of the Ladies' Visiting Society had been carried on according to the scheme finally adopted. It was requested that country ministers would keep the secretary informed of any changes of residence which might bring families to London, and would press upon members of their congregations who might come to London, especially the young, the importance and desirability of attaching themselves to some one of our metropolitan churches.

References were also made to the printing and circulation of upwards of one hundred thousand leaflets, setting forth the main doctrines of Unitarianism, which had been found to be very useful.

The Rev. R. SPEARS read the report of the Lay Preachers' Union, going somewhat more into detail as to the actual working of the various stations, from which it appeared that at Walworth there was an attendance which varied between 20 and 40, at Hoxton about 17, at Forest Hill from 7 to 30, and at Woolwich about 12. As to the other mission stations no numbers were given, and, says our correspondent, it would have been instructive to have heard how many of those who contributed to the average attendance consisted of members of our other London congregations, and how many might be considered the actual local congregation.

The adoption of the report was moved by the Rev. D. MAGINNIS, and seconded by Mr. HANDS, of York. Just as the chairman was about to put the motion to the meeting, Mr. R. BARTHEM wished to ask what chance of ultimate success there was with respect to these stations. They had begun the year with a debt of £50, which they had since increased to over £200, and this was by no means a satisfactory state of things. He must say that the statements made in the report differed materially from those made to him by private individuals, who were acquainted with the working of the Union more than he was. He thought it absurd to go on opening a number of little places here and there, some in close proximity to handsome orthodox churches and chapels, with which they could not hope to compete. He hoped they should have a guarantee that there would be no continuance of this apparently reckless and extravagant expenditure. A warm discussion followed. The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL and Mr. F. NETTLEFOLD protested against the policy of starting a number of little missions, and the Rev. J. C. STREET, who said he had established a goodly number of congregations in connection with the Manchester District Unitarian Association, urged that, according to the rule of that society, after six months each congregation should be imperatively required to pay its own expenses. Mr. WALLER and Mr. JAMES PHILLIPS introduced complaints of the treatment the Stepney congregations had received from the society, the latter going into personal matters which the Chairman at once stopped.

The course pursued by the society was defended by the Rev. R. SPEARS. He reminded the meeting that the Union had only been established three years. Many churches throughout the country had not succeeded better than the lay preaching stations, even after 15 or 20 years of toil. They did not aim to build up large congregations, but to bind together in different parts of London men and women holding Unitarian views. The station at Stamford-street had been eminently successful, although it was in close proximity to many handsome churches and chapels. That at Forest Hill had during the past year paid its own expenses. Their efforts at Walworth had been successful. Clerkenwell had had a mission established for some time, and good was expected to be done in that neighbourhood, as a new room had just been opened. At Hoxton there was merely a place where 17 or 20 people met for worship, who would not attend any church. Surely it could not be desired that such a place should be closed.

The chair having been taken by J. HART, Esq., J. YATES, Esq., having to leave the meeting, the resolution for the adoption of the report was at last unanimously agreed to.

The Rev. E. KELL, proposed, "That this meeting rejoices to hear of the missionary efforts which are in progress in different parts of the country, and pledges its sympathy with all who are labouring to diffuse the doctrines of Unitarian Christianity everywhere." In doing so, he said he had been more or less a missionary ever since he entered the ministry. As a proof of how an apparent failure might ultimately result in success he instanced the case of Southampton. After the congregation had been established there for two or three years, the few members felt quite disheartened, and wrote the secretary of the Southern Unitarian Society to say that they wished to put an end to the mission. When he (Mr. Kell) received the letter, instead of submitting it to the committee, he put it in the fire. (Laughter.) Notwithstanding such an unpromising beginning, the congregation there had turned out to be one of the most successful in the South of England, and was at present in a more flourishing state than ever before. He would recommend young ministers above all things to be their own missionaries to the poor, and not to trust that part of their work to anybody else.

Mr. SHARPE seconded the resolution. He said that to measure the success of a mission by its ability to support itself and pay its own expenses was equivalent to saying that the richer members of the Unitarian body were not to establish places of worship for their poorer brethren. He, however, thought it was one of the misfortunes of society in the present day that the rich herded together and built handsome chapels and engaged able ministers, while the poor were unable to enjoy these benefits.

The Rev. H. WILLIAMSON said he had found in his district that the intelligent working men, who had no social advantages to sacrifice by accepting what was called heresy, were ready and willing to adopt Unitarian principles. The work in Dundee was commenced only three years ago, but already the congregation numbered over one hundred; which, besides paying their own local expenses, had contributed fifty pounds towards the Scottish Unitarian Association. (Applause.) Undoubtedly much of the success was owing to the fact that the people of Scotland had got tired of the popular theology. The penny paper had ousted the old standards of divinity, and now instead of sitting round their fires discussing the relative merits of John Calvin and Arminius, the people talked about the character and dispositions of such men as John Bright and Mr. Disraeli. The Unitarian cause stood in relation to theology precisely where the Liberal cause stood in relation to politics, and those who adopted Liberal views were very likely to be open to the influences of Unitarianism. Perhaps one error which ministers made was to deal too much with the abstract. Of course it was desirable to have men who could map out the great lines of thought, but it was necessary that there should be men willing to do the sledge-hammer work—to go among the poor, and uneducated, and degraded, and show them that there was a better thought about God, a better hope about heaven, a better sense of relationship to one another, than that which orthodox theology had crammed into their minds. (Applause.)

The Rev. J. C. STREET said, five years ago there were, between the banks of the Tees and the banks of the Wansbeck—a distance of some hundred and twenty miles from north to south, and between the coast on the west and the coast on the east, a distance of some sixty or seventy miles—only two Unitarian ministers at work. At present, partly through the efforts which he and his fellow-labourers had made, but largely through the generous and munificent aid of the British and Foreign Association, there were six ministers employed in the district, four of whom have settled congregations. The work in Choppington had attracted a wonderful amount of attention, and become a sort of beacon throughout the whole district. Men came trooping in from all parts, some of them walking as much as twenty miles in the day in order to attend the services, and then going back to their own districts, eager and most anxious to have similar services there. One result had been that in at least one half of the pulpits from Newcastle to Morpeth, a distance of twenty miles in one direction, and thirty or forty in another, within the last few months a crusade has been preached against Unitarianism. It could not be said that the people there were indifferent to Unitarian views. They either loved them with an intense and burning love, or they hated them with a deep and bitter hate. Ultimately amid the contention of opinions, truth must gain the victory, and the cause of Unitarian Christianity win its way. (Applause.) Some four months ago the Rev. Thomas Leyland went there as a missionary. He at once set himself earnestly to work and sought out the most likely places in which to begin to preach. Among other places he visited Blyth, with a population of about ten thousand people. He had great difficulty in obtaining a room there in which to hold meetings, for the main room of the place, which had ample provision for public speaking, was closed against him by the trust itself, which forbade the preaching of any opinions there other than those which were preached in the neighbourhood when the room was first built. However, he at last obtained a room and arranged for a course of six lectures. Discussion was permitted after each lecture, and Methodist ministers, doctors, lawyers, and lay preachers in abundance attended to break a lance with the representative of Unitarian Christianity. Mr. Leyland, however, not only held his own, but created such a good impression that a great excitement was caused in the neighbourhood. Last week, when he (Mr. Street) was setting out for London, a letter reached him from a Methodist New Connexion minister, stating that it was his intention on Friday last to deliver a lecture in the Central Hall, Blyth, to prove that Unitarianism was not Christianity, and inviting him to be present to take part in the discussion. He (Mr. Street) sent the letter to Mr. Leyland, hoping he would attend the meeting. He did so: six hundred or seven hundred persons were present. The Lecturer spoke for upwards of an hour, after which Mr. Leyland had ten minutes to reply, and then the lecturer ten minutes more, and so on. At the close of the meeting numbers of people who before had been utterly hostile to Unitarian Christianity expressed their deep and earnest interest in it, and at the service in Blyth on Sunday afternoon, the Methodist minister was present, and expressed very considerable agreement with the major part of the address which Mr. Leyland had delivered.

The Rev. G. RIDE (of Chorley) said not one of the congregations in East Lancashire had been formed without some crisis happening as disheartening as anything connected with the efforts of the London District Association.

The Rev. C. H. A. DALL gave an encouraging account of the prospects of his mission in Calcutta. He now found himself with double the means he had before, so far as money and men were concerned.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Rev. LEONARD HUNGES (formerly a Roman Catholic priest) proposed the next resolution, recognising the voluntary services of the members of the Lay Preaching Union, and the importance of the work in which they are engaged. He said, nowhere on the Continent was there any such thing as a lay preaching union. In Germany it would be looked upon as the greatest presumption for any man not an ordained minister to stand up and preach before the people; and, in fact, the law would not permit any one to do so. It was almost more necessary for an Unitarian minister to be an educated man than for a minister of an orthodox creed; because in the latter case doctrine is more sharply defined, whereas in the former the indefiniteness of the doctrine rendered personal study and personal conviction absolutely essential. He had, however, frequently been astonished to find laymen so well informed both in England and the United States. On the Continent it was a very rare thing to find a theologian who was not a minister. Ultimately the motion for the adoption of the report was agreed to.

The other resolutions were of the usual formal and grateful character, the speakers being the Revs. R. B. Maclellan, R. Shelley, F. R. Young, A. N. Blatchford, and M. C. Gascoigne, and Messrs. S. S. Taylor and W. N. Green.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE annual breakfast of this Association was held on Thursday morning, the 20th instant, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street. We must congratulate the committee on their having obtained so suitable a place of meeting. The attendance was very good.

In opening the proceedings, the CHAIRMAN (Rev. H. E. Dowson) said he understood the secretary was about to read a report which would take rather a gloomy view of the present condition of Sunday schools. He was himself inclined not to be so very gloomy. Sunday-schools might not seem to look very bright at this moment, but his belief was that a very much better future was in store for them than anything they had seen in the past. Passing on to one or two conditions which rendered Sunday-schools inefficient, the first was to be found in the fact that not only were they voluntary institutions, but that the volunteers entered upon them very often with a very vague idea of their purpose. They saw persons coming into the school on Sunday morning, sitting down in the middle of their class, not to conduct that class through any specific course of instruction, but very often not knowing when they entered the room what would be the character of the instruction given. The result was what was very prevalent; the teacher in weariness sitting on his chair, the scholars in weariness reading around. That kind of teaching was absolutely useless; it created no interest, and the necessary result was that the attendance at the schools was exceedingly irregular on the part both of scholar and teacher. The consequence of course was just this—that every Sunday, except in some rare cases where such things did not occur, classes were without teachers, disturbing the rest of the school, or else the elder scholars had to be abstracted from the senior class, thus being prematurely moved from the scholar's bench to the teacher's chair. That, he feared, was very true with regard to the majority of Sunday-schools; but, notwithstanding all that, they observed in them that which was beyond all praise—the union of class with class in beneficent activity; they observed there the chief means of laying hold upon the poor and entering their homes with religious influence; and, above all, here was the nursery of their churches, without which the churches would expire and disappear. His aim was not to discourage, but to point to some sources of encouragement. He had referred to the teachers coming to the school Sunday after Sunday with but a vague idea of what they came for. Now, if they could alter that condition, could gain a distinct notion of what Sunday-school work was, and could organise Sunday-schools up to that distinct notion, they would have removed this chief cause of inefficiency. He might be asked had they the slightest reason to expect a change. He thought there was. Sunday-schools are passing through a state of transition. They did not seem to have made up their minds whether their Sunday-schools were supplementary to their day-schools in the sense of teaching lessons which they had failed to give or of reaching children whom they had failed to reach, and until they made up their minds which of these two functions was theirs they were acting at cross purposes and would do nothing well. Was there any reason to hope they would be able to make up their minds on this very serious and difficult question? The facts surrounding them would speedily assist them, and to a certain extent were already assisting them to make up their minds. Although education in this country was at present far from satisfactory, although it was very deficient it was much less deficient than heretofore, and therefore he believed their function increasingly was a religious function. (Applause.) He might be too sanguine in looking forward to a time when none of the children would come into Sunday-schools in need of secular instruction, but the movement in favour of national education had taken a vast stride, and the people began to see that education was not only a moral but a political necessity, and were determined now that the power was in their own hands to sweep away that wretched religious difficulty which stood in the path, and obstructed the education of their children. (Applause.) He thanked God that that religious difficulty was a pure myth, and the people knew it. It was a difficulty, not of the parents or the children, but of the parsons—(hear, hear)—who regarded education as a matter in which they were patrons, and gave as charity what was the people's right, and the people now were determined to ask for their rights, and to get them for themselves; and it was inevitable from the means which would be employed to obtain the end that the education would be a secular one. The consequence would be that whilst Sunday-schools would no longer be required to give the secular instruction, they would be required as never before, to give the religious instruction which had escaped from those schools. It was consequently not with discouragement that he looked forward to the future of Sunday-schools.

Mr. F. NETTLEFOLD read the treasurer's report, which showed a balance in hand of about £90.

Mr. WADE, who said he did not confess to the impeachment of the chairman that he was going to read a gloomy report, read the committee's report.

The report stated that for some years the committee have endeavoured to bring forward prominently the fact that, whilst the number of schools and the number of scholars on the books continue to increase, the average morning and afternoon attendances do not show a corresponding improvement. Last year's returns showed that there was a great step in advance of the four preceding years, though the ground lost since 1863 was not recovered. In that year there were 151 schools, with a total of 19,791 scholars; average attendance in the morning 67 per cent., in the afternoon 78 per cent. Last year there were 181 schools, with 22,142 scholars; but their average attendance reached only 61 per cent. in the morning, and 73 in the evening, indicating a falling off in five years of 6 per cent. in the morning, and 5 per cent. in the afternoon. This year the summary presents the largest number of schools and the largest number of scholars ever reported; but the average attendance in the morning is 59 per cent., and in the afternoon 71 per cent.; a falling off as compared with last year of 2 per cent. on both parts of the day. These averages contrast rather favourably than otherwise with those of other Associations, both among Churchmen and Dissenters, which report this year that "the average morning attendance in the London schools is still going down." Of our London schools Portland-street has gradually worked its way to the first place, and the school of the Free Christian Church, Kentish-town, has been added to the list. Waiworth school has again been discontinued. In the country schools the percentage is but 60 in the morning, and 72 in the afternoon, against 62 and 74 per cent. attendance of last year. Both the Manchester District and the North Midland Associations show a slight diminution in the average attendance, and the same may be said of several of the schools belonging to the West Riding and also of this Association.

The totals for the present year, as shown by returns from 185 schools, are 22,381 on the books, with an attendance of 12,571 in the morning, and 15,455 in the afternoon, with 3,511 teachers. As compared with last year this shows an increase of five schools, 239 scholars, and 31 teachers, but a decrease in morning attendance of 330, and afternoon 368. Most of the schools have libraries, savings' banks, sick and clothing funds attached to them, some having bands of hope, and a few bands of faith. The finances of the Association are in a healthy condition; the sales of books continue to be the same. Another volume has been added to the list of publications, "Lessons in Religion," by Miss Gillies. The committee have also accepted the copyright of "Outline Lessons on the Life of Christ," by the Rev. Brooke Herford. Reference was made to the attendance of Messrs. Bartram and Wade as a deputation to the Manchester District and North Midland Associations at their annual meetings this year. The "Sunday-school Penny Magazine" has attained a much larger circulation. In conclusion, the report expressed no alarm at the present state of the Sunday-schools, nor do they despair of their future.

The Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU moved the first resolution:—"That the report of the treasurer and committee just read be received and adopted." After referring to the statistics, which he always regarded as the least reliable figures in the annual report, he dwelt upon the general conduct of Sunday-schools, entirely agreeing with the admirable remark of the chairman, that the essence of the whole thing lay in the zeal, the determination, and conscientiousness of their teachers. He thought much less of the number of the teachers than of their character, devotedness, and resolution to carry on their work. (Applause.) He noticed continually that the young persons, and others not altogether young, who joined in this good work, did so very much from a kind of desire to escape the compunctions of an uneasy conscience that they were doing nothing at all in the world, and that they must really pluck up a little Christian zeal and put their shoulder to the work, and address themselves to some sort of duty. If they went into the Sunday-school from no other motive but that of quieting conscience, in all probability they would do it without any clear perception of the nature of the work; their whole personality would not be engaged in it, and they would get over it as fast as possible. It would not be their work of the day, but a bribe to conscience not to prick them with its uneasy compunctions and remorse at their Christian idleness. So long as they went on in that way the work could never be done effectually, and it never could produce the very effect contemplated in addressing oneself to it. Unless they threw themselves more positively into the work, considered what that work was, grappled with its difficulties instead of slurring them over in a slovenly way and getting to the other side of them, and addressed themselves to the preparation for the work distinctly and clearly, so that when they went to their class they knew what they were about, they would take no interest in the work, and the children would take no interest in the work. Throw their hearts into it, and it would become delightful—a personal tie between themselves and the children; they would get to know each child, to understand the character and turn of thought of each child, and the whole work would assume an entirely different character. If teachers could be persuaded to devote a portion of every Saturday and of every Sunday morning before going out to their work to this preparation of their own minds, he was quite persuaded the whole aspect of their Sunday-schools would assume an entirely different character. Sometimes he saw a teacher come in (merely sent at the last moment at the request of the proper teacher, who absented him or herself), who came without the slightest idea of what was to be done, goes to the superintendent, and says, "Pray, what is this class to do?"—not knowing the children, not knowing the work, not knowing the books, spending an hour or an hour and a-half in this way. What possible benefit could arise to either teacher or taught? For his part, he should be ashamed ever to go into a class of any kind which he undertook to teach if he did not feel master of the work which had to be done. If the quality of their work was elevated and changed by preparation of that kind, he was persuaded the quantity of work done, and the number of children coming to their schools, would rapidly satisfy their most ambitious desires. There was another advantage which would arise; the moment a person cleared up the bewilderment of his or her mind as to how to teach the principles of religion to a little child, the whole subject would spread itself out with a clearness and distinctness before them, the ultimate result of which would be that they would have written lessons founded upon the practical experience of teachers, and a store of books which they could put into the hands of inexperienced teachers, and which would tend to the improvement of the Sunday-school teaching throughout the country. They were rather apt sometimes, with the true English habit of criticising themselves, to lay the defects of their Sunday-schools too much upon the persons who conduct and manage them, but there were other parties concerned in this—he meant the parents of the children. They were left too much without the co-operation and the accompanying intelligence of the parents of the children. They were too apt to throw off the duty of the home and throw it upon the Sunday teacher. So long as this was the case the work must be most imperfectly done, and it would be one of the best effects of our extended system of personal visits to the parents of the children and visiting mainly by the teachers themselves, that they would get into communication with the parents, that they would adopt them, as it were, into their partnership. There was one expression that dropped from the chairman which always created a strong feeling of dissent in his mind. He spoke of the progress of English education, and said the poor people would see that they had their rights in this matter. For his (Mr. Martineau's) part he protested against the people having any rights in this matter, excepting that the children had a right to demand from their parents education. He denied the right of what were called the people, if by the people they meant the labouring classes and those who came into their elementary schools, to demand their education of any class that was above them, whether any particular class or any class collectively; and it was rather a mischievous thing to put this idea into their heads, instead of making it a claim upon their consciences, that they ought to do to their children what all parents were bound to do in respect to their children. He did not object to the idea of a national education, but if national education was administered, it should be supplied in such a manner as most carefully to guard the sacredness of the parental obligation, and to put upon the parents of the children the duty of paying their fair share of the expense at the same time that they had their proper share in the controlling and administering of those schools. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the Sunday-schools in particular, this was most important, and unless they were able somehow or other to bring action to bear upon the consciences of the parents, their Sunday-schools would always have to struggle against a certain degree of unconquerable difficulty, and they would languish in the work before them.

Mr. JOSEPH LUPTON seconded the resolution. He did not consider that the report was an unsatisfactory one. With reference to Leeds the figures given did not give the fair result of the work. They had considerably improved upon the previous years, and the education given was of a higher character and doing more good, because there was more preparation, such as Mr. Martineau had referred to. He recommended the examination of the children every quarter or half-year by the minister, and urged the necessity for perfect sympathy between the teachers. Their teachers at Leeds attended every alternate Sunday, and he had known cases where the teachers who alternately took the class did not even know each other. He suggested the adoption of some plan by which their Sunday-schools could have the benefit of printed Scripture questions or suggestions in their Magazine, so that every teacher and scholar might know beforehand the lesson to be given and prepare for it. Such a plan had been found exceedingly valuable in the Leeds Sunday-schools, and might be valuable elsewhere.

Mr. PINNOCK (Mayor of Newport) said the great cause of the falling off in their Sunday-schools was the difficulty of getting teachers—the difficulty of getting a sufficient number, and the still greater difficulty of getting teachers who were earnest in their work. Sunday-schools would never flourish until that was remedied.

Mr. WADE read a paper written by a lady, containing some excellent thoughts on the conduct of Sunday-schools.

The Rev. RICHARD PILCHER did not think the falling off was as great as their figures presented. The more he saw the figures the less respect he had for them. The looseness with which Sunday-school teachers kept their books and Sunday-school superintendents kept the registers was something startling to a practical man, and if there was any apparent damage, any falling off in figures, it was simply that they were beginning to keep their books in more regular fashion than formerly. The great bulk of their Sunday-schools were purely secular schools, and the great bulk of the children came for purely secular instruction. He was afraid they did not realise that fact, but it was so, at all events, in the North; and in proportion as the need for secular instruction became less felt and less secular instruction was given in their Sunday-schools, in that exact proportion must they expect a falling off in the number of scholars. He rejoiced to think the time was coming when Sunday-schools could become really religious institutions, but was also sure that when that time came they must be prepared to find a great diminution as to numbers.

The Rev. H. WILLIAMSON said his opinion was the time had not nearly come when secular instruction could be abolished. He wished it could, and should be very glad to find that writing, arithmetic, and mere mechanical reading could be done away with. There should, however, be a decided distinction between the two classes of instruction; he would limit secular instruction to one part of the day, and in the other part let the teacher's attention be confined to purely religious instruction.

Mr. HENRY RILEY said he had a theory of his own with regard to the falling off in the schools in the Midland district. For some time past they had been losing their elder scholars, and that to him was the only discouraging circumstance in connection with the schools, because upon their retention of the elder scholars depended mainly the good and permanent influences which might be expected to arise from their efforts in the Sunday-school. Why did they not retain their elder scholars? It arose simply from the fact that they had no teachers who had the power of interesting those scholars sufficiently to keep up their attendance beyond a certain period. The remedy was a very simple one. They must have a more prepared class of teachers. The work was generally left to the young and inexperienced members of the congregation. This ought not to be. They had in their congregations men of standing, education, and influence, who could not be making themselves more useful than by devoting some portion of their leisure time to assisting, counselling, directing, co-operating, and working with the young members of the congregation in carrying on the Sunday-school. (Applause.)

The Rev. HENRY SOLLY was sorry to hear the last speaker say they were losing hold of the elder scholars in the Midland district. He thought more might be done with a view of promoting and preparing the elder scholars for joining the congregation. It was a very difficult question to know how it was to be done, but it had been done with considerable success in several congregations at different times by some sort of introductory services, introducing them, as it were, to the Christian Church. The elder scholars might be helped towards this by being formed as much as possible into secular societies, which should have the effect of uniting them together in a brotherly spirit. He could not believe that the proper object of Sunday-schools could be to give secular instruction, except under the lamentable deficiency of secular teaching in the week days; but he was quite sure that secular and religious truths ought not to be divided in the way too often it was.

The CHAIRMAN explained that what he meant by saying that education was the right of the people, and that right they intended to demand, was that they were demanding that they should be allowed, not to receive education paid by rates coming out of other people's pockets, but that they might be allowed to pay rates themselves for the education of their own children.—Resolutions welcoming the representatives of other Sunday-school Associations and appointing the officers were afterwards passed, calling up the Rev. C. Beard, Mr. Munn, Mr. J. Reynolds, Mr. Herbert New, Mr. Harrison, and others.

STALYBRIDGE: LAYING THE FOUNDATION STONE OF A NEW CHAPEL.

DURING the last half century, there has been a numerous body of Unitarians in Stalybridge, but it was not until about seven years ago that they seriously entertained the question of commencing a Sunday-school, owing to there being a very good one in connection with the Old Chapel, Dukinfield. A few assiduous young men and women, however, determined to form a school, and their combined efforts were rewarded with success. There are 360 scholars taught by 51 teachers, who have already a library of 580 volumes. This, however, by no means represents the number of those who would have joined if there had been room. During the last autumn a wing was erected to the school in order to meet the demands for admission, but even this has proved insufficient. A school progressing at such a rate was sure to need a place of worship, and in the beginning of the year 1866, some 30 Unitarians formed themselves into a church, services were conducted in the Foresters' Hall for a short time, and afterwards the congregation were compelled to meet in the upper room of the People's Hall, which, in many respects, is unsuitable for public worship. The congregation continued to increase until now there are 120 members of the church, whose zeal and earnestness have prompted them to make an effort to raise funds for the erection of a building to be devoted entirely to public worship.

The site of the new church is the corner of Canal-street and Brierley-street, and the foundation-stone was laid on Whitsun-Friday, in the presence of a large concourse of spectators. The scholars and teachers attending the Dukinfield Old Sunday-school, and those of the Stalybridge Unitarian School, numbering together nearly 1,000, headed by two bands of music, went through the principal streets of the town, before visiting the site of the proposed building. Among those present were—Revs. Francis Revitt, and C. L. Whitam, Nottingham; Mrs. Leech and Mr. W. Leech, of Gorse Hall; Messrs. David Harrison, H. T. Darnton, Mayor of Ashton, W. Burnley, William Marshall, Cartwright, Burton, Charles Dawson, H. C. Hill, Joseph Oliver, Joseph Wood, James Heaton, Joseph Roberts, David Illingworth, John Howard, Stalybridge, William Whitworth, Newton Moor, Robert B. Orme, Ashton, Alfred Harrop, Charles Harrop, Edward Kerfoot, James K. Forster, William Bradley, and Abraham Smith, Dukinfield.

The proceedings commenced with hymn and prayer, offered by Rev. Francis Revitt. Mr. John Howard then read a list of articles in the bottle to be placed in the cavity of the stone.

Mr. JOSEPH OLIVER, chairman of the Building Committee, then presented a splendid silver trowel and a beautiful ivory mallet to Mrs. Leech. On behalf of the congregation, Building Committee, and the members of the church he tendered their sincere thanks to Mrs. Leech for the graceful manner in which she acceded to their request, that she would lay the foundation stone.

Mr. WILLIAM LEECH returned thanks on behalf of his mother in a few appropriate remarks. He thanked those who were connected with the undertaking, and all who had taken an interest in it, and he assured them that it had afforded the whole of the family great pleasure in doing what they had done for the promotion of the school and church. The stone was then "well and truly laid" by Mrs. Leech; after which the assemblage was addressed by Mr. John Jackson, Mr. H. T. Darnton, and Mr. Burnley. The proceedings then terminated with the singing of the National Anthem.

INTELLIGENCE.

* * * The pressure upon our space renders it impossible to give even the brief notices of Sunday-school Whitsuntide excursions for which in previous years we have made room.

BELFAST: YORK-STREET.—On Sunday, the 16th instant, the Rev. J. Page Hopps, of Dukinfield, preached two excellent sermons in Belfast on behalf of the above congregation, one in the Rev. John Porter's Chapel, Rosemary-street, which was kindly lent for the purpose, and the other in York-street Chapel. There was a large attendance on each occasion. The collections amounted to upwards of £158.

DUNDEE.—During several months a regular weekly lecture has been given in a populous district of the town. Every lecture has been well attended, and considerable discussion has frequently taken place. On Monday evening a social meeting was held to mark the conclusion of the course; the chair was taken by the Rev. H. Williamson. Addresses were given by Mr. H. C. Briggs and others, all agreeing that the lectures had been a success and had strengthened the Sunday meetings in the Thistle Hall.

CORRESPONDENCE.

No anonymous letters inserted: the writer of every letter must append his name for publication. All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

To the Editors.—Will you give me space to convey to friends who have anonymously sent me parcels of books and pamphlets an acknowledgment of the receipt of their useful donations? I have no doubt there are many others, who, having Unitarian literature for which they have no further use, would be willing to send such to me if they knew, as is the case, that I would make good use of it.—Yours faithfully,

HENRY WILLIAMSON,
Missionary Scottish Unitarian Association.

NEW UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHAPEL, STRATFORD, LONDON.

The Unitarians at Stratford, having sold the short lease of their former Chapel (which was some distance from the populous part of the town), have purchased a freehold site in one of the best situations, and are erecting an elegant and comfortable Chapel from a design kindly furnished by Thomas Chaddick Clarke, Esq., of London, and will be completed in July, the cost of which, including land, will amount to £1,000. Four members of the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—Messrs. Lawrence, Preston, Taylor, and Spears—have been elected, with others at Stratford, as Trustees. The town of Stratford contains a population of 60,000, and is rapidly increasing. The members of the Congregation at present are chiefly persons of humble means, but have generously subscribed nearly £100. Subscriptions are therefore respectfully solicited on behalf of the Building Fund.

SUNDAY MORNING THOUGHTS. By J. M. DIXON.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL PENNY MAGAZINE for JUNE, 1869, contains—Cast him into Outer Darkness, Chapter I.—Ezra's Cry; A Tale of Hyge Days, Part VI.—The Orphan Girl; or, the Testimony of a Good Conscience, Part III.—What may Happen to a Thimble. Published by the Manchester District Sunday-School Association, agent, Mr. T. P. Jones, Memorial Hall, London; E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand, Manchester; Johnson and Lawson, 89, Market-street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

There seems plenty for missionaries to do in our own possessions without, as yet, stirring up disturbances in China. The Ceylon papers report a case of Devil-worship which serves to show this. In the house of a Cingalese dubash, a figure of the particular devil to be propitiated, attended by a host of his fiends, was set up, and in front of this a poor little girl was compelled to pass the night, holding in her hand a string, which was attached to the image of the devil. Some fifty dancers and musicians made the scene more appalling by their noise, contortions, and invocations. The ceremony lasted from nine at night until ten, the next morning.

The Mormons, who seem rather active just now, lately held a General Conference at Salt Lake City, at which 8,000 persons are said to have been present. Forty-six missionaries were appointed, mostly to England, a few to Denmark and other European countries, and one or more to South America, to preach the Mormon gospel to the benighted heathen of those distant lands. Some have already started on their journey, and most of the others expect to start within a month or two. Orson Pratt, who has been spending much time in transcribing the "Book of Mormon" into the characters of the Deseret Alphabet, is now in New York for the purpose of having that curious work published in type of the characters named. The substitution of the Deseret for the Roman character appears to be a pet project with some of the leaders, but is not very popular with the masses of the community, who seem to be more interested in procuring a sufficiency of bread and fuel and clothing, than in philological or phonetic reform.

The Saints have likewise been holding a Conference at Sheffield, and from the reports given in by the elders, things are prospering with them in this country, though the accessions to their numbers do not seem to be great.

Excavations have for some time been going on, under the superintendence of Mr. Wood, in the Great Theatre and near the Magnesian Gate, at Ephesus, and the result has been a large collection of inscriptions and other antiquities, which are now in the British Museum. Among these is a record of various gifts of treasure made to the famous temple of Diana. In the list of statues, in the precious metals, dedicated by Salutaris, probably about A.D. 104, are several figures of Diana with two stags. These were, no doubt, such representations of the Ephesian goddess as, at the time of St. Paul's preaching, were manufactured in such abundance at Ephesus by Demetrius, the silversmith, and his brother craftsmen, and which so frequently occur on the coins of Ephesus struck under the Roman empire.

One of the Munich journals states that the cure of St. Anne in that city has permitted the posting up in his church of placards announcing a spiritual lotto for the benefit of fervent Catholics. Each of the 90 numbers bears the name of a particular sin. No. 20 is destined to help in withdrawing from purgatory the male or female souls who have been too much addicted to sleep in this world. No. 47 is to render the same service to those who have indulged in too much hilarity during their subterranean existence. At this new game people may play either alone or in company. A single individual takes every day one number; repeating also five paters, five aves, and a credo. In this way a person gains, for the sin indicated in the number, an indulgence not only for himself, but for any soul in purgatory which he may fix upon, so that the numbers have a twofold effect.

It is stated that Dr. Robinson is organising an American church in Paris, to include all denominations who accept the Apostles' Creed.

The Church Chronicle says that Dr. Lee, of All Saints', Lambeth, informed his congregation, in a recent sermon, that he had received a letter from the Patriarch of the Orthodox Eastern Church, in answer to a memorial from the A.P.U.C., stating that the authorities of that Church had determined in sacred Synod to admit to Communion members of the Anglican Church travelling in those countries. They must have letters commendatory from their parish priest, and these again countersigned by the bishop of the diocese.

Mr. E. S. Foulkes authorises the Western Daily Press to state that there is no truth whatever in the report, published in the Weekly Register, that he has been formally received into the English Church, and that he is about to resume his functions as a clergyman of that communion.

In two papers read at the Sheffield Church Conference, among the reasons given why the ablest University men shun the Church as a profession were these: 1. The rewards and prizes of the Church had been levelled, and thus it presented less temptation to men of high and fashionable connections. 2. A raised standard of clerical life and duty had made it unpopular with some young men. 3. There was also a growing development of the sacerdotal feeling separating the clergy from the laity, and making them more and more a caste, and therefore candidates from certain social classes would not become clergymen. 4. The objection to tests and subscriptions; and 5. A well-founded fear of the permanence of the Church as an Establishment. The great thing to be done, according to one of the writers, was to make the pecuniary inducement to enter the Church more considerable. "Either by Easter offerings, by pew-rents, or by some other regular means, he cared not what, the incomes of the clergy must be increased. With the example afforded them in this respect by the Dissenting bodies, surely the Church need not despair." Well, hardly we should think, considering that the Established Church is so amply endowed.

The Irish Church Bill, as our readers are doubtless aware, was read a third time in the House of Commons on Monday night, and passed by a majority of 114. The second reading of the Bill in the House of Lords is fixed for the 14th. It is understood that at a meeting to be held to-morrow the Conservative Peers will decide what course is to be pursued respecting it.

A separation of Church and State has taken place in the Bahamas, where the Episcopalians numbers but a tenth of the population. A bill for this purpose had already passed the House of Assembly in two successive years, but was stopped on each occasion by the Legislative Council. This year, however, the Council has given way, and the State Church stands abolished.

The "Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament" have been holding their seventh anniversary in London. In reading the proceedings we verily thought they were those of some Roman Catholic society, until we came upon such well-known High Church names as those of Dr. F. G. Lee, Dr. Little-dale, Rev. C. H. Lowder, and Rev. J. T. Carter, the "Superior General." In a report of the work of the past year, it was stated that four priests had withdrawn their names, and the Bishop of Honolulu and seventy priests had been admitted as associates. There were now two bishops and 236 priests clerical associates, and 2,400 medals had been issued to lay members. Ten new wards had been admitted during the year, and the total number was now twenty-seven. Grants of altar linen had been made to nine churches, and the Lady Secretary and those who worked with her deserved thanks for the beautiful manner in which they had executed their work. The American confraternity had been formed into a distinct organisation, and advice, rules of management, and patterns of altar linen had been forwarded to it. It was mentioned that "the needlework department," which seems to be looked upon as of great importance had been very successful. The Chairman said the whole of the controversies of the day were centring in the altar, and that it was for the society to sustain Eucharistic truth in its fulness, and to look to the outward forms in which the great mystery of the Sacrament was enshrined and set forth before the senses of men. Dr. Little-dale regretted that the school to which he belonged had not acted with more courage in resisting the judgment in the Mackonochie case. It did not so much affect him, because he never had lights upon his altar, and never should have; but he would take care to have them about the altar, and if he were proceeded against for such a step, he would have distinct judgments in both the Diocesan Court and the Arches Court, the court above. He would depend on no society for help, but fight the case himself to the very last, for he was a poor man, and the other side would get nothing out of him, and if he was defeated he would lay down his arms. The "other side," it is understood, are ready to accept this challenge, at which, no doubt, the lawyers will rejoice.

The case of Mr. Bennett, vicar of Frome, proceeded against by the Church Association for heresy, is to come before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the 14th of this month.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In noticing the second volume of James Grant's "Religious Tendencies of the Times," the Record confirms what we said last week as to the growing heresy respecting the doctrine of eternal punishment. It says:

"There is a fearful amount of Pantheism, Atheism, and Materialism poisoning the public mind by means of the daily, weekly, fortnightly, and monthly serials. But the spread of the errors of Universalism and Rationalism, both within the pale of the Church, and especially in the Nonconformist pulpits and publications, is still more fearful." "Mr. Grant states that the doctrines of Universalism are spreading in various forms. Some teach the doctrine of Annihilation; others explain the truth by teaching that everlasting separation from God is not inconsistent with an enjoyable existence, a blending of a large amount of bliss with misery—a notion which robs the idea of a judgment to come of half the terrors before which Felix trembled. The Congregationalists, it is said, are, as a body, about to declare the eternity of future punishments to be an open question; whilst Mr. Joshua Wilson, who is one of their greatest authorities and most respected leaders, declares that 'a Latitudinarian spirit is rapidly spreading amongst Nonconformists!'"

From the same notice we learn that one of the practical errors to which Mr. Grant calls attention is "the use of Socinian hymns which have found their way into the hymn-books of Evangelical denominations." Our contemporary says:

"Out of many, he instances two. The first is one which has been much admired, but is after all only an ebullition of Deistical sentimentality. It is found, e.g., in 'Mercer's Collection,' and may possibly be sung with edification by a Christian believing not in an absolute, but covenant God. It begins—

'Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee; &c.

Another hymn is one written by the ultra-Unitarian Sir John Bowring—

'In the cross of Christ I glory,
Towering o'er the wrecks of time.'

Yet no one more entirely rejects both the Divinity and Atonement of Christ. He here writes in the same unreal sense as we have seen that Bunsen wrote, although Bunsen writhed under the degradation of resorting to the hypocrisy of using Evangelical words in a philosophical sense."

In some remarks on Dr. McNeile's "windy letter" to Mr. Gladstone, the English Independent thus speaks of the pugnacious Dean:

"He has been foremost in every ecclesiastical fray between Protestants and Romanists for nearly half a century. His life in Liverpool was one of chronic conflict, if not of squabble. He was the rallying point of Orangeism, which in that town attains a fury of malignity to be found in no other part of England, and to his bitter and unscrupulous assaults upon the Romanists we may in great measure attribute the fact that the Popery of Liverpool is the most impenetrable in Her Majesty's dominions. His promotion to the Deanery of Ripon and his consequent removal from Liverpool, while sincerely regretted by the Orangemen, was as sincerely hailed by tens of thousands as a termination of a state of warfare by which no gain had accrued either to truth or charity, and as the commencement of a new period in which Protestantism might contend with her foe in a nobler spirit and with fairer weapons. But "Cælum non animam mutant qui trans mare currunt;" that is, being freely interpreted, an incumbent may become a dean and still remain the same. Ripon has gained what Liverpool lost, a fervid, passionate zealot, who is little careful about the soundness of his arguments if he can only excite the alarms of the people at the aggressions of Popery. The purpose of his recent letter to Mr. Gladstone is clearly to create a panic fear which may delay if it cannot avert the triumph of that noble measure which is to terminate centuries of wrong. That it will fail of its object not even Dr. McNeile can entertain a serious doubt."

In a notice of a work on Turkey, by the Rev. H. F. Tozer, the Pall Mall says:

"The most amusing specimen of Mr. Tozer's resolution to find fault with everything Turkish is his indignation at the treatment of the pigs, which, he says, are unmercifully taxed because they are Christian animals. If this were so, it would be no worse than the old German practice, not very long since abolished, of weighing all Jews who desired to pass the frontier, and levying an advorsum duty on them. It has been a great oversight hitherto on the part of those good and zealous men who have laboured so earnestly in behalf of the Turkish Christians that they have neglected the condition of these orthodox and persecuted creatures. Could not a subscription be raised, or a society be formed, for the relief of our grunting co-religionists? The question should really be taken up. Will no independent member ask a question about it in the House of Commons? Why, here is a grievance which might last a man for years, while the choicest hams of Thessaly would doubtless find their way to his table in return for his services to the animal whose person they adorned in life."

In a paper read at the Sheffield Conference, Dr. Drew said, "The time was evidently drawing near when the Church must rely more on her own power and less on the extraneous aid of the State; and, therefore, the sooner a good arrangement was made for the self-government of the Church the safer and better it would be." And he proceeded to suggest the necessity for a new translation of the Scriptures, a new arrangement of the Book of Common Prayer, and a voice for the laity, if not in the appointment, at least as to the continuance in office, of their clergyman. Strange to say, these revolutionary notions passed without a rebuke from the Archbishop who presided, and even seemed to find favour with the assembly.

In a visitation charge, the Archdeacon of Leicester, Mr. Fearon, has had the boldness to declare that the Irish Church question must not be looked at only from the Churchman's point of view. It has, he says, a political as well as a religious and ecclesiastical aspect, and "if well informed persons believe that no step can be taken towards conciliation while the Church question remains as it is," the Archdeacon "cannot conceive it unwise or un-Christian-like to submit, however reluctantly, to a change for the sake of that religious peace which the experience of 69 years appears to show cannot otherwise be obtained." Of course, he protests against the argument that the Churches of England and Ireland must stand or fall together, and we prophesy that before many months are over a good many ecclesiastics, who have been making free use of that argument, will be found hard at work in defence of the proposition that the English Establishment rests upon quite a distinct basis of its own, and need not in any way be affected by the downfall of the Irish Church.

A writer in the Guardian having spoken of the proposal to remove the damnable clauses from the Athanasian Creed, or to cease from enforcing the use of it as a "most harmful" scheme, and as "moving away from the old landmarks," another correspondent replies:

"The 'landmark' is certainly not a valuable one. It 'marks' a strange and sad period when a canticle was drawn up by an unknown author, to bear the name of one who did not write it. It 'marks' a tone, and spirit, and temper far more in accordance with the spirit displayed by our Lord's disciples when they would have called down fire from heaven, than with the spirit of Him whose book forbids us to judge or to avenge. It 'marks' a period when to denounce others was regarded as the essence of piety, instead of trying to draw them with the cords of love."

In a sermon at Preston on Sunday, Bishop Goss, of Liverpool, said, if the agitation for the disestablishment of the Irish Church had been delayed a little longer, the whole thing would have been done away with; whereas Mr. Gladstone had, in his bill, left sufficient for the Irish parsons to make mischief with. One great effect of the disestablishment bill would be to send over to this country the parsons of Ireland; and they had sufficient of them already. He would have been better pleased to have had the Irish Church question settled at once, for if the Irish parsons had to come over here there would be more ill-feeling than there was at present. The ill-feeling which raged in the country was owing to them, and he wished that Mr. Gladstone had put a rider to his bill to prohibit the Irish parsons from coming to this country. He was satisfied that the ministers of the Church of England would in the end, by the course they were pursuing, work mischief to England itself, and before fifty years was passed, the Established Church of this country would be dealt with in the same manner as Mr. Gladstone was dealing with Ireland. They were forcing it upon themselves through the clamour which they had raised against the Prime Minister.

The Pall Mall, after mentioning what the probable results would be if the Lords were to throw out the Irish Bill, asks:

"In what position would such a policy put the Irish Church itself? Is it possible to imagine a more undignified and wretched condition for any public body to be placed in than that of just retaining a sort of existence by the pleasure of a majority of the House of Lords? Can any one seriously contend that such a body could even plausibly profess to exercise any real moral or spiritual influence? The only intelligible conception of a national Church which can be formed is that the nation, as a whole, thinks it desirable to form an establishment for the purpose of teaching to the individual members of the nation the religious creed which, upon the whole, and exceptions excepted, they believe, and of celebrating the form of worship which they, subject to similar exceptions, prefer. The force of establishments is, no doubt, very great—so great that so long as they really represent in any moderate degree what they profess to represent, they may survive much which at first sight might appear altogether inconsistent with their existence." "The Established Church of Ireland never was in this position, or in any position even faintly resembling it. It was always the Church of a small minority which was once dominant and persecuting. It never had the least real pretension to a national character or any real hold upon the affections of the nation at large. This fact was always notorious. It has now been proved, and its truth has been solemnly recognised by the deliberate decision of a House which represents as fairly as a wide suffrage and perfectly free system of election can enable it to represent the nation at large. Is it possible to suppose that the smallest rag of credit can attach to such an institution, or that any one can derive any real advantage from its ministrations, when the prolongation of its existence is due solely to the vote of a majority, perhaps not a large majority, of peers in its favour?"

"Anglicanus," in the Pall Mall, after pointing out that the Irish Church Bill does not propose "disestablishment" in the sense of "abolition," and that a total separation from the State is not effected by it, shows that it is a mistake to suppose that it will leave the Irish Church entirely "free" to choose its own ritual, government, and doctrine without the intervention of other authority. He says:

"In at least two important respects, it leaves the Irish Church no liberty—on the contrary, it creates a new connection with the State, directly emanating from this measure. It creates, against the will of the Irish Church, a new representative body. This Church body, supposing it to 'disestablish' itself, and declare itself separate from the Church of England, would doubtless be 'free' to become Unitarian, Lutheran, or Roman Catholic. But it would not be 'free' to become Presbyterian. Many as are the reasons which might lead the Irish Church in the present crisis to discard episcopacy, the Bill will not permit this. Episcopacy is forced upon it by the iron hand of the State. Again, it is not 'free' to adopt such a synod as most modern Roman Catholics and most modern High Churchmen alone recognise as valid. It is not allowed to possess an exclusively clerical synod. It is forced to admit the laity. A body like the English Convocation or the Ecumenical Council of the Vatican is forbidden by Act of Parliament. The Bill prohibits the formation of any 'Church body' which does not admit the bishops (or their representatives) and the laity."

AMERICAN NOTES.

President Grant's Cabinet presents remarkable religious diversities. Attorney-General Hoar, and Secretary of the Treasury Boutwell are Unitarians; Secretary of State Fish is an Episcopalian (his immediate predecessor, Mr. Washburne, is a Universalist); Secretary of the Interior Cox is a Swedenborgian; Secretary of the Navy Borie is a Roman Catholic; Secretary of War Rawlins is associated with no particular faith, and Postmaster-General Creswell the same. General Grant's family are Methodists, and, though not himself a member of that denomination, he usually attends its ministrations.

A correspondent of the English Independent, who dates from New Hampshire, in describing New England customs at marriages and funerals, informs us that marriages may be solemnised in any place and at any hour. Many persons go to the house of the minister. Some prefer to be married at home, usually at the house of the bride, and occasionally a couple choose to be married in a church. But in a ministry of nineteen years he has had only one case of the last kind. Of the other marriages which he has solemnised rather more than half have been at his own house. When persons are married at their own homes, unless they are about to start on a wedding tour, it is usually in the evening.—Funerals, which are conducted with much form and ceremony, commonly take place on the second day after death, though sometimes delayed till the third day. Neighbours are on hand day and night to take care of the body, and to keep the face wet with spirits that it may be preserved from any tendency to decomposition, and may look well on the day of the funeral. At the church or chapel, the coffin is placed in front of the pulpit, and at the close of the services is opened, and those present are invited to take a last look at the corpse. This they do, passing up one aisle and down another. Then the mourners are called forward three or four at a time, beginning with those most distantly related, and ending with the nearest relatives of the deceased. The coffin is then closed, and borne to the grave. No services of any kind are conducted there, except in the case of Freemasons, Odd Fellows, and Good Templars. In a majority of cases the whole of the services are held at the house of the deceased. In connection with these, in country districts, a funeral sermon is expected, whether the deceased be a child or an adult, a Christian or otherwise. While such a practice may give some an opportunity of hearing the Gospel that are not in the habit of attending public worship, the sermon is too apt to take pretty much the character of a eulogy of the dead; and it is sometimes said that "all ministers are Universalists when they attend funerals." This reminds us of a story which we have met with somewhere of Dr. Bentley, of Salem. He was famous at funerals for his habit of preaching or praying everybody into heaven, whether they had led good or bad lives; and when an old sinner of ninety years was removed, and the Doctor was called on to attend him to the grave, people wondered what could possibly be said in his favour. The Doctor was equal to the emergency, however; in his discourse he remarked that, according to Scripture, the wicked did not live out half their days, and as Scripture could not lie, and as old Mr. So-and-So had lived out considerably more than half his days, ergo, he could not have been a wicked man.

A correspondent of the Tribune, a short time since, expressed his dislike for one of the Baptist usages in these terms:

"Here, on bitter cold days, with the thermometer at zero, the rough rivers hid in thick ice are bared with axe and spade, and the converts—often sweet young girls of tender age—are plunged in. As we see them struggling in evident fear and agony, shrinking from their water-soaked garments which freeze about them, we can but ask if this be imitating the blessed Master. Instinctively we ask, Had Christ preached and baptised in this climate, would he who healed the sick have risked the life of the body to purge out the innocent stains of girlhood?"

In reply, the Examiner and Chronicle says:

"We have reason to suppose that the blessed Master knew all about the temperature of the Adirondack region when he gave the commission commanding his followers to give baptism 'in all the world' to them that believe." And furthermore, "the history of such baptisms proves that the blessed Master knew as much about the laws of health as he did about the temperatures of the world." And to finish off the critic it is suggested that very likely he doesn't wash himself so much as he should; for "Nobody in ordinary health is injured by a cold water bath; and if our critic were to try one himself we have no doubt that it would do him good both in his temper and his health. We advise him to ask these sweet young girls to whom he so commiseratingly refers, what they think of a cold water baptism. It might teach him some lessons as to the effects of very cold water that would be of service to him."

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher returns his income for the present year at 21,175 dollars.

According to the New York Tribune, witchcraft persecutions are being revived in Mexico. Women are hanged, shot, and burned to death on suspicion, or flogged until they confess, their own children taking part in the infliction of the torture.

Doctor Horace Bushnell is engaged in the preparation of a work which will assuredly attract attention just now, and procure for its author a great deal of sympathy—for he is certain to be well abused. "Woman Suffrage, or the Reform against Nature," is the defiant title he gives it.

MINISTERS' SALARIES.

At the recent meeting of the Congregational Union there was an animated discussion on the proposal to form a Sustentation Fund, in the course of which the Rev. Fnoch Mellor made some remarks which are applicable beyond the borders of his own denomination. "What," he asked, "are the facts of the case? I know it is said that this is a very delicate question. Well, if it be a delicate question, it is only so because it is a delicate thing for us to live. What is the use of talking about it being a delicate question? It means whether a man who is a minister shall live or not. It means that, and it means nothing less; and when it comes to mean that, we must bear in mind that in regard to our ministry as in regard to the point to which the apostle refers, that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural. It is well that we should bear in mind that disembodied spirits—I mean the disembodied spirits of men—have no vocation in this world; that we only work here in virtue of a physical footing, and the moment we get lodged from that footing we shall be independent in the double sense. I rise simply for the purpose of saying, therefore, that as long as our people have ministers whom they love and honour they ought to support them as ministers whom they love and honour. It should not be forgotten that there are many of our ministers at the present time who are running a very swift race indeed with the fear of debt and all that comes out of debt. They have never the fear of debt away from their eyes or from their hearts; and it is perfectly impossible for a soul that is impressed and oppressed as with a nightmare to do the work of God as the work of God should be done. There are many of our ministers who are receiving the salaries which they received thirty years ago—receiving the same salaries they received at the time when the expense of living was certainly twenty per cent. cheaper than it is at the present time; they are receiving the same salaries from people who in the meantime have grown from cottages to large houses, or who have grown from large houses to mansions, and have set up their carriages and barouches and all the rest of it—people who had been in an exceedingly humble condition of life, and who are now verging upon being millionaires. And they look upon the same men who have ministered to them and to their children for thirty years, and do not give them a farthing more. Now, we must not speak of this in a mealy-mouthed manner. I say it is a simple injustice and wrong. Meanwhile you will hear them say when you visit them, ‘Our minister has a first-rate managing wife. How she manages I cannot understand.’ I say no fellow can understand it. ‘They were there thirty years ago without a child, and there they are now perhaps with six children at least, all of them requiring the very ordinary and vulgar things in the shape of clothing, and support for the inner man, and education; but he has got a very managing wife, and I do not know how she manages.’ I say whenever there is a mystery like that that occurs to any of our wealthy people they had better not try to solve it, but send the minister something extra; leave the metaphysics and how she manages it, and attend to the physics. Well, then there is another thing. We must not forget sometimes complaints are made with regard to some of our brethren that they do not keep pace with the age. Many of our young people of good families and of good education of course are au courant with all that is going on at the present time in the way of literature and science, while perhaps they do not quite discover that their minister is au courant with these things. And they will say to each other, ‘Oh, he does not keep pace with the age.’ How can he keep pace with the age if he cannot get books? and how can he get them unless he either begs, borrows, steals, or buys them? Beg them he cannot in many cases, borrow them he cannot in many cases, we will not suppose that an honourable man will steal, and he has not the means to buy. Now, it would be a first-rate thing if our people would not only attend to the business that I have referred to, but if they would attend also to this one point—the supplying of their minister with a true literature, and they may depend upon it that they will receive ample for all they do. I will only refer to one other point. Complaints are very often made on account of the exceedingly migratory character of our ministers. They are first in one place and then in another, and then in another. Heavy condemnations are sometimes rained upon their poor heads, but the fact of the case is that very often this is traceable simply to the people. It is not that the ministers wish to leave their people. They would wish to live and die with them; but they cannot live with them, that is all; and they do not want to die with them quite so soon. And hence they go and live elsewhere, and die in a good old age. But frequently the remark is made, ‘Why, here he was amongst the most loving people; they nearly worshipped him.’ Well, I wish they had treated him a little more as worshippers in that case. And frequently when a man has borne the iron in his soul as long as he can, when he has borne it patiently for months and years, and sometimes, as I know, the poor man has not known what the term ‘butcher’s meat’ has been from month to month, nor his children either, and when the man has found that he was in danger of getting into debt, and compromising his character, and has at length been invited to another people, then the people have at once said, ‘Ay, we should have liked to have retained you; we are very sorry. Why didn’t you mention it to us?’ ‘Mention it! Why didn’t you see it?’ The fact is, that if there were as little thought in the business which some men conduct as they give to this question, as to the support of their ministers, there is not a business in the country that would be able to keep itself going for six months. And then sometimes the tardy and too-late offer will come, ‘If you will remain amongst us we will increase your salary £50 a year.’ But he says—‘No, I cannot do it now. If you had said that two months ago it would have been done; but I have borne it and can bear it no longer. And besides, I have entered into negotiations with another people and am going.’ Can anyone say that he is doing wrong? Is the man doing wrong to escape debt? Is he doing wrong to escape a place in which he cannot afford to live without debt? He is doing right; he would be doing wrong if he were to remain; and the charge of mercenariness, which is sometimes thoughtlessly brought against such a man, is a charge utterly false and mean. I suppose there is hardly a man in any other trade or profession—I do not call this either a trade or a profession—who, if he found he could receive £100 a year more for the support of himself, his wife, and family, who were inadequately supported, would not leave Leeds for London, or London for Leeds, or London for Edinburgh, or one town for any other town. And why should a minister be brought under suspicion of mercenariness because he does the same thing, not for the purpose merely of an increase of salary, but that he may live and die as an honest man. I submit that this is a question that we ought not to speak about in a mealy-mouthed manner. Honest speech is the only true speech upon it.”

THE PROGRESS OF RELIGIOUS EQUALITY ABROAD.

THE struggle on the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church has so absorbed the attention of writers and readers in England, that movements abroad which, under any other circumstances, would have been watched with eager curiosity have been hardly noticed. Spain, which, until this year has been the closest preserve of Romish priestcraft, the one country in Europe in which men could be haled to prison for meeting together in a private house to read the Bible, has pronounced for the toleration of all sects by an immense majority of the Cortes. That there is, on this account, any special hope for Protestantism, as we understand it, we hardly dare affirm. Such a sway as Catholicism has had there too often breeds a bitter, though silent, hatred of all religion, and there were not wanting signs in the recent debates of the Cortes that the strongest feeling on the liberal side is of this nature. Still, anything is better than the state of things which previously prevailed, and if only a really earnest party for reformed religion springs up among the Spaniards themselves, so that they are not left to the tender mercies of foreign Evangelical emissaries, there will be great ground for hopefulness.

Nor is Spain the only illustration of the progress of religious liberty on the Continent. At the last Reichsrath the Emperor of Austria was able to congratulate his subjects upon the full accomplishment of religious toleration. Says the Liberator, in its admirable summary of these signs of the times—

“The battle in Austria has been fierce and prolonged, and has extended to education, as well as to the purely religious question. Everywhere, however, the opponents of freedom have been obliged to give way, and an Austrian Protestant may even bury his dead in any churchyard with any religious rites—which is more than a Protestant Dissenter can do in England. In France, in view of the General Election, several candidates, the most conspicuous being M. Laboulaye, have raised the standard of separation of Church and State, and, in the towns at least, the enunciation of this principle is heard, not merely without surprise, but with intense satisfaction. The King of Sweden has also, within the last month, proclaimed his intention of extending the bounds of religious liberty; while—jumping across the Continent—the Sultan of Turkey is reported to have disendowed the Mahomedan church of the whole of its landed property.”

Perhaps the most interesting to us, however, as allied to the very measure which at home is exciting such vehement denunciation, are the steps by which, one by one, our colonies are adopting the principle of religious equality, and reducing, or rather raising, the Episcopal Church to its true position as a free, self-dependent, self-governing religious community. How far this has been carried in Canada, Australia, and New Zealand is matter of history, and some interesting testimonies in favour of voluntarism have come from Churchmen, who know from personal observation how much the religious life and activity of their church has been strengthened where it has been thus thrown upon its own resources and intrinsic power. It has not, however, been so widely known that the late Ministry adopted last year the measure, brought forward in 1867 by an independent member, for discontinuing, as the present incumbents die off, the grants which have heretofore been made out of the Consolidated Fund to the bishops and clergy of the Church of England in Jamaica and the other West India Islands. This is, it is true, only a partial disendowment, to the extent of about £20,000 a year, a still larger sum being levied upon the inhabitants of the colonies themselves. Thus, in Jamaica about £28,000 is annually charged on the general revenue of the island, exacted from all parties alike, for the salaries of the Episcopalian clergy and the repair of their churches and parsonages, though it is notorious that the episcopalians are not a twentieth of the coloured Christians, and if a larger proportion are also by far the wealthiest of the English residents. But the example of disendowment is catching. The Governor has already thrown on the congregations charges to the extent of about £10,000, which used to be met by an annual grant of the Assembly; and as the Jamaica Clergy Act, in virtue of which the permanent appropriations take place, expires this year, it is hardly likely that it will be renewed.

In the Bahamas, too, the persistent efforts of the friends of voluntarism have at last come to a successful result. For two years a Disendowment Bill had been passed by large majorities in the House of Assembly, but afterwards thrown out in the upper House,—“the Legislative Council.” This year, however, the Council, with a wise discretion, have passed the bill with a few unimportant modifications, and the dominancy of the Anglican establishment there, after enduring for more than a century, has come to a close.

And now, who will be the greatest gainers by these changes? We verily believe, the Anglican Church itself. There is abundance of vitality and power in that Church both at home and abroad, if once it be emancipated from the enfeebling position of a favoured and yet dependent sect. It is a bad thing for a man to be born with a silver spoon in his mouth—a still worse thing for a church. Let the Anglican Church, whether at home or abroad, be placed on the same level as all other religious communities, and we believe it will develop a vigour such as it has never known since it lost in the fatal year 1662 the impetus which it had gained from the Reformation.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.—The Rev. John Page Hopps, of Dukinfield, has accepted a very cordial invitation from the St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow, to succeed the Rev. Henry W. Crosskey as its pastor, and is expected to commence his duties upon the first Sunday in October. The Rev. H. W. Crosskey will commence his ministry in the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on Sunday, August 8th.

Rev. John James Tayler, B. A.

OUR Obituary this week contains the name of one whose departure we record with no ordinary feelings of sorrow, and whose loss will not only sadden many hearts besides our own, but be deeply felt through all our churches. We need hardly say that we refer to the Rev. John James Tayler. We are not in a position to furnish such a memoir of this excellent man as would do aught like justice to him, and must content ourselves with simply giving a few particulars of his life, and briefly noticing the leading features of his character.

Born at Nottingham in the year 1798, he received a careful training from his father, who was the respected minister of the High Pavement congregation in that town, and likewise conducted a school with great ability and success. In 1814 he went well prepared to the college at York, where he spent two Sessions, and then proceeded to the University of Glasgow, and in 1818 took the degree there of Bachelor of Arts. Soon after this, during Mr. Kenrick's absence in Germany, he was engaged to supply his place for a Session as Assistant Classical Tutor, at York, which he did to the entire satisfaction of the college authorities. This was an evidence that his scholarship must have been considerable even then, and that the foundation was laid for those acquirements which were subsequently turned to such valuable use. In after-life, amidst all his various avocations, his classical reading was still kept up, and, as he said to us not very long ago, he was "old-fashioned enough to think that there were few better exercises for the training of the mind than was afforded by the study of the best Greek and Roman authors."

In 1820, young as he still was, Mr. Tayler was called to undertake the responsible, and in some respects difficult, charge of the Mosley-street congregation in Manchester, which afterwards removed to the beautiful chapel in Upper Brook-street; and rarely has a minister made for himself so sure a place as he did in the hearts of his people. Although he was not what is usually termed a popular preacher, there was such a tone of earnest sincerity, such a devout and tender spirit in his pulpit services as could not fail to render them impressive. While the refined taste, pure thought, and accurate knowledge by which his discourses were characterised rendered them acceptable to men of high cultivation, such as the late Dr. Henry and Mr. George William Wood, there was at the same time a simplicity of expression combined with fervour of feeling which made them attractive also to the less instructed among his hearers; and in his pastoral intercourse with them, his sweet affectionateness of nature and ever-ready sympathy secured their confidence and love, and not seldom from some of them have we listened to warm and grateful recollections of his kindness in times of suffering and sorrow.

In the great subject of education our friend at all times took a deep and lively interest, and so long as he remained in Manchester the Lower Mosley-street Schools, which hold so high a rank among schools of their class, were largely indebted to his judicious counsel and active assistance. Soon after his settlement he became a member of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, and in a little time, his acquirements becoming known, he was elected to the office of one of its Secretaries, and then in a few years to that of a Vice-President, with Dr. Dalton as the President.

Although Mr. Tayler came forward but seldom in public, he was always warmly interested, as a true Englishman, in whatever measures, social or political, had a bearing on the general weal, and his opinion and advice were often of essential service to those who were engaged in the promotion of them. That it was not through any timid regard to consequences or fear of reproach that he did not take a more prominent part was strikingly shown in the year 1834, when, against the decided feeling of some of his most intimate friends, he felt it his duty to attend a public meeting of Dissenters called to consider what steps should be taken for the removal of their grievances, and in a bold and eloquent speech seconded the first resolution which declared, "That in the deliberate opinion of the meeting all civil establishments of religion were an infringement of the rights of conscience, at variance with the spirit and opposed to the progress of Christianity."

With scarcely any interruption, except during the year 1835, which he spent in Germany, Mr. Tayler's connection with Manchester New College extended over fifty years. From 1822 to 1840, with the exception just mentioned, he filled the office of Secretary, and for the last four years of this period that likewise of Public Examiner. When the institution was brought back from York to Manchester, in 1840, he was chosen Professor of Ecclesiastical History, with which was afterwards combined Doctrinal and Practical Theology, and the Truths and Evidences of Christianity; and in 1853, when the College was transferred to London, he was appointed to the Principalship as well. How faithfully he discharged the duties of this important office, combining with it for a time the charge of the Little Portland-street congregation in a joint-ministry with his friend Mr. Martineau, is so well known throughout our body as to make it unnecessary for us to dwell upon it. His high character and varied learning, united with his fine taste and kindly disposition, admirably fitted him to exert a favourable influence over his students, and we feel sure there is not one who came under his care that can help looking back with feelings of gratitude for the benefits derived from the almost parental interest which he took in their improvement, and that does not deeply grieve with us for his loss.

That loss is too recent, and our sorrow at the removal of one of our oldest and dearest friends too deep, for us to attempt anything like a minute and laboured analysis of his character. We can unhesitatingly say, he was one of the best and purest-minded men that it has ever been our privilege to be intimate with. To know him was to love him. Possessed of an almost feminine tenderness of nature, his sympathy was ever ready both for joy and for sorrow. With perfect truth it might have been affirmed of him that he had attained what the Apostle declares to be the end of the commandment, "Charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned." With something of the guileless simplicity of a child, he united a manly strength of purpose in maintaining what he believed to be true, and in carrying out what he held to be right; and though usually most gentle both in word and deed, he easily warmed up into a fine glow of indignant feeling against injustice, and an eloquent denunciation of wrong. Both in spirit and in conduct he seemed to us a true follower of him whom he looked up to as his Master; and for ourselves we may say that we never came away from intercourse with him without feeling that we had gained some good. He showed in a remarkable manner how the utmost freedom of thought on theological matters may be combined with the deepest reverence, and the devoutest sentiment, and the holiest trust. His religion was indeed "that of the heart, in the spirit and not in the letter," running through and colouring every part of his life; and its strength and depth were thoroughly proved by the way in which it sustained and upheld him when he was called to part with his only son, just as he was entering on the exercise of an honourable profession, full of promise, and well nigh assured of high success.

Mr. Tayler's large knowledge gave him a breadth of view and a catholicity of spirit which are sadly too often wanting in professed theologians, and his candour at times was so great, and his anxiety to present fairly the opinions of those who differed with him so sincere, as almost to prevent him from doing full justice to his own. His conclusions, however, were formed in a thoroughly independent and conscientious manner, and he rested with the firmest reliance on the conviction that truth, under the government of the God of truth, must always tend to good, and in this persuasion he ever freely and fearlessly declared what seemed to him the truth.

Besides contributing many valuable articles to our periodical literature, Mr. Tayler was the author of a considerable number of single sermons, preached on various public occasions, and a volume of discourses, entitled "Christian Aspects of Faith and Duty," which, as they well deserved, came to a second edition; a critical Essay on the "Authenticity of the Gospel of St. John," the spirit of which every one must admire, whatever judgment may be formed regarding its conclusions; and "A Retrospect of the Religious Life of England." The last of these, the longest and most important of Mr.

Tayler's publications, which has likewise reached a second edition, made his name widely known beyond the limits of his own denomination, and the late Lord Melbourne read it with such interest and pleasure that, in conversation with a friend, he expressed his regret that it was out of his power to make the author a Bishop.

One of the latest services which he rendered to our Churches was in representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at the Unitarian Tercentenary Festival in Hungary, last autumn, which he did in so able and satisfactory a manner, and of which he afterwards gave such a graphic and interesting account.

From the period when he resigned the charge of it, in 1853, Mr. Tayler was in the habit of paying his old congregation in Manchester a visit at the opening of each year, and the services which he then conducted were always looked forward to as truly seasons of spiritual refreshing. At the beginning of the present year, though some signs were noticed that time was telling upon him, it was pleasant to see what a lively interest he displayed in everything that was doing in the social and religious world, and how hopefully he looked forward to the future. His was not the "sad philosophy of age," but the calm, confiding, cheerful outlook that befits the Christian, which made this, as he once said to us, the happiest period, perhaps, of his life. Sorrowful though we must needs be that we shall see his face here no more, we cannot but feel thankful that he was taken from us with so little suffering, and that the last remembrance which he has left with us should be so bright and encouraging to dwell upon.

Mr. S. C. Kell, of Bradford.

MR. SAMUEL COPELAND KELL, the senior partner in the firm of Messrs. Kell and Co., stuff merchants, of Bradford, died on Friday morning last at his residence, North Park Lodge, Manningham, near Bradford, at the age of 57 years, from bronchitis. He was the son of the Rev. Robert Kell, Unitarian minister, of Birmingham, where he was born in 1812, and also was the brother of the Rev. E. Kell, M.A., of Southampton. First entering mercantile life in Birmingham, he subsequently joined his brother-in-law, Mr. F. Schwan, at Huddersfield. In 1849, the firm, under the designation of Schwan, Kell, and Co., removed to Bradford, and since Mr. Schwan retired, some years ago, the business has been carried on under the firm of Kell and Co. Mr. Kell did not take any active personal part in either municipal affairs or national politics, though, as an ardent Liberal of the advanced school, he took a deep interest in all the important political questions of his time, and exerted his influence, both by his pen and his purse, to forward the great cause which was so dear to him. His views on political and social topics were enunciated, whenever the occasion required, in letters in local newspapers and in pamphlets, with a clearness and vigour which could not fail to advance the principles which he espoused. He was of a benevolent and generous disposition, and gave liberally to every effort for promoting the welfare of his less fortunate fellow-townsmen. He was a warm and enlightened friend of education. One of the chief founders of the Bradford Female Education Institute, he devoted both much time and money in efforts to extend its usefulness among that section of the population for whom it was designed. He also took an active share in establishing the Bradford Working Men's Club. In fact, he has on all occasions shown his deep sympathy with the industrial orders, by his personal sacrifices in aid of exertions to effect their moral and social elevation. As a member of our denomination, he contributed liberally towards the erection of the new chapel which was opened at Bradford yesterday, and his removal has cast a gloom over what would otherwise have been an occasion only for congratulation and joy. Mr. Kell married, in December, 1852, Catherine Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. William Cross, of Wakefield, and leaves a widow and family of eight young children. He was interred at Undercliffe Cemetery on Tuesday last.

STOKE NEWINGTON: THE LATE REV. J. J. TAYLER.—Next Sunday morning a sermon, in memory of the Rev. J. J. Tayler, will be preached by the Rev. J. K. Applebee, at Stoke Newington Green.

TRINITY SUNDAY AT RYDAL CHURCH.

Our happy lot being cast for a few Whitsun holidays amongst the lakes and mountains, we resolved to attend morning service at the church where Wordsworth worshipped for so long a series of years, and where Dr. Arnold, when enjoying at his beloved Fox How a few weeks of rest from school-keeping cares, was wont to be found, either as a humble hearer, or a devout and earnest expounder of the truth. Many of our readers will doubtless know the edifice—poor and quaint in style, like most of the churches in this charming district, but lacking the interest which great antiquity imparts to many. It lies under the stately ancestral hall and leafy woods of Rydal, the residence of the Flemings, and almost at the foot of the house which Wordsworth's long residence has made one of the chief lions of the lake country. There was everything to prepossess and to charm in the contemplation of a religious service, under conditions so unique and interesting. True, it was one of the days when the creed of St. Athanasius is ordered and appointed to be read in all churches as by law established in England; but, under the circumstances, this was a difficulty easy to mitigate, if not to surmount. Arriving some minutes before the usual time for service, we were surprised to see no signs of a gathering congregation. On a tombstone some lads were disporting themselves in a manner, to say the least, unrestrained. Presently we were taken to a pew—on our progress down the aisle casting side glances, as we wondered which had been the seat of the great poet? Certainly, for some following ten minutes, not so many worshippers entered; but in the course of a quarter of an hour or so after the appointed time, the clergyman bustled in,—a short, stout, sturdy man, who made more than one perceptible failure before, by an extra gymnastic effort, he obtained an entrance through the narrow doorway of the pulpit. Then, giving out a hymn, the service at length was begun. A harmonium, bad in tone, out of tune, and played most wretchedly, gave some faint outline of the air intended to be sung, and the voices of two girls and a man led the music,—part-singing being obviously ignored. But, unsteady from the first, the unhappy performer seemed to become more and more nervous,—in the second verse floundered in desperation among the keys—and, in the third, the instrument was abandoned to its solitary moanings even by the singers—accustomed, as it must be presumed they were, to its hapless vagaries. Such was the execution of the opening hymn; and we wondered how we should fare when the chanting came—a groundless apprehension, as nothing of the kind was even attempted! The service was not so much read, as shot out, in sharp, rattling, rifle-like style, from the capacious chest of the minister,—with what it would be hardly uncharitable to designate, as a merely perfunctory regard to the requirements of the occasion. But the sermon was his crowning effort. Having just read the creed of St. Athanasius, he proceeded to expound and defend its cardinal doctrine of the Trinity. He traced it even in the early records of the Hebrew faith; and told us that it was quite a mistake to suppose that the ancient Jews were in any respect in sympathy with the modern Unitarians. In the Old Testament lesson of the day, did we not find the plural form?—"let us make man," &c., And were we to suppose that the frequent recurrence of thrice-repeated words was a mere accident, and not intended to reveal the mystery of the Trinity? No, all such verses as "Holy, holy, holy Lord God of Sabaoth," were an undoubted evidence that the idea of the triple unity of the Divine Being had presented itself to prophets and psalmists of old! And so on throughout a sermon which had no redeeming feature but its brevity, and soon ended the service which is provided by the Established Church, as a means of maintaining an impressive ritual—of dissipating erroneous doctrine—promoting intelligent faith—and spreading piety and morality amongst the people.

For ourselves, regarding the slovenliness and inertness of the reading and sermon alike, we couldn't but feel that, of two extremes, we should infinitely prefer the ornate decoration and elaborate appointments of Ritualism, to such a sample of Low Churchism as it had been our misfortune to witness. With one good property alone could we credit it,—that it seemed to quicken our appreciation and love for the simple arrangements and rational doctrines of Unitarian worship—to kindle a thankfulness of heart that it was our happy lot to participate, with each recurring day of rest, in something far more satisfactory alike to mind and soul—and to send us back with a strengthened resolve, to work for and abide to the end by the faith we have adopted—unpopular and unestablished though it be.

THE FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

On Tuesday evening (a correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette writes), a very remarkable gathering, remarkable partly on account of the objects sought to be obtained, and partly in consequence of the persons who took part in it, was held in Freemasons' Hall, London, which was densely crowded by what was evidently a highly intellectual assembly, most of the persons present belonging to the upper middle classes. It was a public devotional service in connection with a newly-formed "Free Christian Union," the design of which is "to illustrate the spirit of unsectarian Christianity, to furnish the means of undogmatic religious instruction, and to incorporate the discoveries of learning and science in the religious view of the world." At half-past seven o'clock, the time appointed for the commencement of the proceedings, four gentlemen, all habited in black robes, mounted the platform. They were the Rev. Athanasius Coquerel, pastor of the French Protestant Church; the Rev. James Martineau, Unitarian minister of Little Portland-street Chapel; the Rev. Wm. Miall, Baptist minister, Dalston; and the Rev. C. Kegan Paul, M.A., of Exeter College, Oxford, vicar of Sturminster Marshall, Dorset. Mr. Martineau conducted the preliminary service, commencing with some sentences, the first of which was "God is love." Then followed some prayers, taken from the Liturgy of the Church of England, but "adapted" to the purposes of the meeting. Next was sung Charles Wesley's hymn, "The saints on earth and those above." Mr. Martineau read as a first lesson some passages from the 11th and 12th chapters of Isaiah, and as a second lesson from the 13th chapter of St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians. A chant and one or two prayers followed. Mr. Coquerel then delivered a sermon in French. He selected for his text the 10th chapter of St. Luke's Gospel, verse 47: "But one thing is needful." He pointed out that the great beauty of Christianity consisted in its universality, and contended that as soon as that great principle was lost sight of its distinctiveness was gone. Without it all must be misery and sadness, leading to endless divisions and irritations. An extempore prayer was offered up by Mr. Miall, the Baptist minister, after which Mr. Paul, the Church of England clergyman, delivered a sermon founded on the twenty-fourth chapter of St. Luke's Gospel, part of verse 6—"He is not dead, but is risen." He said that after the early teaching of the Gospel, and after Christ was missed from the tomb where his followers expected to find him, sacramental rites grew up, and in these some men thought they found Christ. At the Reformation the stone was rolled away from another sepulchre, and men began to ask how they could get at the Lord who had been hidden under such multitudinous forms; indeed, it was doubted whether God could be found in a written word. As it was an error of the Catholics of old to put Christ in visible signs and ceremonies, so it was an error of later Protestants to limit the knowledge and action of him to a book. They could never confine Christ or God between two covers of a book, holy and precious as that book might be. God had written His word in science and in humanity, for science was a canon which could never be closed. It was no longer possible to imprison truth in an article or to bury it in a text. The dicta, "Extra ecclesiam nulla salus," and "the Bible, and the Bible alone is the religion of Protestants," were now no longer applicable to the advancing state of knowledge. Those who had joined the new Society read the Scriptures under an entirely different light from that which the Church supplied, and it was sometimes asked how it was that they could consistently hold their positions in the Church, instead of going out boldly into the pure Theism which Christ taught. It was because they believed that Christ was a symbolical name for collective humanity, which they understood to be God. He did not think that at any time men would be able to dispense altogether with all rites, or with spoken words which had been allowed by the use of ages, still he saw no need why the religion of the future should unduly clash with the religion of the past. A change was passing over the character of religion, and men had now to decide whether they would accept a faith in opposition to or in harmony with nature, science, progress, light. Some of them were thankful to remain in a church which had given them spiritual life, but others would be inclined to go out in order that they might be free to worship God on the open hill-side of thought. Whither God might lead them in the future none of them could at present see. They would form themselves into a body of Christian men striving to do God's will, following out His plans as the women followed Jesus—God as they thought him—to Galilee.—Mr. Paul then pronounced the benediction. During the prayers no one knelt, but all stood up during the hymns and chants. All reference to the Trinity was struck out of the prayers.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

FALLEN LEAVES AND NEW BUDS.

THE morning came with mist of grey,
That gathered on each leafless spray,
And hung in pearl-drops from each point,
Projecting knob, and bend, and joint,—
Then fell, one here, one there, not slow,
Down on the fallen leaves below,
As if the parent-tree kept on
Weeping its children, dead and gone.

I marked them forming pure and bright,
I heard them dash away from sight,
O'er all the tree, on every spray
They hung like gems of purest ray,
Then fell, one here, one there, not slow,
Down on the fallen leaves below,
As if the parent-tree kept on
Weeping its children, dead and gone.

Another morning came, and there
The tree stood lone and still and bare;
A bitter, biting morn and keen,
So bleak and cold seemed all the scene;
The sky was dark, the wind was dumb,
The ground was hard, the tree looked numb;
It wept not now the fallen leaf,
It seemed as if beyond all grief.

Stiff, stript its limbs were, as in death;
I could not hear the faintest breath;
I looked—no movement met the eye,
I looked and listened—not a sigh:
The sky looked cold and hard and dark
Down on the tree, still, stript, and stark;
It wept not now the fallen leaf,
It seemed as if beyond all grief.

Soon from that darkened sky the snow
Began in flakes to fall below,
As soft as down, o'er all the tree,
O'er all the lawn, o'er all the lea;
The intervening flakes of white
Quick-falling, hid the tree from sight;
But when they ceased there stood, not sad,
The tree, with snowy mantle clad.

'Twas beautiful! the foliage white!
The pure white snow, so soft and light!
Sent down from heaven in time of dearth
To clothe the naked of the earth!
And graceful drooped the tree, o'erpowered
With so much good in season showered:
Lowly it stood and calm, not sad,
The tree, with snowy mantle clad.

Another morning came, and then
I looked upon the tree again;
The snow was gone, the mantle doffed,
A breeze was blowing mild and soft.
The tree had passed a stormy night,
And at the dawning of the light
I saw beneath its shadows strawn
Some rotten branches on the lawn.

It was a night of wind and rain,
A tempest from the western main;
I fancied, as I heard it blow,
I saw the boughs sway to and fro,
Tossed up and down, dashed, drenched, and rent,
Yet there it stood, nor reft, nor bent,
Only beneath its shade lay strawn
Some rotten branches on the lawn.

Ere long the birds commenced their hymn,
The sap its way felt thro' each limb,
A purple bloom came on each spray,
A haze of green another day;
And as the brighter days came on
The fresh and tender leaflet shone,
Till once again, o'er sunny leas,
The full leaf fluttered in the breeze.

Our joys fall off like yellow leaves,
The fond heart misses them and grieves.
We have our days of mist and tears,
Our days of dull and numbing fears,
Our times of cold and silent woe,
Our times of soothing, heavenly snow,
Our mornings when the storm gone by,
The bud peeps forth into the sky.

Thus round and round the seasons run,
Thro' mist and snow, thro' shower and sun;
From leaflessness to the full leaf,
Not always joy, not always grief:
One thing is needful, man or tree
All sound at heart each needs must be.
Then come the fall, then come the cold,
New buds will blow where bloomed the old.

JOHN DAVIES.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XX.

AN UNGALLANT SAINT.

In his "History of European Morals," after mentioning that with many of the hermits never to look upon the face of a woman was esteemed a great merit, and that St. John of Lycopolis had not seen one for forty-eight years, Mr. Lecky relates the following: "A young Roman girl made a pilgrimage from Italy to Alexandria, to look upon the face and obtain the prayers of St. Arsenius, into whose presence she forced herself. Quailing beneath his rebuffs, she flung herself at his feet, imploring him with tears to grant her only request—to remember her, and to pray for her. 'Remember you!' cried the indignant saint; 'it shall be the prayer of my life that I may forget you.' The poor girl sought consolation from the Archbishop of Alexandria, who comforted her by assuring her that though she belonged to the sex by which demons commonly tempt saints, he doubted not the hermit would pray for her soul, though he would try to forget her face."

PATRISTIC VIEWS OF HAIR-DRESSING.

Speaking of the disposition on the part of moralists to single out some new form of luxury, or some trivial custom which they regarded as indecorous, for the most extravagant denunciation, the same writer says: "If we were to measure the degree of criminality of the different customs of the time by the vehemence of the patristic denunciations, we might almost conclude that the most atrocious of their day was the custom of wearing false hair, or dyeing natural hair. Clement of Alexandria questioned whether the validity of certain ecclesiastical ceremonies might not be affected by wigs; for, he asked, when the priest is placing his hand on the head of the person who kneels before him, if that hand is resting upon false hair, who is it he is really blessing? Tertullian shuddered at the thought that Christians might have the hair of those who were in hell upon their heads, and he found in the tiers of false hair that were in use a distinct rebellion against the assertion that no one can add to his stature, and in the custom of dyeing the hair a contravention of the declaration that a man cannot make one hair white or black. Centuries rolled away. The Roman empire tottered to its fall, and floods of vice and sorrow overspread the world; but still the denunciations of the Fathers were unabated. St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, and St. Gregory Nazianzen continued with uncompromising vehemence the war against false hair, which Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria had begun."

SAINTLY BEASTS.

Among legends describing the moral qualities existing in animals, Mr. Lecky gives these, which are not without a certain whimsical beauty: "A hermit was accustomed to share his supper with a wolf, which, one evening entering the cell before the return of the master, stole a loaf of bread. Struck with remorse, it was a week before it ventured again to visit the cell; and when it did so, its head hung down, and its whole demeanour manifested the most profound contrition. The hermit 'stroked with a gentle hand its bowed down head,' and gave it a double portion as a token of forgiveness. A lioness knelt down with lamentations before another saint, and then led him to its cub, which was blind, but which received its sight at the prayer of the saint. Next day the lioness returned, bearing the skin of a wild beast as a token of its gratitude. Nearly the same thing happened to St. Macarius of Alexandria; a hyena knocked at his door, brought its young, which was blind, and which the saint restored to sight, and repaid the obligation soon afterwards by bringing a fleece of wool. 'O hyena!' said the saint, 'how did you obtain this fleece? you must have stolen and eaten a sheep.' Full of shame, the hyena hung its head down, but persisted in offering its gift, which, however, the holy man refused to receive till the hyena 'had sworn' to cease for the future to rob. The hyena bowed its head in token of its acceptance of the oath, and St. Macarius afterwards gave the fleece to St. Melania."

HELPS TO A SAINT.

The three companions of St. Colman were a cock, a mouse, and a fly. The cock announced the hour of devotion, the mouse bit the ear of the drowsy saint till he got up, and if in the course of his studies he was afflicted by any wandering thoughts, or called away by other business, the fly alighted on the line where he had left off and kept the place.

AN EPISCOPAL DIFFICULTY.

From a statement which appears in the New York Herald, we learn that the feeling of the Fathers on the subject of hair, as shown in the second of the foregoing extracts, exists to some extent, in certain quarters, even at present. Some person, described as a "Washington beau," was to receive confirmation at the hands of the Bishop of New Jersey. But, in some way or other, the bishop discovered that the brilliant youth was not altogether a work of nature, and particularly the abundant hair on his head, for which he was indebted to the wig-maker. Now, according to the rites of the Episcopal Church, says the statement, a bishop cannot lay hands on an artificial head-piece. It must be all natural, or he cannot rightfully perform the confirmation. The young man, in consequence, not only lost the privilege of Episcopal confirmation, but likewise a wife; for a young and beautiful lady, who had promised to marry him when he should have duly avowed himself of the orthodox aristocratic faith, now refuses! It is a hard case, and apparently without remedy, for the "canons of the Church" and the predilections of the lady are equally rigorous, as they are about equally respectable.

A WORD ON WHEELS.

THE Proverb declares that "a word fitly spoken," or, as the Hebrew has it, "a word spoken on wheels, is like apples of gold in pictures of silver"—denoting thereby how precious it is. This the following little story well illustrates:

One day a boy was tormenting a kitten, when his little sister said to him, with tearful eyes: "O! Philip, don't do it; it is God's kitten."

The word of the little one was not lost; it was set upon wheels. Philip left off tormenting the kitten, but many thoughts were awakened in his mind regarding the creature he had before considered his own property.

"God's kitten, God's creature; for He made it." It was a new idea.

The next day, on his way to school, he met one of his companions, who was beating unmercifully a poor, starved-looking dog. Philip ran up to him, and almost unconsciously used his sister's words. He said: "Don't, don't; it is God's creature."

The boy looked abashed, and explained that the dog had stolen his breakfast.

"Never mind," said Philip, "I will give you mine, which I have in my basket;" and, sitting down together, the little boy's anger was soon forgotten.

Again had a word been unconsciously set upon wheels. Two passers-by heard Philip's words; one a young man in prosperous business in a neighbouring town, and the other a dirty and ragged being, who, in consequence of his intemperate habits, had that morning been dismissed by his employer, and was now going home sullen and despairing.

"God's creature!" said the poor, forlorn one, and it was a new idea to him also. "If I, too, belong to God, He will take care of me, though no one else will."

Just then he came to a public-house, where he had been in the habit of drowning his miseries, and then staggering home to inflict new ones on his wife and children. He stopped—the temptation was strong; but the new idea was stronger. "I am God's creature!" and he passed on. His wife was astonished to see him sober, and still more when he burst into tears, declaring that he was a ruined man, but that he was determined to give up drinking, and to trust in God.

At that moment a knock was heard at the door, and the gentleman came in to whom we have before alluded. He, too, had been rebuked by the boy's words for the scorn and loathing which he had felt at the miserable object before him. "God's creature, therefore entitled to help and pity."

We need not detail the words of hope and comfort, the promise and performance of active assistance, which in a short time lifted up the poor man's head, and made him one of God's thankful, joyful "creatures."

It would be well for us all, old and young, to remember that our words and actions, yea, our thoughts also, are set upon never-stopping wheels, rolling on and on into the pathway of eternity.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting was held in the Mount Pleasant Schoolrooms, on Friday evening, the 14th ult. The chair was occupied by the President, W. J. Lamport, Esq.; and among the not very large number of those present were the Revs. James Alsop, Chas. Beard, B.A., John Cuckson, Alexander Gordon, B.A., Thomas Holland, B.A. (Southport), William Oates (Birkenhead), J. W. Rogers (Burnley), John Shannon, John Hamilton Thom, Charles B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc., and Messrs. Capleton, Dean (Crewe), J. H. Greene, W. Howell, Hunt, C. W. Jones, Jos. Lee (Harnard Castle), T. E. Paget, Teasdale (Crewe), &c.

Instead of giving a full report of this meeting, which was crowded out last week, and ought to have been sent to us the week before, we present in full the deeply-interesting address of the Rev. J. H. Thom.

After the opening speech of the chairman, and the committee's report read by Mr. AVISON, the Rev. BENJAMIN GLOVER read the report from Crewe, and the Rev. JOHN CUCKSON that from Roscommon-street.

The Rev. J. H. THOM then moved the first resolution, pledging the meeting to a hearty and effective sympathy with the missionaries engaged in their cause. He said:—I trust we are here this evening as persons who feel that they have a religious duty to society to discharge, and with whom the performance of that duty does not depend upon the immediate measure of success that may attend their efforts. The less obvious, the less conspicuous is our success, the more imperative is our duty to sustain by our personal testimony the moral force of those endeavours. Unfortunately it is the outward symptoms of prosperity that determine the character of public meetings. When a good cause by the magnitude of its visible success becomes independent of individual support, then the people will flock to it in crowds; but so long as it has not attained to sensational dimensions of achievement, its friends will look coldly upon its struggles. They will be warm just when their warmth is not wanted, and they will be cold just when a steady and regulated warmth would contribute to success. (Hear.) If, for example, we could report thronged chapels we should doubtless see a crowded meeting to-night. It is just because we have not yet attained the stage of an outwardly brilliant success that I and others feel grateful to you, sir, for the constancy and faithfulness of the support which you give to right attempts and endeavours that are not yet conspicuous in the abundance of their fruits. This society originated in a conscientious desire, as far as might lie in the deposit of light and truth committed to us as a trust for others as well as for ourselves, to contribute our part to the removal of one of the worst evils of our time—the large separation of skilled labour from religious instruction and life. The subjects contemplated by this mission were not the very poor, depressed by poverty, ignorance, and hardship—to meet their case other agencies were already at work among us—nor yet the comparatively wealthy able to provide for their own religious wants when they appeared, but that great working class, so largely alienated from the religion of the day, but whom in spirit we believed capable of being won, and if won of being incalculably benefitted by more living forms of faith. We did not believe in any radical distinctions between the different classes of men; and if any appeared to be cut off from religious life, it was not because they had no souls, or had souls differently constituted from our own, but because they found no life in the forms of religion with which they were surrounded. In fact, we believed there was a vast field for a spiritual Christianity to occupy and to cultivate, if only it could introduce into it the seeds of light and life. Further, we believed that the class which of all classes comes in its daily toil most into collision with direct realities must also in its spiritual life come into collision with the power of great spiritual realities; and that it never will be won (unless, like the Calvinistic peasantry of Scotland, it be indoctrinated into it by the force of early and persistent drill) by the power of mere formulas. We still believe that class must be reached by the direct teachings of a spiritual Christianity—a Christianity which brings men into direct personal relations with God and Christ; and that it is not a scheme of salvation, but personal Saviours, a Father of their souls, a grand conception of humanity in a Brother man, that alone for them can illustrate providence, and open the possibilities of a divine life. Of course I speak generally, for I well know that a large portion of that class can be and has been dogmatically trained. But it may be said we have failed to touch this class; that a spiritual Christianity, the personal presentation of God and Christ, has proved just as ineffectual as the various orthodoxies; and that there never has been any real great religious movement of this class, except in connection with Methodism. But, let it be remembered, it was not a doctrinal Methodism, but the unqualified preaching of the unbounded love of God, by which John Wesley wrought his wonders. It was by the presentation of the free grace of the Gospel that he so moved men; and this method is quite as open to us as it was to him. (Applause.) And I deny that we have failed with the working class in the sense that the dogmatic Churches have failed. That class knows the dogmatic Churches, and is alienated from them because it knows them. That class does not know us, and we have failed not in having our light known and being found wanting, but in not getting admission for it at all, in not being able to get our faith clearly lodged within the spiritual apprehension and consciousness of the people. The Gospel is not preached to the poor merely because there is a place and a man provided, unless the poor are there to hear it; and accordingly we have failed, just as Christianity has failed, in not becoming known to the hearts and imaginations of men. A book is not published merely because it has issued from the press, and may be had at the bookseller's. The best book in the world is still unpublished in quarters where it remains unknown. There has been no effectual publication to the great class of skilled industry of our personal faith, our spiritual and direct form of religion; and therefore I maintain, sir, no failure of it as yet. How this has come to be, and how it is to cease to be; how that publication and communication is to get itself livingly and effectually made, are great problems which I do not now offer to solve. But, so long as the other churches do not make this class of people religious, and do not by their own success solve the problem, we are bound to offer our way, our truth, our light; and to go on offering it until we have gained that class, or are satisfied that our faith is actually known to that class, and rejected because it is known. Our difficulties are only incitements to exertion; not failures in the light and faith we have, but in the attempt to get for it any real access to the minds of the working people. With regard to the question of a new chapel, though I have no great faith in the power of a building to create a church, and, warned by Mr. Glover, would rather wait till numbers demand more space, than merely advocate the erection of a new chapel in the faith that it might call in absent men and women, yet, looking to the various circumstances of the case, I confess I should like to see a more suitable place of worship bought, built, or rented for the north end of Liverpool. (Applause.) It is a seeming paradox that zeal for church building is more active with those churches which have nothing new to offer, and is almost dead with that class of Christians who think they have something new and fresh to offer. How is it that wealthy religious laymen of the most traditional and conservative type will, at a great cost, make an offering of a church to the people, when there is nothing new about the church except the mere building; while the men who think they have new lights, and that the new lights have in them intrinsic virtue and healing power, are so careless to provide for them centres of emanation? Of course when I speak of new lights I do not mean any definite results of opinion; I refer to great principles, great methods, in religion—just as Christ introduced a new method into theology when he said, "the pure in heart see God." And I should like to see the outward structure which is required for the working of these methods not squeezed out of reluctant effort, but amply planned and maintained, so long as was necessary for a full experiment. (Applause.) Your open and yet most unostentatious course, sir, in connection with the religion you profess, not only here, but everywhere throughout the country, where your name or your presence can do good, is simply a part of the general consistency of your character—(hear)—and thereby you do more to rebuke all social insincerities and dishonesties than any protests that come from chambers of commerce or from politicians; for from my heart I believe that religious dishonesty is at the root of all other dishonesty—(hear)—and that those who were guilty before God and man, in the deepest things of life, of simulations and dissimulations, of concealed convictions, and misleading outward signs of religious sympathy, and come to think nothing of it, are really breaking down the foundations of simplicity in all things else. (Bear.) In reference to the resolution which has been placed in my hands, let me conclude by saying that while we permit ourselves to desire a greater and more extended success, our grateful acknowledgments are especially due to those ministers who, without external stimulants and excitements, yet maintain with the utmost energy and vigour this upward struggle on which they have entered. (Applause.)

The other speakers were Rev. T. Holland; Mr. Teasdale, of Crewe; Rev. Benjamin Glover (who deprecated the idea of Crewe having failed to show a fair result for the work done there, the number of members having doubled during the eighteen months he had been there, a Sunday-school having been raised, and the state of the congregation being good); Rev. John Cuckson; Rev. James Alsop; Rev. William Oates; Mr. Green, Roscommon-street; Mr. Dean, the secretary of the Crewe congregation; Rev. A. Gordon; Mr. T. E. Paget, and Rev. C. Beard. Several of the speakers alluded to the discouragingly small attendance, but the meeting was animated by a very earnest spirit, and the addresses were interesting and expressed thorough confidence in the work that is being done. Mr. Teasdale, from Crewe, created some amusement by mentioning, in reference to Mr. Thom's appeal to let our views be better known, that Renshaw-street Chapel itself was an illustration, for, as he passed it, "had it not been for a notice of a lecture at the door there was nothing to tell him he was in the neighbourhood of a Unitarian chapel." It was mentioned by the Chairman that a chapel at Roscommon-street will be the next care of the committee.

INTELLIGENCE.

CHOPPINGTON.—On Sunday last the Rev. T. Leyland delivered a very able discourse on the "Unitarian View of Christ, Biblical and reasonable." In the course of his discourse he defended the Unitarian view of Christ against a very violent attack made upon it on the previous Sunday by the Rev. J. T. Oliver, a Methodist minister. The reply Mr. Leyland gave was in a truly Christian spirit and produced a very favourable impression, even on Mr. Oliver's followers.

MELBOURNE.—We learn from the sixteenth annual report of the Unitarian Church at this place that, notwithstanding the impoverishment of the resources by the loss of some of its most influential and wealthy members, the average attendance at the weekly services shows no diminution. In addition to the ordinary services, a series of monthly lectures has been delivered. During the year the Rev. H. Higginson has been unwell, and Rev. Mr. Bowen had supplied for him a few months, and Mr. Higginson has resumed his duties. The committee close their report by a full financial statement, from which it appears that the whole church expenses for the year amounted to rather more than £428; while the chief items on the credit side are:—Seat Rents, £108. 15s.; Subscriptions and Donations, £132. 18s.; Monthly Collections, £54. 15s., and "Government aid to Stipend" (!) £75. 7s.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENT.

R. J. P.—Messrs. Williams and Norgate, will be able to furnish all you want.

THE LAY-PREACHERS' UNION.

To the Editors.—In your leader last week you very truly remark "there needs a very great deal more of simple, and in the true sense Evangelical piety and fervour." As far as London goes, you need not to have qualified with the need of "less propagandist zeal," for that might be all put in a nutshell. Very few theological lectures or discussions take place at the London chapels; and as regards The Lay-preaching Union, it carries on thirteen devotional services every week in the year in eight stations; but the lectures or discussions are quite exceptional. It will be a pity if the stirring discourse of the Rev. A. Coquerel, given last night, does not appear in English on the "one thing needful." He showed this to be a life like Christ's, neither a creed nor a ritual, but the spirit of devoted self-sacrifice. The glad tidings of Christianity will never be brought to the common people by our Unitarian body till this spirit is more thoroughly understood. Some of our London lay-preachers are men from the ranks who, with a burning sense of the disgrace that it is to every Christian, that tens of thousands of our people in this great city are in a condition of Pagan darkness and religious apathy, make sacrifices of their hard-earned leisure to try and redeem this condition of things. They are sorely puzzled to interpret the spirits that can only worship in a crowd, and with beautiful accompaniments which wealth alone can procure, and they sympathise with their friends who stand charged with want of morality, because they have used funds, left by a departed layman, to rent their humble houses of prayer; and who have not felt that pecuniary profit should be the only element of consideration in endeavouring to spread the Gospel and obey the injunction of Jesus, "feed my sheep."—Yours faithfully, STEPHEN S. TAYLER.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

According to the Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall, the Vatican, though affecting indifference, is seriously concerned at the obstacles raised by the Catholic Governments to the meeting of the Ecumenical Council. It now seems certain that the council will not attract the same number of bishops as attended the centenary of St. Peter. Still there will be a great influx of strangers, and an English speculator, anxious that there shall be no lack of accommodation, is said to have offered Prince Doria a rent of 75,000 francs for the Doria Palace, with the view of converting it into an hotel. The riding-house is to be transformed into a salle à manger.

Several bishops and missionaries, and the Patriarch of Jerusalem have already arrived, to prepare for the great event, which is to work such religious wonders; and the Archbishop of Algeria is expected shortly.

The celebrated French preacher, Father Hyacinthe, is in Rome. According to one account he has come to submit his discourses, before publication, to the censors of the Holy See; according to another account he has been summoned to give explanations respecting a letter of his which appeared in the Revue Universelle of Geneva.

The Austrian Government seems wisely determined to make the clergy amenable to law, whatever their rank. The Bishop of Linz, acting under the direct advice of the Pope, to him of course infallible, refused twice to appear before a secular court, on the ground that the Concordat exempted him from its jurisdiction. The other day, however, while driving out in his carriage, he was arrested by the police, and has been or soon will be brought to trial for certain expressions made use of by him in a pastoral letter, denouncing some of the liberal changes recently effected in Austria.

A serious conflict has broken out between the Catholic laity in Hungary and their bishops on the subject of the administration of the church property. Hitherto this property, which is of very great value, has been administered exclusively by the bishops. Some time ago, however, the representatives of the Catholic laity in the Diet claimed the right, on behalf of their constituents, of exercising a certain degree of influence in the administration of the Catholic communes in which the property is situated, and the question was referred by the Government to a conference of bishops, who were directed to prepare a scheme with this object in view. After much delay the conference produced a regulation for the election of an assembly, composed of laymen and clergymen, in whose hands the whole management of the church property was to be placed. This regulation has now been approved by the Emperor-King, but it secures so great a preponderance of influence to the ecclesiastical element that the Catholic deputies resolved, at a meeting held the other day, to insist on its being rejected by the Chamber.

Italy too has decided, as the logical carrying out of the principle of the equality of all citizens before the law, that the clergy can no longer be exempted from conscription. In the Senate sixty-seven voted in favour of non-exemption, and only thirty-seven for exemption.

The Protestant Conference, which we have before spoken of, met at Worms on May 31st, when 300 delegates and about 20,000 spectators were present. The following declaration was adopted: The Conference repels the supposition expressed in the Papal letter of the 13th September, 1868, that Protestants would return to unity with the Catholic Church. It protests especially against the principles enunciated in the Encyclical letter, and the Syllabus, which are opposed to civilisation, and pernicious in their bearing upon political institutions. The Conference expects that all opponents of the common enemy of religious peace, national unity, and the free development of civilisation will closely unite at the present juncture. It declares hierarchical errors, and particularly the action of the Jesuits, to be the chief cause of the present deplorable religious differences. Only by the determined rejection of the hierarchical pretensions which have been renewed, and have been constantly on the increase since 1815; only by a return to pure Scripture, and by the recognition of the conquests of civilisation, can divided Christianity regain the peace which it has lost. Finally, the Conference declares that all efforts made within the Protestant Church to found a hierarchical power or the supremacy of dogma are a flat denial of the principles of Protestantism, and are simply so many bridges to Rome. All co-religionists are therefore exhorted to oppose with energy every tendency that may be dangerous to freedom of the mind or conscience. With regard to the constitution of the Church, the Protestant Conference takes its stand upon the principle of the independence of each community. It desires that the direction of the Church should be constitutionally regulated, and that the Church administration should be responsible to the provincial Synods.

The Rev. Septimus Andrews, vicar of Market Harborough, has gone over to the Romish Church, and a Franciscan monk of the name of Jäger, formerly secretary to the Archbishop of Prague, and for a time confessor to the King of Saxony, has become a Protestant. Whether Protestantism or Romanism has been the gainer by the exchange we are unable to say.

The John Bull learns with regret that the Bishop of Oxford will not vote at all on the second reading of the Irish Church Bill. His lordship will, however, explain his reasons for this course, his belief being (1), that the Peers have virtually rejected the bill once; (2) that they cannot resist the opinion of the country, the House of Commons, and the Crown as expressed by calling Mr. Gladstone to office; and (3) that better terms can be obtained for the Irish Church by substantially amending the bill in committee. It is thought probable that Dr. Thirlwall, the bishop of St. David's, and Dr. Jacobson, the bishop of Chester, will vote for the bill.

Cardinal Cullen has addressed a letter to his clergy in the Dublin diocese on the subject of the General Council to assemble in Rome on the Feast of the Immaculate Conception, in December. The Catholic bishops of the world are, he says, then to meet "to condemn the errors now undermining the foundations of society and religion, and to stem the torrent of infidelity and immorality that menaces the world with destruction;" and he exhorts to special prayer for the Council.

An influential deputation, headed by Lord Lyttelton, having waited on Mr. Gladstone to ask the Government to put in operation the Suffragans Act of Henry VIII., with or without amendment, he said, there must be a more general agreement as to what was required before Government could be expected to deal with such a matter. The chief objection which he had heard to the creation of suffragans was the fear that it might lead to a multiplication of unemployed bishops. A suffragan was a person who received a commission which was revocable; it might terminate within the incumbency of the bishop of the diocese; it naturally would terminate at the close of the bishop's life. Then the considerable number of bishops who had returned to this country from the colonies, who were here and were not episcopally employed, gave a great deal more force and edge to that apprehension than it would otherwise have. On the whole, he thought they had better wait till they saw what direction the Archbishop of Canterbury's bill would take, and then he would take care that the whole matter should receive the careful attention of the Government.

A correspondent of the Guardian is anxious that an effort should be made to persuade Mr. Liddon, who is reported to have declined the Headship of Keble College, to reconsider his decision. "There can be no man in Oxford," he says, "better fitted for the post—no man who enjoys the love and confidence of a larger number of Churchmen. When the time comes that those who object to any dogmatic teaching, or those who hold a contrary system to that of Keble, found a college of their own, it will be only just that they should elect a Principal of their own colour—or want of colour; but now I think it would be a grievous mistake to elect a man of indefinite theological views, from a desire to please all parties."

The Spanish Evangelisation Society has published a table, translated from a French abridgment of Llorente's History of the Spanish Inquisition, which exhibits a recapitulation of the victims of this horrible institution from the year 1481 to 1820. From this table it appears that the number of victims in Spain alone, from 1481 to 1820, amounts to 335,467, not including those who had suffered imprisonment or confinement to the galleys, or exile, during the reign of Ferdinand VII., the number of which is very considerable. Llorente's tables are the more valuable because he was himself an official of the Inquisition, and had access to its registers for the materials of his statistics.

On account of the bodily infirmity of the Bishop of Winchester, Sir R. Phillimore has accepted letters of request from him against the Rev. Richard Hooker Edward Wix, vicar of Swanmore, in the Isle of Wight, who is charged with having offended against the laws ecclesiastical by using lighted candles on the communion table, or on a table called a re-table and elsewhere, during the celebration of the Holy Communion and at other times when such candles were not required for the purpose of giving light, or for any other useful purpose; and further, for using incense in the church during the performance of divine service therein, as subsidiary thereto.

A new hymn-book was published a short time since for the use of the Baptist denomination. The success of this undertaking has been such that the sum of £250 was distributed among the widows of Baptist ministers from the proceeds of last year's sales.

There was a long discussion in the Assembly of the Scotch Church on patronage, and by 193 to 98 it voted in favour of modifying the law so as to place the nomination of the minister substantially in the hands of the people—the elders of the Church, the male communicants, and the heritors who are members of the Church. A petition to Parliament, though denounced by Earl Stirling as little short of insanity, was also voted by an overwhelming majority. The move is really one, as no doubt Earl Selkirk well understood, adapted to make the Scotch Kirk successor to the Irish Establishment, since not a reason exists with the politician class for upholding the Scotch Establishment but the patronage connected with it.

The evening services at Westminster Abbey seem scarcely to be answering the purpose for which they were instituted. The present Archbishop of Dublin, then the Dean, in preaching the first sermon said they were designed simply for the working classes and those who were not in the habit generally of attending other churches. On Sunday night, when the Bishop of Peterborough was the preacher, there was not one among the thousands assembled, ready to rush in as soon as the gates were opened, who belonged to the class thus specified. Carriages rolled down with elegantly dressed ladies, who were content to take their chance in the general scramble. Others more fortunate had obtained tickets, and were admitted to "reserved seats" through the private entrance in the cloisters. In less than ten minutes after they were opened the gates were once more closed against two or three thousand persons, and as many more arrived a little later, who had the poor satisfaction of seeing a huge printed paper hoisted up with the announcement, "The Abbey is full."

The University sermon at St. Mary's, Oxford, on Sunday morning attracted a large congregation, the preacher being the Rev. Mark Pattison, rector of Lincoln College, one of the writers in Essays and Reviews. He gave an able and interesting discourse, the object of which was to show how Religion and Science should go hand in hand, elevating, refining, and blessing men.

The Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund are about to open a unique exhibition, at the Dudley Gallery, London, of pottery, glass, and other specimens of ancient Jewish art, found by Lieutenant Warren in the course of his excavations.

In a sermon at the Brompton Oratory the other day, Archbishop Manning made a statement which may well startle Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Whalley. It was that there are more Roman Catholics in London than there are inhabitants in Rome.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

A correspondent of the Guardian writes: "It has been the fashion lately to say that Dr. Arnold and his disciples have exaggerated the importance of physical geography in the study of history. Certainly the striking contrast of national characteristics on the northern and southern slopes of the Alps shows how great is the influence which place as well as race exercises over a nation. To pass from the richer and riper vegetation of Italy to the comparatively backward foliage of Switzerland is curious enough; but it is far more curious to observe the difference in cleanliness, intelligence, and industry, between people living within a few miles of one another. The canton of the Grisons is also a remarkable evidence of the truth of another common saying. It is a canton presenting to the traveller creeds and languages in a singular juxtaposition; and as he passes from village to village he can pronounce almost with certainty, on entering the village street, whether the inhabitants are Protestant or Catholic. In the latter, the wayside crucifix or lonely chapel perched on some jutting crag for pilgrims to climb to are very picturesque; while the bare undecorated churches of the former are painfully cold and undevotional, but it is a great thing to have unquestionable indications of a diligent and thriving population. What, again, can be uglier than the churches of Zurich, or what more like prosperity and contentment than the aspect of the place and its people?"

In the debate in the Italian Senate on the bill abolishing the exemption from military conscription hitherto enjoyed by theological students, General Cialdini thus expressed himself:

"We liberals do not oppose religion, but we combat privileges. The liberal party respects the human conscience and abhors the faith which imposes itself by the stake and by intolerance. No statesman will ever seek to destroy the religious sentiment in a people. I am devoted to the liberty of the Church; do not persecute it, but neither let it enjoy privileges. The priest should be a citizen, and may also be a soldier. The present bill has no religious or retaliatory character. We will vote it as political men, and also in order that cowards may not find a loophole for escape from military service. As to those who say that we are ungrateful to Catholicism, which contributed to make Italy, I will not answer them; history will do that."

In noticing the death of Dr. Ernest William Hengstenberg, which took place at Berlin on the 28th ult., the Pall Mall, on the principle we suppose of "de mortuis nil nisi verum," says:

"He was a very important person, though we cannot, even in speaking of his death, say that his influence was useful, wholesome, or charitable. Appointed in 1826 Professor of Divinity at Berlin, a post which he held till his death, he founded in 1827 the Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, a publication which has probably more envy, malice, and uncharitableness to account for than all our own religious press together, good as its will in the matter is. By the powerful unscrupulous incitements of this journal a sort of religious war was stirred up in Germany; old dogmatic tests were revived, sharpened, and enforced on the holders of professorships and preferments in Prussia and other States, and what is called a reaction was successfully produced. Dr. Hengstenberg supported this movement by numerous controversial publications, and some very learned apologetic and exegetic works on various books of the Bible (Christology of the Old Testament, 3 vols.; Introduction, &c., to the Old Testament, 3 vols.; Commentaries on the Psalms, the Song of Songs, and the Apocalypse). He acquired great influence with the Government, which, however, he lost under the late King, when he refused to sanction the "union" between the Lutheran and Reformed Communions. Though born in the latter, Hengstenberg gradually grew into a complete sympathy with the most advanced claims of the former Church. His views on the Sacraments were of the highest Lutheran type, and he was frequently suspected, in conjunction with his friend the late jurist Dr. Stahl, of wishing to renew from Canterbury at least, if not from Rome, the grace of Apostolic succession which Luther so unaccountably let slip. In the nomenclature of German theological history he is called the leader of the right fraction of Pietistic Supranaturalists. His defensive position in reference to the criticism of the Old Testament is the most thoroughly orthodox that has been taken up by any sufficiently informed person in our day. A strong political sense led him to reject all compromises in this matter, where it is, indeed, only the first step which costs an effort, or is worth a struggle."

The Freeman thinks that

"The encroachments of Rome in the last few years have done nothing to popularise her with this nation. By her charities and her professions of solicitude for the common weal she has only acted the part of the juggler when he draws attention to one hand for the purpose of distracting the eye from the other. The fact remains uncontradicted that the Rome of the sixteenth century is the Rome of the nineteenth. Popish bulls and encyclicals, the revelations of convents, and the story of Bible burnings, are matters of to-day, and have been duly journalised for convenient reference. Nor does the fact that within the pale of the English Church a Popish ritual is now in full bloom and a Popish literature rapidly spreading at all diminish our horror of Popery. The Established Church of England was a make-shift, cunningly contrived to appease both parties, and the folly and peril of that past dishonesty are now becoming manifest."

The blunt Archdeacon of Taunton writes a characteristic letter to the John Bull concerning the recent meeting of Deans, in which he says:

"The Government, it appears, are not prepared with any measure for the increase of the Episcopate; not so much as with a measure allowing of such increase. But they will be glad to hear 'what the bishops have to say.' The bishops, having nothing to say, fall back upon the deans. The deans have nothing to say, except that they are excellent Church officers, and fully employed already. The episcopal and decanal 'hide-and-seek' may be very good sport to those who play at it; and it makes the world laugh. I can't help laughing myself, but I ought to be crying."

At the annual festival of the Oxford branch of "The English Church Union," Dr. Pusey, speaking on the position of the Church with regard to the civil power, said:

"The question put to them was, in fact, 'Watchman, what of the night?' Now, though watchmen, they were not seers, and a seer would be required to predict the outcome of circumstances so confused as those of the present time. His answer to the question, 'What ought we to expect?' would be 'Anything.' 'What to fear?' 'Nothing.' 'What to hope?' 'Everything;' and to hope the more from a state of war. In a poem by one who had been mentioned before, there was a quotation which said, 'Give any boon for peace.' He would rather say, 'Give any boon for war.' It was against the rocks that the waves dashed fiercely. Satan did not strive against those who were his own. The very opposition of the world to the English Church was a proof of its vitality. From disestablishment the State had as much to fear as the Establishment; the Church as a spiritual body could, of course, have nothing to fear from such an attack."

The Rev. P. C. Medd, of Oxford, writing to the Guardian on the increase of the episcopate, says:

"The Church is fairly tired of the feudalism and baronialism which has gathered round and well-nigh stifled the episcopate. In this growingly democratic age, all that is more than an element of weakness—it is an element of danger. And conversely, think what would be the effect of an episcopate represented in each of our large towns by a devoted bishop living plainly in the midst of his people, seen daily at the altar, heard weekly in the pulpit of his cathedral, and known by face in the dwellings of the humble poor. If this cannot be without the sacrifice of episcopal life-peerages, then, in the name of the Gospel, let them go. The present and, still more, the future position of the House of Lords would make that sacrifice of but small moment to the Church at large; whilst it might possibly be of some benefit, spiritually and otherwise, to the bishops themselves."

The Rev. M. F. Sadler considers that the advice which Dr. Vaughan gave recently at Doncaster is most mischievous, and says:

"Congregationalism is, in its idea, simply isolation, and means the entire subserviency of the minister to those whom he is supposed to lead, and in some sense govern; and the advice is most out of place, for we in this country are confronted on all sides by a system far more prosperous than the congregational, and which seems to have, to a great extent, solved the question how a religious body can rely on voluntary efforts, and yet have its individual ministers independent of the particular congregation in which they minister. I mean, of course, Wesleyan Methodism. If we are so near disendowment as some suppose, I would invite those who would prepare us for it to study the Wesleyan financial system. It is, I can assure them, worth their while to do so. The rough idea of it is to put the weekly subscriptions of the members of large districts into a common fund, out of which to pay the ministers of that district, so that no minister is in the least degree dependent upon any particular congregation or flock for his bread."

The Rev. W. Heffill, vicar of St. Mark's, Dukinfield, and a Protestant of the rabid, Murpheyite class, having written to Dr. Stanley to ask whether it was true, as mentioned in James Grant's "Religious Tendencies of the Times," that he "boldly proclaimed that not one clergyman believes in the Athanasian Creed," the Dean replied that what he had stated was, "That no clergyman of the Church of England believes that all members of the Eastern Church 'shall without doubt perish everlastingly;' and that therefore no clergyman of the Church of England accepts the condemnatory clauses of the Athanasian Creed in their obvious, literal, and original sense." To which Mr. Heffill returns this courteous answer: "I consider your reply as most unsatisfactory; it is simply an evasion. I would hope, when you truly reflect on the statement made, you will feel ashamed of the slander, and be ready to make a suitable apology."

Referring to this subject, the Echo says:

"We have already expressed a very decided opinion that if it [the Athanasian Creed] be not expelled from the Prayer Book, its use should at all events be optional. The Creed is not, in the first place, the work of St. Athanasius, having been written long after his death. It is unnecessary, because during four centuries the Christian Church did well without it. The use of it is in defiance of the anathemas of four Ecumenical Councils against the adoption of any other Creed than the Apostles' and the Nicene. But, as we have already pointed out, these considerations are unimportant in comparison with the nature of the composition itself. It is a darkening of wisdom by words without knowledge. It attempts to state with logical particularity mysteries which infinitely transcend all logic, and which the Holy Scriptures seem of purpose to leave undefined, or to have stated only in their practical relation to man's redemption. Dares Mr. Heffill or any other Churchman to assert that he of his heart believes that every one will, 'without doubt, perish everlastingly' who does not accept the literal interpretation of the Athanasian Creed? We should be sorry to think it possible. Archbishop Tillotson wished the Church of England well rid of this Creed. Archbishop Whately used, we believe, to boast that he had never read it in public. The gentle and saintly Bishop Lonsdale used to be silent when the time came to utter the responses to its damnable clauses, and Mr. Arnold's voice, as Rugby men will remember, was then also hushed. We are much obliged to Mr. Heffill for extracting from Dean Stanley such an unequivocal condemnation."

The Spectator contrasts the "spiritual soft-sawder" with which it says the Archbishop of York has been regaling his auditors at Sheffield with St. Peter's speeches in the Acts of the Apostles, or St. Paul's on Mars Hill, or before Agrippa, or even his pathetic speech at Miletus, in taking leave of the Ephesian Church on his last journey to Jerusalem. Compare too (it proceeds), Mr. Dale's powerful address to the Congregationalists, or Mr. Martineau's to the Unitarians with most of our Episcopal charges, and we shall see at once how large the element of mere syrup is in the latter. It is a fatal mistake. When we read Bishop Butler, we find the only evidence that he speaks the truth "in love" in the self-evident fact that he loves the truth with his whole heart, and lets us see it. Our modern bishops are too apt to prepare syrup of truth, which is not truth at all, and, what is worse, is not sweet after the first honey flavour, for it is sure to turn sour on the stomach.

Our friend Mr. Clayden, as one of the secretaries of the Free Christian Union, writes the following explanation to the Pall Mall relative to its account of the Rev. C. K. Paul's sermon preached at Freemasons' Hall:

"Your report makes Mr. Paul say that 'sacramental rites grew up, and in these some men thought they found Christ.' His words were, 'In the ministries and sacraments and sacramental rites men found, by faith, their Saviour.' You report Mr. Paul as doubting whether God could be found in a written book. In this sentence you summarise two pages of the sermon, the aim of which is to show that He is not to be found exclusively in the Bible. Another sentence of the report runs thus:—'It was because they believed that Christ was a symbolical name for collective humanity, which they understood to be God.' Mr. Paul's words were, 'We might say that Christ is a symbolical name for collective humanity, through which alone can God be known by man.' Another runs, 'following out his plans as the women followed Jesus—God as they thought—to Galilee.' This, as Mr. Paul wrote and read it, was 'prepared to follow his spirit, whither he may lead as the women followed Jesus, gone as they deemed, to Galilee.'"

In a sermon, on Marriage, at St. James's Hall, last Sunday evening, the Rev. Newman Hall said:

"Though there are many features in which woman is superior to man, and though there are some women very strong, both in body and spirit (though happily they are few), yet the fact still remains that man is stronger both in physical power and will; and consequently the law which obtains among nations will prevail among families, namely, that where power is authority must be; and the weakest must take the place allotted to it, for any striving on its part to obtain the rule will only lead to continual disturbance, without any good result ensuing. Therefore the woman must be content with the place which God has assigned her, trusting for her real power to her true womanliness, and not aping man's habits, or dress, or labours, but discharging in the highest degree the duties which naturally fall to herself. By this course of action she will shine more brightly and clearly, and will win from the opposite sex that love and respect which is to be her great stay in life."

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. R. C. Dendy, of Flowery Field, has received and accepted an invitation to become the minister of the congregation at Tenterden, vacant since the death of the late Rev. E. Talbot. He will enter on his duties there in September.—The Rev. B. Walker has also received and accepted a cordial invitation from the Manchester Ministry to the Poor to become their missionary at the Rochdale-road Domestic Mission.

AMERICAN NOTES.

From the Boston Directory it appears that there are in that city the following number of churches: 16 Trinitarian Congregational, 14 Episcopalian, 16 Baptist, 16 Methodist, 16 Catholic, and 21 Unitarian.

Ritualism is causing trouble in the States as well as here. While some of the bishops favour it, others are strongly opposed to it. Bishop McIlvaine, of Ohio, ordered one of his clergy, the Rev. Colin Tate, to discontinue his surpliced choir and processional singing in his church. Refusing to obey, the bishop has summoned him to trial for contumacy, and the American Church Union are furnishing him with funds to defend himself.

The Tablet publishes a pastoral of the Fathers of the Faith Provincial Council of Baltimore, which the Pall Mall thinks young ladies will do well to read attentively. The Fathers deem it particularly their solemn duty to renew their warning against the modern fashionable dances commonly called German or round dances, which are becoming more and more occasions of sin. These practices, the Fathers state, are so much the more dangerous, as several persons seem to look upon them as harmless and indulge in them without any remorse of conscience. But divine revelation, the wisdom of antiquity, the light of reason and experience, all concur in proclaiming that these kind of entertainments, even when restricted within tolerable bounds of propriety, are attended with more or less danger to the Christian soul. They add that they cannot too strongly reprobate the system of round dancing recently introduced into society, which shocks every feeling of delicacy, and is fraught with imminent danger to morals. When the Fathers speak of round dances being condemned by the "wisdom of antiquity," we cannot help feeling that possibly the reverence in which the British chaperon is held may be somewhat misplaced; for whatever may be the case in Baltimore, in England elderly ladies not only countenance these objectionable movements, but themselves suffer much in the body by being hustled and pushed about in crowded rooms while watching the sinful activity of their charges. We cannot say which is right, but it is melancholy to see how great a difference of opinion exists between the Baltimore Fathers and the Belgravian mothers.

General Grant has established two Indian departments, to be superintended respectively by members of the two Societies of Friends—the "Orthodox" and the "Hicksite." As our readers may perhaps remember, some years ago Elizabeth Fry and others of her community, impressed with the conviction that Friends in America were not so sound in the faith as they should be, repaired thither with the hope of reclaiming them to orthodoxy. They were met, however, by Elias Hicks, a man of considerable power, and the result of the expedition, instead of what had been expected, was a sharp division in the body, the larger part of which followed Hicks, and are now generally Unitarians. The President has selected an equal number from the two, and given them separate fields of work.

Some of the Baptists think their denomination ought not to have been overlooked, since their missionaries have been so useful among the Cherokees and Ottawas. Dr. Gillette, of Washington, writing on the matter, says:—"The Ottawas in Kansas, a small tribe of about 300, have about eighty members of a Baptist church, with good schools and every appliance for advancement in science, habits, and wealth. Among the Cherokees of 17,000 are about 1,200 Baptist members and 32 schools; 700 are Methodists, 500 are Moravians, and about 150 are Presbyterians. The Delawares are largely Baptists. As labourers among the Indians we are gratified to name the Rev. Evan Jones, who emigrated with the Cherokees under General Scott from North Carolina and Georgia to the Indian territory in 1836, and has been their wise representative here at the capital from time to time, with Chief John Ross; written most of their important papers, aided in all their councils, and is now the oldest missionary known to me in the world; hale and active, and doing all he can for a people he has seen abused by white men as no people on earth have ever been abused."

It is stated that the Methodist Church in America has substituted the word "fidelity" for "obedience" in the woman's part of their form of marriage. This may probably prevent a good deal of promise-breaking.

Habitual drunkards in Illinois, by a recent act of the Legislature, are hereafter to be subjected to a very stringent course of treatment. They are classified with indigent, idiotic, and insane persons, and are to be placed under the care of guardians or of the overseers of the poor. A similar provision exists in Pennsylvania, but the regulations are more strict in Illinois, since in the latter State when a person has once been declared an habitual drunkard, the guardianship over him must continue for an entire year. This seems not a bad way of abating an acknowledged nuisance.

The Nation considers that people who have been frightened about the Hibernicising and Catholicising of the United States need not yet go into complete despair. It appears that during last year there were received at the port of New York 213,686 alien immigrants. Of this number 45,571 were natives of Ireland, and presumably, the vast majority of them were Catholics; and, if with the Irishmen are put the immigrants from other nominally or really Catholic countries—France, Italy, Belgium, Spain, Poland, Portugal, Mexico, and the South American States—the Roman Catholics last year numbered 52,000. Taking the nominally or really Protestant countries of England, Scotland, the Scandinavian States, Holland, and Wales, from them there were immigrants to the number of 54,000. Thus, balancing Roman Catholics and Protestants from other quarters against each other, just about half of last year's total immigration is disposed of. There remains the immigration from Germany, which amounts to very nearly the other half—namely, 101,989. There are no religious statistics of these, but hitherto it has been well known that the great majority of German immigrants were not Roman Catholics. At all events non-Celtic blood flowed in the veins of more than two out of every three of last year's new-comers; and while the Irish immigration since the war has been steadily decreasing, that from the other sources referred to has been increasing.

GUIZOT AND COUSIN.

THE following interesting letters are translated from the Revue Chrétienne. In 1866, Guizot presented to his friend Cousin the second volume of his "Meditations," which called forth this acknowledgment:

"My Dear Friend,—As soon as I received your book I hastened to read it, and I tell you very sincerely that I am very much pleased with it.

"The little differences that you have not concealed are inevitable, because they belong to a general difference in our mode of thought concerning the nature of philosophy and religion. These two great powers can and ought to be in accord, but they are still different.

"To religion belongs influence—lofty, public, universal: to philosophy a more restricted sphere, but still more exalted. The one addresses the whole soul, including the imagination; the other addresses the reason only. The first has mysteries without which there can be no religion; the second has all its ideas clear and distinct, as both Descartes and Bossuet declare. This distinction lies at the foundation of my philosophy and of my religion; and this distinction is also, in my view, the principle of their concord. To confound them is, to my eyes, a certain means of embroiling the one with the other, as Malebranche did. To absorb philosophy in religion was only given to Pascal by a faith full of contradictions and doubts.

"To absorb religion in philosophy is a silly undertaking which a sound philosophy would reject. To admit both, each in its proper place, is truth, greatness, and peace.

"From this you will perceive the reason of our differences, which no longer mar our union in long, tried, and sincere friendship."

Guizot replied on the 13th June:

"I reckon, like you, my dear friend, that our differences do not damage our old and sincere friendship. I am also pleased to know that, apart from our little differences, we each have a profound and distinct scheme of thought. I think, like you, that it does not do to confound and absorb either philosophy in religion or religion in philosophy. I wish both to be free in their manifestation and influence; but do not rest on the same basis either their difference or their agreement.

"To me philosophy is nothing but a science; that is to say, the work of man, limited, as the human mind itself, in its sphere and object. Religion, in its principle and in its history, is of Divine origin and institution. The one comes from man eager for knowledge; the other is light come from God, 'which lights every man that comes into the world,' and which God maintains and spreads gradually in the world according to His impetuous plan by His general and special providence and His sovereign will. I shall not say more. We know one another—where we agree and where we differ."

Soon after this correspondence Cousin was removed by death, and in sending the letters to the Revue Guizot expresses his pleasure at having been the means of directing some of the last thoughts of his illustrious friend to the very essence of the question of life.

THE FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

IN common with many in our own churches, and we doubt not in other religious bodies, we have strong sympathy with the general spirit of the Free Christian Union and with the aims of a considerable number of its supporters. The association in worship and in free religious conference of men hailing from such different quarters of the religious world as some of those who took part in the service and the meeting, cannot but do good, and the publicity which has been given to the proceedings, must draw the attention of the most religious men in many churches to the subject, and will do something to overcome the hesitation and timidity which still keeps them apart. Whether, however, the meeting will do as much to advance the Union as an organisation we very much doubt. The fact is, that the Union at present labours under a certain ambiguity. In spite of the broad and elaborate statements in its Constitution, there are a great many who do not distinctly understand what it really aims to accomplish, and it is, we believe, to this cause, quite as much as to the timidity to which the promoters ascribe it, that the fact is due that though it receives whole reams of general epistolary sympathy it numbers only about a hundred members and three congregations.

The truth is that among those whose attention is earnestly drawn to the society there are two parties, often intermingling and often confused together—both lovers of free Christian union, but yet really and fundamentally distinct.

On the one hand are those who desire all such Christian union as is consistent with their holding fully and loyally to their various churches. They accept the fact that there are great diversities of opinion among Christians—diversities quite too great to be ignored or disregarded—diversities which so materially affect both the worship and the practical activities of religion, that it is every way best for those so differing to form separate religious associations for the common purposes of the religious life. They, therefore, frankly accept the denominational divisions of Christendom. They regard them, not merely as inevitable but as right and good, so long as they continue to embody—as many of them still do—distinctions of faith, worship, or organisation, which their various supporters believe to be—we do not say essential, but—practically important for the free working out of the religious life. At the same time, however, they feel that these differences do not touch the ultimate grounds of religious sympathy; they see that a very exaggerated importance has been attached to them; they wish to see them kept no longer as the standards of hostile camps, though believing them still useful and necessary as openly expressing the truth about the general position of distinct though friendly bands.

They desire, therefore, closer union among these various sectional churches; they long for a freer interchange of religious offices with one another, and are looking with deep interest to the Free Christian Union to see if it can help them by providing a sort of neutral territory for the first advances towards more cordial co-operation and fellowship among the ministers and members of various churches.

To this class we ourselves most heartily belong. We are Unitarians, and we believe that the name Unitarian expresses not perfectly, but better than any other, that great fact of our doctrinal position which, with many minor differences, distinguishes us from the rest of the world. These differences oblige us (unless we shirk them) to worship and work as a distinct group of churches. Even if we do not feel them very important, others do. We therefore accept the name; do not object to it as the ordinary designation of our churches and our institutions, though we utterly refuse so to fasten it on them by trust provisos as to oblige those who come after us to accept it also. But, we have never, and our churches have never, regarded our distinct views as essential. We regard them even as important, only in an infinitely smaller sense than the fundamental faiths and virtues of the Gospel are important. We therefore feel grieved and burdened under the isolation which they have involved, and we long for freer union with other churches. We desire the freest union compatible with honesty. We wish for as much union as men will have with us as Unitarians—not as men regarded as disaffected, but as hearty and loyal Unitarians, believing Unitarianism to be the truest reading of the Gospel.

There is, however, another class equally attracted by the idea of free Christian union, but in whose minds that idea exists as the principle of a very different policy. To them the words free Christian union are the symbol not of the deeper ground of Christian sympathy on which they may meet freely outside their special church organisations, and even exchange offices of religious fellowship inside them, but of the principle on which alone Christian churches should be built up and grouped together. They do not frankly accept the fact that human nature tends to group itself by sympathies of faith which, as long as its understanding of doctrine is imperfect and distorted, must have more or less of sectarianism about them. They think this tendency ought not to be allowed. They rejoice when they see it neutralised, even by the external power of Government keeping in forced and uneasy association congregations and individuals, who, if left to the natural affinities of their own faiths, would not remain in association for a week. They would have men set themselves against this tendency, refuse to recognise it, cast it out as sin. If they themselves belong to some sectarian group of churches, they do so with only half-disguised aversion. They think that church life and organisation ought not to be allowed to follow the lines of theological thought, and that sect names and doctrinal distinctions not only should not be fastened permanently and unalterably on churches, but should not be accepted even for present use. Consequently the Free Christian Union, so far as it embodies their idea, is not a common ground on which they may find such association as is compatible with distinct denominational positions, but a protest against all denominational distinctions as un-Christian and vicious.

Now, we have not a word to say against those who hold this latter view, only—we wish that their position, which is a very distinct one, should be clearly stated and recognised. We do not think, however, it has been altogether understood. And it is from a certain confusion between it and the position we began by stating, that the apparent weakness of the Free Christian Union has arisen. The most active promoters of the new society are deceived by the wide-spread prevalence of the feeling first described, expressions of which reach them from every direction, into believing that their own conviction of the radical and utter wrongfulness of denominationalism is much more widely shared than it really is. A man writes them letters expressive of longing for freer union among members of different churches, and they can only ascribe it to timidity that he does not enrol himself a member. They seem to think that all free Christianity must gravitate towards this union; whereas, if it is to be what we gather a society not for promoting more Catholic unity among different denominations, but for protesting against replacing them, then we maintain it is not entitled to its name. For the freest Christian union is to be attained by, as Mr. Binney once wisely said, not destroying the walls of separation between the churches, but pulling them down low enough for men to shake hands over them.

A CORRECTION.

IN our notice last week of the late Rev. John James Tayler, which had to be drawn up mainly from memory and with no time for inquiry, we fell into a mistake respecting the place and time of his birth. From references which we had heard him make to his early years, we were led to conclude that he was born in Nottingham; but it appears that his life began as well as ended in London, his father at the time, August 15, 1797, being minister of St. Thomas's Chapel, in the Borough, and resident at Newington, and that when he removed to Nottingham his son was five years old.

USE OF SUNDAY.

WRITING on this subject, in the Liberal Christian, J. W. Chadwick says:—In its first inception, Sunday had nothing of the sombre, melancholy character which has characterised it for the last two or three hundred years. We find that this sombre and melancholy character is not even the result of a gradual process, but, to a great extent, the result of a violent reaction. The Roman Catholic Church has, so far as Sunday is concerned, the argument from antiquity entirely in its own hands. The fact that Sunday is never a day of fasting in the Catholic and Episcopal Churches, that even the Sundays in Lent are feast-days, with the exception of the Sunday before Easter, is rooted in the earliest observance of this day. As soon as it took any separate and distinct form, it was the form of joy. On other days the Christian must kneel in prayer; on that day, he "stood up on joyful feet." The early Christians had many fasts; but none of them ever came on Sunday. Says St. Ignatius, in the second century, "Every lover of Christ feasts on the Lord's day." "We deem it wicked," says Tertullian, a century later, "to fast on Sunday or to pray on our knees." St. Ambrose says, "The Manichees were damned for fasting on Sunday."

And as joy was not forbidden in the early Church on Sunday, so was not labour. But gradually, as Sunday came to be the one day for religious meetings, less work was done; and when Christianity became allied with the Roman empire, its Sunday became one of the feast-days of that empire. On these feast-days labour was considered not wicked, but in bad taste, as hindering the universal joy. In the year 321, Constantine, by an edict, forbade labour in towns on Sunday, but expressly permitted agricultural labour to go on. Not until five hundred and thirty-eight years after Christ was field labour forbidden. Gradually, as the Roman empire took Christianity in charge, it interdicted, on Sunday, the noisier and more boisterous public games, as interfering with the conveniences of Christian worship. Put the day continued one of joy and pleasure, and was given up more and more to amusement till after the Reformation. Calvin never thought much of amusement; but we have no reason to suppose that he liked it less on Sunday than on other days. He attached no supernatural importance to the day, but regarded it as purely a matter of convenience. He even went so far at one time as to think of changing it to Thursday, for the sake, he said, "of demonstrating our Christian liberty." Luther was of the same way of thinking. Heza, another of the great Reformers, was in favour of work on Sunday. Chemnitz was in favour of all labour that did not interfere with public worship. Bucer insisted that rest from work was not in itself pleasing to God.

But on the side of amusement the Catholic party went too far. Instead of confining their amusements within the bounds of simplicity and sobriety, suited to the religious character of the day, they gave it up to rude and boisterous sports. Especially was this the case in England. The Puritan movement went as far in the other direction. If the Catholics turned Sunday into a farce, the Puritans turned it into a tragedy. They put down at once every sort of amusement, every sort of work, and hedged the day about with awful penalties, civil and eternal. The Sabbatarianism of the present dates from that time. It is about two hundred years old. Its boasted pedigree is thus put to shame; its claim of Orthodoxy is thus set aside. It is proved to be a very modern heresy.

If, however, we consider this Sunday question in the light of reason and common sense, I am certain we shall not come to the conclusion that it would be better to obliterate at once every distinction between it and other days, in outward form and use and occupation; while I am equally certain that we shall conclude that there is no difference between it and other days in its intrinsic sanctity. All things that are lawful and right on other days are lawful and right on this day also. But all things are not expedient. The need for such a day is rooted deep in our social life. We had better have two Sundays than have none at all. The intense wear and hurry of our business life demand these periods of rest. Never was the demand for them so great as it is now. But that the day may be in the highest degree useful and beneficial, it is necessary that it should be regarded with quite other eyes than those which are so jealous of its present so-called rights and sanctities. Its proper use is indicated in its name, Sun-day! It is a reminiscence of the old Roman dies solis, day of the sun, for on the first day of the week the Roman people rendered to the god of the sun peculiar homage. A Sun-day forever let it be for us, a day of light and warmth; light of reason and warmth of faith; light of thought and warmth of affection; light of culture and warmth of home; light of beauty and warmth of sympathy and joy and cheer. Let the memory of its sweet and solemn joy drop like a benediction on the week, and make days good enough in themselves the better for the admonishing beauty of this one day's tender and delicious smile!

THE SPANISH REVOLUTION AND RELIGION.

AN Englishman in Spain, who writes to the Pall Mall Gazette, says:—The recent ceremonies of Corpus Christi have enabled us to measure, in the same way that those of Holy Week did, the effects of the Revolution on the Church. May is a great month in the religious year. It is the "month of Mary," the "month of flowers." And this May the priests have had in their favour the reaction of disgust produced by the violent and scurrilous language of the Republican deputies in the Cortes when the religious articles of the Constitution were discussed. Sunery Capdevila, a Catalan medical man, attained a bad eminence by brutality of this kind, of which it is sufficient to say that with more than the coarseness which brought upon Tom Paine the lash of Bishop Watson, it was destitute of Tom's vigour and comedy. As I have said before, there is no via media in Spain; all is sordid superstition or scurvy jest. The anti-Catholic party borrow every idea they have from Frenchmen, and seem ignorant of all other sources. I watched their speeches carefully, to see if any one of them had even heard of Buckle, who in his second volume has done their own historical argument for them ready to their hand. His name never occurred. The clergy "worked" Suner's folly and vulgarity well. On the assumption that the Virgin was "angry" with the attacks on her "virginal purity," they got up services of expiation, funciones de desagravio, at which swarms of the respectable took extra sacraments for days together; just as, in old Rome, there were lectisternia at periods when the gods were similarly wrathful. Whether they overdid this debasing kind of thing or not, I cannot say; but the processions of the Octave of Corpus have been failures when measured by the standard of other years. In some large towns, like Zaragoza and Barcelona the town councils refused either to attend to contribute to the expenses. In Barcelona the chief procession, that of Corpus day, avoided the great thoroughfares and confined itself to the streets in the neighbourhood of the cathedral. At a later procession, in Barcelona, a man standing by when the host passed—the host being “Jesus sacramentado,” bodily present, on this occasion even more emphatically than on others)—the man, I say, stuck his hands in his pockets and refused even to remove his hat. There was a sensation, and even a scuffle, but nobody dared to arrest him; there are too many who feel just as he did; and the “shocked” feeling of the respectable classes is known to be half of it genteel hypocrisy. Of course I don’t approve of want of courtesy of any kind, but want of courtesy may be a necessary step, and anything is better than public ko-tooing to lies. The countrymen of ours who kneel at mass instead of civilly withdrawing at the elevation are really “snobs” of the Thackerayan type; to them the mass is a kind of “peerage” which it is genteel to worship, though you know nothing of the pedigrees or the persons.

THE PASSOVER IN JERUSALEM.

A WRITER in Sunday at Home, who gained admission to the houses of several Hebrew families in Jerusalem on the night of the Passover, gives the following account of what he saw:—The same general order of things was observed in them all. A long table was arranged for the sacred meal in the centre of the chief room in the house, and both chamber and table were adorned according to the wealth and taste of the occupier. In the centre of the table was a basket containing unleavened bread. Dishes containing hard-boiled eggs and salads were scattered about, the salads representing the bitter herbs of old; and wine from the vineyards of Bethlehem, sweetened with raisins, was plentifully supplied. At sunset the entire family, old and young, gathered round the frugal board, the men at one end and the women at the other, while the children occupied places between. In front of the male members of the family was set a platter containing a piece of roast lamb, usually a cutlet from the loin. Before the repast commenced the narrative of the exodus was read in Hebrew by one of the younger sons, and the patriarch of the group now and then interrupted the reader by throwing in some explanation of the text, or answering questions which were proposed. The narrative concluded, the head of the family led the devotions of the evening by reading some liturgical prayers. Then the feast commenced, at which only the males partook of the paschal lamb, while the women contented themselves with eggs and salad. At the conclusion of the repast the ancient Psalms of David were sung in their peculiar nasal fashion, which occupation often advances into the night. To us these Jews displayed courteous hospitality, and pressed upon us their unleavened bread and very excellent wine, and when, in parting from the interesting scene, we asked an aged patriarch whether he still anticipated the advent of the Messiah, a ray of gladness lit up his furrowed face as he replied, “I am expecting his appearance every day.” On the following Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, we repaired at seven o’clock in the morning to the Chief Synagogue of the Jews in Jerusalem. During the previous night heavy showers had fallen, the “latter rain” of Scripture. This had accumulated in the narrow streets for want of drainage, until the huge pools of water and mire rendered locomotion a thing of difficulty. The water had even invaded the floor of the sanctuary, and while we were looking about for a resting-place within we were politely invited to take seats on the raised platform which occupied the centre of the building. From this conspicuous position we commanded the entire assembly. On the area some six or seven hundred persons were squatting on benches, with their legs folded under them, the books of Moses or some Hebrew liturgy on their knees, their heads covered (for the symbol of obeisance in the East is the uncovering of the feet), and a thick veil over their faces, as a memorial of the veil worn by Moses when he descended from the Mount, and which reminded us of the language of the Apostle Paul, “that to this day when Moses is read the veil is upon their hearts.” Behind thick lattice-work, in a high gallery, were to be dimly seen the female portion of the assembly, but to all appearance mere spectators of a formal and feeble service. On the platform near us sat the Chief Rabbi, who presided in the assembly; but what to us was specially interesting was the presence of a youth called up out of the assembly, as Jesus was at Nazareth, to read the Hebrew Scripture. This exercise concluded, the sacred roll was carried through every part of the edifice, that the worshippers might kiss the heaven-sent law before it was deposited in the archives by the ruler of the synagogue. A few liturgical prayers were then read, or rather nasally intoned, by the rabbi, to which responses were made in guttural and boisterous tones. The teaching element was entirely wanting, and the worship appeared to us little more than the formal and punctilious performance of religious duty.

BRIDPORT.—On Sunday last, the Rev. R. L. Carpenter, B.A., preached a sermon from 1 Tim. i. 5, “The end of the commandment is charity, out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned,” in which he paid an affectionate and respectful tribute to the memory of the late Rev. John James Tayler.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE RAFT FROM LINTZ.

FATHER FABER.

UPON the Danube and the woods
Lay evening’s red and troubled gleam,
And calmly, as a lifeless thing,
The raft from Lintz went down the stream.
And there the convent boat appears
To ask an alms of all who pass,
Oblation made with willing heart
To Mary and St. Nicholas.
And thus to great Vienna bound,
The boatmen watch the stars all night;
And for their hymn and for their alms,
They deem the weather calm and bright.
Yet who would blame the holy faith,
Altho’ to untrue forms it cling,
Which thus unto the unseen world
For blessing every thought would bring?
And those who, safe in modern powers,
Heed not the whirlpool in their way,
And count the men of Lintz untaught,
Are in true care less taught than they.
Alas! how oft hath science made
The heart obtuse, the eye untrue,
Obscuring providential tracks
With veils a woodman’s faith sees through!
We want the earth left to ourselves;
And signs where God doth hide to bless
We class, as though in classing them,
We took away their awfulness.
For this to cold, unhumble men
Is all that vaunted knowledge gives—
The raising Self by hiding God,
The disennobling of our lives.
The men of Lintz see into Heaven,
Where sages but detect its law;
Judge which the better wisdom is,
And who hath holier love and awe.
Yea, rather than this barren dream
Upon the men of Lintz should pass,
’Twere better they should kneel and pray
To Mary and St. Nicholas.

A NOTABLE WORK.

COUNT BISMARCK once presented a faithful but poor secretary with a portfolio bound like a book, in which were deposited 500 thalers. On meeting the secretary the next day, the Count asked him if he had perused the volume. “Yes, your Highness,” said the secretary, “and I was so captivated by its contents that I am waiting the appearance of the second volume with feelings of the greatest interest.” The Count smiled, but said nothing. A few days afterwards the secretary received a second portfolio bound and filled like the first, on the title-page of which was the sentence, “This work is complete in two volumes.”

PERSIAN PROVERBS.

THERE is no equivalent for religion, no compensation for time, and no substitute for one’s own soul. Since night and day are the steeds of man, they hurry him on, not he them. There are four things of which a little goes a long way: pain, poverty, error, and enmity. When faith goes out misfortune comes in; when confidence dies revenge lives; and when treachery appears all blessings fly away. By bearing the loads of men dignity is reached; by virtue rank is honoured; by morality are deeds refined. The man who is cautious in a doubtful matter is like unto him who, having lost a pearl, collects all the dust that is around the place where it hath fallen and sifts it until his lost treasure comes to light. For thus doth the cautious man collect the opinions of all in a doubtful case, and sifts them one by one until that counsel cometh to light which is suited for the emergency.

DIARIES.

BYRON was struck in early days with the interesting and graphic character of Gibbon’s journal, and he began to keep a diary of his studies, thoughts, and all that he did or heard. He is not the first nor the last man of note who has been moved by reading the great historian’s journal to imitate his example in this respect. There is no doubt that the practice of keeping a diary is good, provided it is kept with candour and with care, and the keeper of it puts his brain and life and soul into its pages. Generally, however, a diary is kept for other eyes than the writer’s, and tells what he wants others to think he thought, felt, and did, rather than what he actually thought, felt, and did; and, unless, indeed, it be a mere note of doings which are not worth the noting, and sayings which one ought to hasten to forget. Between the hypocrisy of the one and the utter worthlessness of the other, there is very little to choose. The thing which most people want more than they are aware of, is honesty in dealing with themselves and their lives. If one will be honest with himself, and faithfully tell the story of each day’s thoughts and deeds, trying constantly to think and to do something worth recording, he will find a diary a valuable aid at the time, and a source of a great deal of pleasure and profit in subsequent years. As for posterity, if a man does anything worth remembering, it is not very likely to be forgotten; but the great thing is to do the deed, not to get it remembered; to live the noble, heroic, self-sacrificing life, not to have a “biography;” to put a great thought and a holy influence into the stream of intellectual and moral forces which make civilization, and not to hold on to immortality by the finger-nails. Do the thing, at any rate, and keep the record if you can.—Liberal Christian.

LOVED AND LOST.

BY MRS. C. J. BELL.

AND can ye think, ye careless ones, because I smile
once more,
That I forget the loved, the lost, whose fate I still deplore?
I bear their mem’ry in my heart, from idle gaze enshrined,
Those whom I worshipped in my youth, the beautiful,
the kind.
Think ye too much of sunshine rests upon this weary earth,
That ye should check me when I smile, and murmur at my mirth?
Oh, who would linger longer here, if private griefs alone
Should sadden liveliest melodies, with sorrow’s with’ring tone.
Forget—and can I e’er forget, who watched, from hour to hour,
The pallid hue steal o’er soft cheeks, from death’s terrible power?
The coldness of the marble brow, the eyes unearthly bright,
Will never from the mind depart, while reason sheds its light.
And yet I am not always lone; when slumber comes to bless,
Again I see remembered forms, and feel their kind caress;
The loved, the lost, they visit me, in dreams they come to cheer—
With voices of the olden time, in accents soft and clear.
The loved, the lost, the young, the old, alike are laid to rest,
Our household band has sever’d been—our hearts were sore oppress’d.
Father, I humbly trust in Thee, Thy promise has been given,
That those who wait in patience here, shall meet the loved in heaven.

RELIGIOUS GRUMBLERS.

THE following is one of the twenty-four papers which Mr. Spurgeon published a short time since, under the title of “John Ploughman’s Talk.”—One tribe of these Ishmaelites is made up of high-flying ignoramuses, who are very mighty about the doctrine of a sermon—here they are as decisive as sledge-hammers and as certain as death. He who knows nothing is confident in everything; hence they are bull-headed beyond measure. Every clock, and even the sundial, must be set according to their watches; and the slightest difference from their opinion proves a man to be rotten at heart. Venture to argue with them, and their little pot boils over in quick style; ask them for reason, and you might as well go to a sand-pit for sugar. They have bottled up the sea of truth, and carry it in their waistcoat pockets; they have measured heaven’s line of grace, and have tied a knot in a string at the exact length of electing love; and as for the things which angels long to know, they have seen them all as boys see sights in a peep-show at a fair. Having sold their modesty and become wiser than their teachers, they ride a very high horse, and jump over all five-barred gates of Bible texts which teach doctrines contrary to their notions. When this mischief happens to good men, it is a great pity for such sweet pots of ointment to be spoiled by flies, yet one learns to bear with them just as I do with old Violet, for he is a rare horse, though he does set his ears back and throw out his leg at times. But there is a black, bragging lot about, who are all sting and no honey; all whip and no hay; all grunt and no bacon. These do nothing but rail from morning to night at all who cannot see through their spectacles. If they would but mix up a handful of good living with all their bushels of bounce, it would be more bearable; but no, they don’t care for such legality; men so sound as they are can’t be expected to be good at anything else; they are the heavenly watch-dogs to guard the house of the Lord from those thieves and robbers who don’t preach sound doctrine, and if they do worry the sheep, or steal a rabbit or two by the sly, who would have the heart to blame them? The Lord’s dear people, as they call themselves, have enough to do to keep their doctrine sound; and if their manners are cracked who can wonder? no man can see to everything at once. These are the moles that want catching in many of our pastures, not for their own sakes, for there is not a sweet mouthful in them, but for the sake of the meadows which they spoil. I would not find half a fault with their doctrine, if it were not for their spirit, but vinegar is sweet to it, and crabs are figs in comparison.

BRADFORD: OPENING OF THE NEW CHAPEL.

THE handsome Unitarian Chapel, which has now for more than a year been in course of erection in Chapel-lane, Bradford, was on Thursday week formally opened. The new chapel occupies the site of an older one which had been in use since 1719. At first it was only contemplated to spend about £2,500, but on it being found that the line of the proposed extension of Market-street would bring the church into a main thoroughfare it was resolved to venture on a much larger expenditure, in order to render the building worthy of the prominent position it would occupy. The cost of the edifice has thus been increased from £2,500 to £5,500, an increase of £3,000. The object, however, has been attained, and externally the church is a great ornament to the street.

The style of architecture which the architects, Messrs. Andrews, Son, and Pepper, have adopted is the French Gothic of the close of the thirteenth century; the street front, which extends nearly 100 feet along Chapel-lane, is composed of a gable upwards of 75 feet high, flanked by two large entrance porches. The gable is the feature of the external architecture. It is pierced with a richly moulded window, 40 feet high and 24 feet wide, with five lights, divided by clusters of shafts, surmounted by a large circle filled in with tracery of smaller circles. The porches have large and deeply-recessed arched doorways, with elaborately carved shafts and mouldings. Interiorly they are paved with encaustic tiles of a handsome pattern. The appearance of the building may be much improved at some future time, as the design includes the erection of a light and effective spire, which may be added when desired. Internally the chapel is 83 feet long by 55 broad, and consists of a nave, with side aisles and a chancel. On entering, however, it is at once seen that the usual proportions have been widely departed from. With the view of giving the whole of the congregation an unobstructed view of the minister, the aisles have been narrowed until they are merely broad and commodious passages, the congregation being all seated within the nave, up the centre of which runs a wide passage. On each side of the nave are five arches springing from massive stone shafts with tastefully carved capitals—the ornamentation of each capital being different—and supporting the main side walls, and these walls, carried up to a considerable height, are strengthened by flying buttresses extending over the side aisles. Each bay has in the aisles two angle-light windows, and in the upper part of the nave a large two-light window, having a circle above containing geometrical tracery. Between these windows stone shafts are corbelled out from the walls supporting the timbers of the roof. The ceiling, which rises upwards of 50 feet above the level of the floor, is semicircular in form, divided by main and intermediate ribs, and is painted blue. At the south or chancel end of the chapel is a lofty arch opening into an apse, which is paved with encaustic tiles and surrounded by an arcade of richly-decorated arches and tracery, with four lancet windows above. At the sides are chambers for the organ and choir, with private entrance. The pulpit is at the south side of the apse, and is of Caen stone with carved panels, containing, in the centre, discs of polished marbles and a cornice enriched by foliated ornaments. The minister's vestry is placed at the south-east corner, with separate entrance, lavatory, &c. The heating of the building will be effected by Haden's system of hot air, and the artificial lighting by gas standards and brackets of novel design. Accommodation is afforded for five to six hundred persons.

The opening services were commenced about half-past twelve. Among the gentlemen present were: Judge Stansfeld, of Halifax; Mr. F. Jackson, Mr. J. Lupton, Mr. Luccock, Mr. Talbot, Leeds; and Mr. Swaine, of York. The ministers present were: The Revs. J. L. Short, Sheffield; Charles Howe, Dewsbury; E. Kell, M.A., Southampton; T. H. Smith, Halifax; John Ellis, Elland; John Bevan, Pudsey; T. R. Elliot, Leeds; and Thomas Bincks, Leeds. The Rev. Charles Wicksteed, of Liverpool, conducted the services, which were begun by reading and singing, by the minister and the choir of the chapel, of a portion of the liturgical services. The Rev. R. Pilcher offered the dedication prayer; and the Rev. Charles Wicksteed then preached from Hebrews x., 23-25, "Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together." The service closed with a dedicatory hymn, composed by Sir John Bowring as an apology for his absence.

After the service nearly fifty ladies and gentlemen, principally from a distance, were entertained in the schoolroom, where luncheon had been provided by the congregation; the Rev. R. Pilcher in the chair.

In the evening a public tea, at which about 360 persons sat down, took place in the schoolroom, and there was afterwards a meeting, largely attended, in the chapel.

Mr. JOSEPH LUPTON presided, and in his opening remarks referred to the gratification which he had felt in the removal of the chapel which previously stood on that site, and the erection of one of those beautiful edifices which they were getting accustomed to see rising up in various parts of the country in connection with their religious body. That occasion naturally revived some painful feelings, as well as others of a pleasurable kind. During the week it had been his mournful privilege to attend to his last resting-place a man who had been one of their kindest and best friends, ever ready to give of his money willingly and heartily to the success of that church, and one who, by his labours in connection with various great charities of the town, had endeared himself to many. (Hear, hear.) He was also reminded of the loss of one of the most munificent givers to that church—the late Mr. Joseph Dawson, who died before the gift which he had promised was made, but whose family at once came forward and guaranteed that his subscription of £1,000 should not be wanting when the time came. There were others, such as the late Alderman Smith, who would have rejoiced to be present that day, which was a proud day, not only for Bradford, but for the Christian world. The chairman then stated that the funeral of the late Rev. John James Tayler on that day had prevented some of the members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Committee from being present, and went on to express his satisfaction that it had been resolved to rebuild the chapel on the old site. There was something sacred about the ground—something which many of them would never lose sight of as long as life lasted. Around the walls and under some parts of the building, lay the remains of their forefathers who had done so much for the support and success of the church in its early history. From a pamphlet which Mr. Pilcher had published, he found that the erection of the old chapel had cost only £340 3s. 5d., but it was largely built with old material from Howley Hall, which was given. The difference between that sum and the cost of the new church, which was between £5,000 and £5,500, was very great; but he was happy to say that a considerable portion of that large amount had been nobly raised by those in this town, with assistance from without; and he trusted all would do their best to second the efforts of the committee to pay off as soon as possible the debt. (Applause.) The chairman then referred to several of the ministers who had officiated in the old chapel, and hoped the trustees would take care the trust was left as open and as free as it had been granted. It was by the trust being open and free that they were now in possession of that beautiful site and building. Their forefathers did not trammel them by any stringent doctrine or special creed; they laid it down that the old building was erected for the worship of God; and there was one special point in the trust which he should like to see acted upon in future, and that was that the trustees were required to be members of and subscribers to the chapel. (Hear, hear.)

A number of interesting addresses were then given. The Rev. J. L. SHORT, of Sheffield, and the Rev. J. THOMAS, of Huddersfield, addressed the meeting on "Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over." The Rev. T. H. SMITH, of Halifax, briefly addressed the meeting on the subject, "The memory of the old place and the cause of Liberal Christianity in Bradford," and expressed his satisfaction that the principle of free and open sittings was to some extent to be carried out in that church. Mr. PRICKLES followed on the same subject, and remarked that without saying that was the only place where Liberal Christianity would be encouraged in Bradford, he did think it might be regarded as its centre. The Rev. R. PILCHER proposed a vote of thanks to the Rev. C. Wicksteed for his services, which was seconded by Mr. HALSTEAD, and the CHAIRMAN, in putting it, expressed the hope that Mr. Wicksteed's sermon would be published. (Applause.) Mr. WICKSTEED responded, and, in the course of his address, expressed a high opinion of both the borough members, Mr. Miall being, as he knew from long experience, an honest man, and Mr. Forster one of the most intellectual, thoughtful and honourable statesmen that England had seen. (Applause.) We understand since that Mr. Wicksteed has declined to publish his sermon.

Mr. J. A. BINNS, in proposing a vote of condolence with Mrs. S. C. Kell and her children, said that they stood in the presence of a great sorrow, and sympathised deeply with those who must henceforward live in the shadows of a darkened life. A great loss had fallen upon Bradford and upon them. Mr. Kell had made his mark upon the town, and the traces of his work would be seen and known for years to come. To him many of our institutions were indebted for kind and generous help, and notable among them was the Female Educational Institute, which owed to him, more than to any other man, its existence and success. To the chapel which they were now opening, and to the free faith which that chapel represented, he was a staunch and faithful friend. A consistent and advanced politician, and an active and able exponent with his pen of the political principles which were dear to him, there had been occasional manifestations of asperity against him during the heat of political fighting, but the great concourse who followed him to the grave, and who were of every shade of opinion, both in religion and politics, were proof of the esteem and love in which he was held. Memories like these were noble and permanent possessions for those who were bereaved, and they would naturally contribute in time to soothe the natural grief which, for the present, refused to be comforted. He concluded by moving a vote of hearty sympathy with the family.

The CHAIRMAN said he must be permitted to second that resolution, and in doing so spoke in warm terms of Mr. Kell's many excellencies. The congregation expressed their approval of the motion by rising and standing for a moment in solemn silence.

The Rev. EDMUND KELL, of Southampton, in a very appropriate and feeling manner acknowledged the sympathy expressed by the congregation, and would convey to the sorrowing family of his dear brother their kind feeling.

The Rev. R. PILCHER brought the speeches to a conclusion by some remarks expressive of thanks to the visitors, the chapel committee, and others who had helped in the services. The National Anthem was then sung, and the meeting was closed with prayer.

On the following Sunday, the Rev. William Gaskell, M.A., preached. The chapel was full both morning and evening. At the close of the morning sermon, he referred to the great loss which the congregation had sustained by the death of Mr. S. C. Kell, and dwelt on the heavier charge which it devolved on each member of the congregation, and the call which was made upon them to work faithfully and earnestly for the promotion of the great ends which they had in view as a Christian church.

THE FREE CHRISTIAN UNION. ANNIVERSARY MEETING.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, in last week, the first anniversary services in connection with the Free Christian Union were held at Freemasons' Hall. On Tuesday evening a religious service was conducted, of which we gave an account last week. We only allude to it further in order to say that we have reason to believe that the abstract of the Rev. C. Kegan Paul's sermon, which we quoted from the Fall Mall Gazette, and which has been widely copied, was very inadequate and incorrect, some of its passages as, e.g., that "Christ was a symbolical name for collective humanity, which they understood to be God," conveying a meaning quite different from that of the preacher.

The first annual meeting of the society and of others interested in its objects was held on Wednesday evening. The small hall was so crowded that an adjournment was necessary to the large hall, which was well filled. HENRY SIDGWICK, Esq., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, presided, and was supported on the platform by the Revs. James Martineau, W. Miall, J. H. Thom, M. Athanase Coquerel, C. H. Dall, P. W. Clayden, Mr. W. Shaen, and Mr. E. Enfield, and in the body of the hall were several well-known laymen connected with Free Christian and other congregations in London, and the following ministers:—The Revs. F. M. Gorman (curate of Kensington), Leigh Mann, M.A. (Independent), Dr. Sadler, R. Spears, H. Ierson, T. L. Marshall, W. J. Smyth, J. D. Smyth (Norwich), J. Drummond (Manchester), R. B. Drummond (Edinburgh), J. Robberds (Cheltenham), Dr. G. Vance Smith (York), J. E. Odgers (Bridgewater), R. Shaen (Royston), J. Worthington (Bolton), R. C. Jones (Derby), &c.

The TREASURER (E. Enfield, Esq.) read his report, which showed a balance in hand of about £100.

The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN, one of the secretaries, read the REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

During the eleven months of which the Committee had to render an account their duties had necessarily been chiefly tentative, involving much interesting correspondence, and clearing certain lines of future action, but accumulating no considerable materials for a business report. Traditions of theological distrust exercise a posthumous power long after their real decease, and render men slow to seek new associates and commit themselves to an untried principle of organisation. It is, therefore, no matter of surprise to the Committee that, with increasing evidence of extensive concurrence in the principles of the Union, they have yet to wait for a corresponding accession of open adhesion. The struggle between inward sympathy and outward hesitancy generally expresses itself in this form: "Your principles and aims are noble; we shall certainly join you when we see what you can do." Whereas the very condition of doing anything by associated effort is that associates do not hang back, and keep thus upon the watch. The Committee have, however, of late enrolled an increasing number of new individual members as well as an additional congregation; but, with the small resources at their disposal, they have not been able to enter upon any of the larger methods of action indicated in the original scheme. The commencement which has been made of publication by the Union, though involving some special items of cost which will not recur, has paid its own expenses. By a grant of £5 to the Free Christian Church at Lynn, the Committee desired to express their respect for the energetic efforts of the Rev. Mr. Bruce and his congregation to establish a centre of catholic religious activity in a neighbourhood where it is much needed. The success of the attempt at Lynn encourages the Norwich members of the Union to contemplate at no distant date another experiment of the same kind in a neighbourhood pre-eminently, as they believe, to give it welcome. In rendering aid to congregations thus forming themselves, the Committee act in conformity with the fourth clause of the chapter on Methods, section I in the Constitution. But in doing so they think it desirable not to assume a missionary function, but strictly to follow independent local movements, and meet well-established local wants. A sub-committee has had under consideration the expediency of publishing a volume of essays, in which the chief topics of immediate interest, ecclesiastical, theological, and moral, should be treated with scientific freedom and thoroughness by writers especially versed in them. Acting on a report approving the project, the Committee have commenced their arrangements for carrying it into effect, and believe that they can be usefully matured by their successors. Another design has been also entertained by the Committee, but reserved for the more effective action of their successors. From the very principle of your 'Union' there is no more direct consequence than this—that all formal recital of systematic creeds is out of place in public worship, and should be as completely excluded from our liturgies as it is from the express and authoritative model of Christian devotion, the Lord's Prayer. The Committee believe that the time is come for calling attention to this simple and intelligible step of Liturgical revision, and that a response is ready for a proposal to take this burden off. In conclusion, the Committee quit their year of service without discouragement from the small scope of its work. Their faith in the principles and aims of your Union is confirmed by the simultaneous appearance of precisely similar organisations in France, in Switzerland, in Holland, and in Germany, from all of which letters of cordial sympathy have spontaneously come, and from one of which an illustrious representative "has already joined in our worship, and stirred our hearts with his earnest pleadings, and will yet give us his word of fraternal fellowship and good will."

The report of which the above is a mere summary concluded with an affectionate tribute to the Rev. J. J. Taylor.

The CHAIRMAN moved, "That the reports just read be received and adopted, and printed for circulation."

The Rev. J. W. LAKE said a taint of the original defect seemed to cling to the report. It did not put the objects of the Union definitely and tangibly before them. He wished it were possible then and there to body forth some plan of action which would enable them to go forth to the world with a very practical statement of their objects and aims, so that everybody with whom they came in contact who felt even the slightest modicum of interest in the Union should understand at once whether he was with them or against them. The report had alluded to liturgical revision, but they had no right to attempt the revision of any liturgy except that of the Established Church of England, which was the common heritage of all. He did not approve either of the principles of the Liberation Society or of those of the Established Church, but he wished for a reconstituted Church which should be, not a State Church inflicted upon the people, but a public Church committed to them under the sanction of the Government. He wished to rest his religious liberties upon the sanction of the Government, because he felt that in State protection was the surest foundation for civil liberties. He therefore moved as an amendment,

"That, in presence of the impending legislative changes in the Established Church of Ireland, and in view of the probability of great changes being made in the constitution of the Established Church of England, this meeting expresses its opinion that the efforts of the committee of the Free Christian Union should be directed towards securing a reconstruction of the National Church on the basis laid down in its own preamble, the object being to free the ministers of the Established Church from the forced acceptance of the Thirty-nine Articles and the worship of the Established Church from the compulsory use of the three creeds."

The amendment, however, was not even seconded, and the original resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. CASE moved the thanks of the Union to the ministers who had officiated in the anniversary services, and that the Rev. Athanas Coquerel and the Rev. C. K. Paul be requested to allow their sermons to be printed, and giving a hearty welcome to M. Athanas Coquerel. He said it was a comfort and help to the Union to know that it had the sympathy of the foremost minds in France and Germany and America. M. Coquerel especially knew what the work they had to do was. He had commenced it himself in his own person, and their respectful gratitude was due to him for his earnest labours.

Mr. RUSSELL SCOTT, jun., seconded the resolution, which was enthusiastically received.

The Rev. A. COQUEREL responded in a long and eloquent speech, in which he gave a most interesting account of the history and struggles of the reformed church of France. We hope to give the speech entire, next week.

The Rev. LEIGH MANN proposed,

"That the formation and profession of systematic doctrinal belief in religion being strictly an individual act, while the public worship of the Church is essentially social and collective, the recital of creeds should form no part of a liturgical service; and that for relief of conscience to the Christian laity and increase of pure sincerity in prayer, it is important to remove theological confessions and faith from the ordinary devotion of the Church, and let it speak only the universal language of Christian piety and duty."

He said, while he believed that Almighty God has come so near to our own nature as to wear its form for love's sake, he could yet meet any man who believed no such thing on the grounds of Christian and simple piety and their common belief in the love of the infinite God. He could meet them with the cry that was put into our lips by the Son of God—"Our Father which art in Heaven." He would do away with everything that tended to separate him from his fellow-men in the highest and holiest part of his life—the individual relation of his soul to God. The present times were days of peculiar agitation, but there was a strong citadel to which they could retreat, and which he believed would be best defended by leaving the outworks of our theological creeds, and retiring back to the Divine love of God to man. (Applause.) There was work enough for all in the world, and he would rather stand and work with any man who would labour for God, and for love's, and for man's sake, than be the originator of the highest creed, as a creed, that the world has ever read. (Loud applause.)

The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN seconded the resolution.

Mr. H. M. MOULE recommended that the committee of the Union should seek to gain some experience from the Roman Catholic Church, which had been for more than a thousand years most successful while strictly exclusive and dogmatic.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. OLDING proposed, and Mr. ROBSON seconded, that the following gentlemen be officers for the ensuing year:

President: W. S. COOKSON, Esq. Vice-President: Henry Sidgwick, Esq. Committee: Dr. W. B. Hodgson, the Rev. Leigh Mann, the Rev. J. Martineau, the Rev. W. Miall, Herbert New, Esq., the Rev. C. Kegan Paul, William Shaan, Esq., the Rev. J. H. Thom. Sydney Williams, Esq., Alfred Wills, Esq. Treasurer: E. Enfield, Esq. Secretaries: the Rev. P. W. Clayden, and Edward Enfield, Esq. Auditors: T. C. Clarke and Rogers Field, Esqs.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by the Rev. J. MARTINEAU, terminated the proceedings.

INTELLIGENCE.

ABERDEEN.—On Sunday last Rev. Alex. Gordon, M.A., of Liverpool, preached in the Unitarian Church to large and attentive congregations. In the evening his subject was "The Church, the Bible, and the Spirit." This was the concluding one of a course of lectures which have been well attended. Several new members have lately been added to the congregation.

BLANRWYCH.—A tea-party was held in the old chapel at the above place, which is situated in the beautiful valley of Glynn Neath, on Monday, the 31st ult. The chapel is surrounded by the most romantic scenery, to enjoy which, as well as to encourage the few friends there labouring in the Unitarian cause, a large number of visitors proceeded from Merthyr, Aberdare, Treycnon, and Cwmbach. The day being fine the party turned out a great success.

DUKINFIELD.—The Sunday-school here still keeps up its reputation. The number on the books now is 483 against 477 in 1868, and the average attendance is 75·5 per cent. The number of teachers is the same as in 1868. Astley-street school has been opened as an infant school, but it is suggested that it should be made into a branch school. The monthly religious services in the chapel have been well attended. All the connected institutions are in a healthy condition. As will be seen from our advertising columns, Mr. Gaskell is to preach the annual sermons on Sunday next.

EDINBURGH.—In noticing the death of the Rev. James Cranbrook, who had been out of health for some time, the Scotsman says:—"We need not now recall the circumstances which led to the formation of a new congregation in this city by Mr. Cranbrook. All that we feel disposed to say is, that no one ever questioned his sincerity and conscientiousness, any more than his undoubted talents, and that, in addition to these qualities, there was that about his personal character which gained and secured respect and friendship. We feel assured that the intimation of his death will excite sincere sympathy among all classes for his bereaved family." Our readers will remember that he was formerly a minister among the Independents, but lapsing from orthodoxy left that body, and formed a congregation of his own.

LONDON AUXILIARY SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The annual aggregate meeting of the Sunday schools in connection with this association will be held in Unity Church, Islington, on Sunday next, the 13th inst., at three o'clock, and the devotional part of the service will be conducted by the Rev. Henry Ierson, and the address delivered by the Rev. Dr. Osgood, of New York.

STOCKPORT.—On Sunday last, a special service was held in the schoolroom, to celebrate the re-opening of the school organ, which was originally built for the congregation then worshipping in High-street. When the Unitarian Church erected in St. Peter's-gate was completed, the organ from High-street was placed in the school, and a modern instrument was presented to the church as the gift of the late James Coppock, Esq. The alterations and improvements recently made in the school organ have been effected by Mr. Edward Wadsworth, and it is now almost equal to a new one. Mr. Henry Collier, the organist of the church, presided, and the choir of the church sang suitable music, followed by a very appropriate address by the Rev. James Black. There was a large attendance of both parents and scholars, together with members of the congregation. Now that a suitable instrument is provided, it is proposed that services shall be held at frequent intervals in the schoolroom.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENT.

No anonymous letters inserted: the writer of every letter must append his name for publication. All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A Russian order of nobility, hereditary like our English Baronetage, has just been conferred by the Czar on Dr. Constantine Tischendorf, the eminent Biblical critic, in recognition of his merits in regard to science, and his successful endeavour to put Russia in possession of the oldest Bible MS.

It appears from statistics that between the 1st of January and the 31st of May last, 71 persons were converted at Vienna to the Jewish Church, 34 to the Protestant Church of Augsburg, 9 to the Swiss Protestant Church, 11 to the Roman Catholic Church, and one to the Greek Catholic Church.

The Armenian Patriarch at Jerusalem has telegraphed to his colleague at Constantinople that the images in the Armenian Church at Bethlehem have been carried off, and requesting him to apply for the assistance of the Government in recovering them.

According to a Paris contemporary, the Pope has, through Monsignor Carletti, president of the Tribunal of the Sagra Consulta, issued a circular to physicians in order that a little wholesome pressure may be brought to bear on the sick and dying for the benefit of their souls. Physicians are accordingly forbidden, under pain of excommunication, to continue visiting such of their patients as may be dangerously ill, unless such patients shall have confessed their sins within three days after the doctors have been called in, and declared their readiness to receive extreme unction!

The exhibition of articles collected during the excavations of the Palestine Exploration Fund, to which we referred last week, has been opened at the Dudley Gallery, Egyptian Hall. The collection contains four cases of ancient pottery, one of jewellery, one of glass, and two or three others which may be described as miscellaneous. Some of the specimens of pottery are in a good state of preservation. They have been dug up in the vicinity of Mount Olivet, Mount Sion, Ophel, Robinson's Arch, under the Tyropean Valley, and in the rock-cut passage of the Virgin's Fountain. Among the articles are some curious tear bottles, said to have been used by "the upper classes of Jerusalem when they thought fit to indulge in weeping." The canoe stores employed by "Rob Roy" during his recent voyage in the East are also exhibited.

The parish church of Lutterworth, Leicestershire, "Wycliffe's church," which has been closed for three and a half years for the purpose of being restored, was re-opened on Wednesday last. Associated as this venerable edifice is with the memory of the great Reformer, more than ordinary interest was attached to its restoration. Among those who took part and spoke was Elihu Burritt.

The Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda has sent to all the bishops a list of the ecclesiastical millinery which they are to bring to Rome on the occasion of the Ecumenical Council. These are, the prelatial vestments in the form prescribed by the "Roman Ceremonial" (Book I. ch. 1) for the bishops of the secular clergy and for those promoted from the regular clergy; the cappa, or cope, mentioned in the same book (ch. 3); the amice, and three chasubles (one white, one red, and one violet, but not interwoven with gold or silver, nor adorned with needlework embroidery); finally, a white cloth mitre.

Lately, a meeting of members of the religious paper paragraph from which we quote) have some body called German Catholics, who (says a news-resemblance to the English Unitarians, was held at Offenbach, near Frankfurt, and about 400 persons were present. It was resolved that a delegate should be sent to the assembly of free inquirers of all nations, which is to meet at Naples on the 8th December next, as a rival Council to the Ecumenical summoned by the Pope, and a subscription was set up on foot to raise funds for defraying the expenses of a representative.

The late Mr. J. G. Bell, of Manchester, bookseller, spent half a lifetime in illustrating a folio edition of the Bible. The work kept growing until at his death the accumulation of engravings, photographs, and original drawings filled sixty-three folio volumes. This Bible is now for sale. The celebrated Bowyer Bible reached only forty-five volumes, but then photography had not come into general use.

Mr. Hadfield has withdrawn, for the present, his Bill for affirming the rights of Nonconformists to have service read at funerals in parish churchyards by their own ministers. At this advanced period of the Session, and in the excited state of the Peers, he found there would be small chance of passing it.

The English Independent contains a letter from its correspondent in Madagascar, which completely disposes of the stories of the Roman Catholic priests that the Queen is under their influence. They made great efforts to secure her presence at the inauguration of their new chapel, and by dint of much persuasion obtained it. They made great preparation, and decorated their chapel elaborately, inside and out. The Queen, however, having advanced a few steps into the chapel, halted to receive the usual homage and "Hasina," or tribute money paid to the Sovereign of Madagascar on the erection of new buildings in acknowledgment of her nominal ownership of all lands and buildings in the country. Then she immediately turned to leave, and when the priests attempted, it is said, even by main force to retain her, and to lead her to the throne provided for her reception, threatening her with the anger of France for thus slighting the Papal religion, she continued firm, saying, "There is nothing in the treaty that obliges me to pray with you;" and forthwith she left the building. There seems little doubt that the Queen of Madagascar, with large numbers of her subjects, including some of the highest rank, has deliberately adopted the simple teachings and forms of worship offered to them by the Rev. Wm. Ellis and the other teachers of the London Missionary Society.

The other day, the Guardian mentioned the fact of Dr. Johnson, the dean of Wells, having had many bishops and other distinguished persons among his pupils; but perhaps even a greater distinction may be claimed for the Rev. J. M. Chapman, rector of Tendring, Essex, who, as tutor of Balliol, numbered among his pupils the present heads both of the English Church and of the Romish Church in England—Archbishops Tait and Manning.

The following curious advertisement lately appeared in the Record:—"The friends of any evangelical clergyman having two thousand guineas at command, can obtain a position of eminence for him. Address ———." We cannot help wondering whether the evangelicism or the money is the more essential.

The Ritual Commissioners, according to the John Bull, have agreed to a report on the Lectionary, in the consideration of which they have been engaged for some time. They have prepared an extra table of lessons for use at Evensong on Sundays, have changed many lessons for Holydays, leaving only four first lessons from the Apocrypha, and about forty-seven for daily service. The Books of Chronicles are to be read, the lessons curtailed, and the divisions of chapters not always followed. The Gospels and the Acts are to be read once in the year at Evening Prayer, and the Revelation in Advent.

The Bishop of London has issued a commission to inquire into the charges against the Rev. Charles Voysey. The Commissioners are Sir Travers Twiss, Archdeacons Hale and Sinclair, and the Revs. J. E. Kemp and J. Moorhouse, who, it is understood, will meet at London House on Thursday the 24th.

The Rev. E. Samuel Marsden, grandson of the well-known Australian missionary, has been appointed to the bishopric of Bathurst, Australia. Mr. Marsden graduated B.A. at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1855, coming out among the Junior Optimes. He was ordained deacon in 1855, and priest in 1856.

The report of the Committee appointed February, 1869, by the Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury, for the purpose of considering clergy discipline, has been laid before the House. On the whole it is the opinion of this Committee:—1. That canons on clergy discipline fitting for these times should be enacted under licence from the Crown; that measures should be taken for obtaining a repeal of the Clergy Discipline Act, 3 and 4 Vict., cap. 86, and for facilitating, expediting, and cheapening proceedings in enforcing clergy discipline. 2. That bishops and metropolitans should preside personally in their own courts at times when judgment is pronounced; that bishops and metropolitans should preside personally in their own courts during the whole time of trial when causes concerning doctrine or the rites and ceremonies of the Church are tried; that causes should not be carried from Diocesan Courts by letters of request to the provincial courts, but only in due course of appeal; that proceedings should be cheapened and expedited in ecclesiastical courts by the adoption of methods such as are above recommended; that definite courses of procedure should be adopted for the correction of offending bishops and metropolitans. 3. That as the final resort in ecclesiastical causes in this country is to a lay tribunal, the methods of proceeding there adopted should be regulated by the principles which, under like circumstances, prevail in other civilised countries, and which, as above detailed, govern the jurisprudence of our own with respect to the proceedings of all other secular courts whatsoever, excepting only the Judicial Committee of Privy Council.—The Lower House has resolved that these recommendations be adopted, and that the prolocutor be requested to convey this resolution to the Upper House, respectfully requesting that the President and the bishops will provide for a due consideration by Parliament of the principles and suggestions contained in the report.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Archdeacon of Rochester, in his visitation charge at Hertford, on Friday, said he looked upon the abolition of compulsory church rates without regret, believing that it would tend to make laymen more sensible of the responsibility which rested upon them, and to unite the clergy and the laity more heartily in doing the Church's work.

The Church of Scotland, while opposing the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, unconsciously furnishes an instructive argument the other way, by calling on Parliament to abolish "Patronage." The Fall Mall Gazette thus ably presents the bearings of what is proposed:

"The spectacle of an Established Church, in which the popular vote is pre-eminently in selection of pastors, is a novelty in this if not in all countries. Are the conditions compatible? Will Dissenters continue to allow a church to receive State support which is in all other respects exactly as they are? There are some, indeed, who hope that with the removal of the grievance all Dissenters would return to the bosom of the Church. But can it be expected that old jealousies will thus easily be allayed, and above all, that the endowments can be amicably partitioned among the late rivals? Or will the aristocracy of Scotland, and the landlords still give even tacit protection to a church in which they will have no longer the semblance of personal interest? These are questions which only time can answer, but they certainly strike us as questions to which in a very short time a tolerably clear answer will be made. At all events, if disestablishment is to come we must congratulate our Northern friends on having arranged how it shall be effected most cheaply, by cutting in good time some of the connecting cords between the Church and private interests, and saving the necessity of giving compensation to owners of advowsons by first making them valueless."

At length the party who think the Church is to be saved by multiplication of bishops, have appealed to Mr. Gladstone. They ask to have an Act of Henry VIII.'s legalising the creation of Suffragans put in force. The Freeman says of this

"Mr. Gladstone did not give them much comfort. He insisted as a first and indispensable condition of Government action that those who were in want should agree as to what they wanted. He reminded them of the impression produced by dioceses getting on very well with disabled bishops, and by the number of Colonial bishops at home, who yet drew pensions for their services. Mr. Gladstone told them that personally the number of Episcopal persons unemployed led him to fear the effect of any multiplication of bishops, and that he thought it had an injurious effect on the Episcopal order. Mr. Gladstone might have told them that what really disgraced the order was that being, on its own theory, an institution supernaturally endowed with the highest gifts of the Holy Spirit, the most conspicuous of Episcopal gifts was that bishops who had perhaps even accumulated large fortunes, cling to their large salaries, as if doing so was more important at ninety years of age than their work being done by a physically competent successor."

The Guardian, however, reads Mr. Gladstone's reply more hopefully. Though not finding any fault with Mr. Gladstone's request for some agreement as to what is wanted, it thinks he should have given them a little more insight into the probabilities of gaining a favourable hearing from the Cabinet for one or another of the schemes for the extension of the Episcopate:

"Few persons are disposed to make suggestions or requests without some kind of intimation as to the welcome they may be likely to receive; and it is a little hard upon Churchmen to have to decide on the measures for which they will ask without knowing—approximately at least—the limits and conditions of their choice. However, there seems to be more hope of coming to an understanding on the subject than we have had for many years past. If that hope is frustrated, we sincerely trust that it will not be due to any impracticable conditions interposed by the bishops themselves.”

“Monitor,” in the Guardian, hoists Mr. Disraeli very neatly with his own petard! He writes:

“I see with great alarm that the Conservative members of the House of Lords talk of throwing out the Irish Church Bill. The alarm I feel is for the safety of the Irish clergy if the Lords really do throw out the bill; because Mr. Disraeli said, in his speech on the third reading, that it was evident the Irish people did not care much about the Irish Church Establishment, for they had never murdered a clergyman, but only landlords and agents. This seems to be a suggestion that the Irish Fenians may not be slow to act upon; and it is much to be feared that if the Lords throw out the bill, some unfortunate clergyman will be murdered, in order to prove that the people do wish the bill to pass. If this sad result should take place, Mr. Disraeli will have the onus on his conscience, unless he counsels his party in the House of Lords to pass the bill.”

The Tablet, in a review of “The Subjection of Women,” says:—“Once reconciled to the Church, and a good Catholic, Mr. Mill would, under her guidance, become a truly great man.” Surely our contemporary had been reading Burns’s “O, wad ye tak’ a turn an’ mend!” The one conversion is about as probable as the other.

The very small increase of “members” during the past year—a little over 3,000—continues to be discussed in Wesleyan circles with deep interest. Many are the causes which are set down as contributing to this result, but the Wesleyan Times thinks that none are nearer the truth than those which relate to the terms of membership in the Church. People are getting to dislike this separation of “the Church” from the congregation. It is noticeable that the small increase in the Wesleyan Church is accompanied by a similar state of things in Primitive Methodism. The increase for the present year will in all probability be under 2,000.

On the 31st May, a great meeting of Protestant representatives of Germany, Austria, and France, was held at Worms, to deliberate on a common reply to the Pope’s invitation to return to the bosom of the Catholic Church, in view of the coming Œcumenical Council. After a report from Dr. Schenkel, and a long discussion, the following resolution was adopted:—“The Protestant meeting protests against the pretensions put forth in the Apostolic letter of the 13th of September, 1868, of a return to the communion of the Roman Catholic Church, and adduces as the principal motive of the religious schism hierarchical errors, and especially the spirit and action of the Order of Jesuits. Finally, it protests against all the efforts directed to the predominance of those dogmas which are the denial of the Protestant spirit.” The Osservatore Romano of the 1st of June has the following comment on this piece of intelligence:

“The Holy See, inviting dissidents to return to the sheepfold of Christ, has only fulfilled its divine mandate of diffusing light in the midst of darkness, and propagating truth in the midst of error. The Holy See is the infallible teacher of truth, and errors only exist in the brains of those who repudiate the light of faith for which they dream they can substitute the pride of individual reason, which is rationality. The Jesuits have been brilliantly defended, even lately, in the French Senate, and they are not moved by the accusations brought against them in noisy meetings. The Protestant spirit is only an impotent effort of which England offers a splendid example. Seeing her children of the most exalted intelligence converted to Catholicism, she contemplates with astonishment the future Œcumenical Council, and hails it as a prelude to salutary changes and marvellous effects.”

The reference to the Free Church of Scotland as affording a miserable example of the clerical starvation which comes of Voluntarism, disposed of in Parliament, has risen again in the columns of the newspapers, and a letter in the Daily News conclusively shows that the very basis of fact on which Sir J. D. Elphinstone has repeated the charge in reality arises from a development of activity, which confirms Mr. Gladstone’s remark that the attitude of the Scotch Church referred to, and its marvellous exertion on being stripped of all those compensations which this Bill preserves for the members of the present Church of Ireland, and when it was threatened with utter extinction, could be described by no lower word than moral majesty. The writer says that it is true that the Free Church has never succeeded in getting the average from its “sustentation fund” above £150, the “dividend” given this year and last. But it is also true that if the Free Church had been content with the mere burden of a national Church thrown upon her in 1843—with supporting all the ministers and keeping up the congregations then taken charge of—in that case the minimum would have been considerably above this £150. The reason why it has never risen above that amount is this—the Free Church, rightly or wrongly, has become a missionary church at home. Men like Dr. Chalmers and Dr. Guthrie, becoming acquainted with what they called the “moral heathenism” of our great cities, raised a cry of pain, and the result was the establishment of mission churches in great towns. Now here is the fact for Sir James Elphinstone. It has been found impossible to give all these struggling and new churches at first the “equal dividend” of £150, and in many cases the ministers of the new charges, often the flower of the youth of the Free Church, have had to contend with great difficulties. Sir James taunts them with this, and it is all true. The Free Church cannot deny it. It has presumptuously attempted to do more than keep up its own framework, and it has instituted missions at home with the most signal success. That is the present position of the Free Church. Sir James Elphinstone sneers at it, and Mr. Gladstone thinks it majestic. There is no hope of altering the views of either, but all men can judge whether encouragement or alarm is to be derived for the Irish Church when it steps into the open, swathed and surrounded by the endowments of a whole generation.

On an advertisement of a bazaar “on behalf of the Palestine Christian Union Mission to the Arabs,” Punch pertinently asks, “Has not a word dropped out here? Ought it not to be ‘to the Street Arabs?’ Too many of them may be found in London, looking as though they sorely needed attention from some Mission or other. Cannot Arabia wait until heathen London shows a little more improvement?”

REVIEW.

The Theological Review for April. London: Williams and Norgate.

Our notice of the last number of this able periodical has been delayed longer than usual, not, however, from any lack of interest in its articles, but from the desire to give to one or two of them something more than the brief characterisation to which we are usually obliged to limit ourselves.

It begins with an article by Miss Cobbe on “Milman’s Annals of St. Paul’s,” which certainly must redeem this number, at least, from the charge of heaviness which we sometimes hear brought against the Review by people who are disinclined for more serious thought or study than such as is suggested by a newspaper or a novel. Miss Cobbe is always readable. Her pleasant, gossipy style, lighted up with constant flashes of humour, of the enjoyment of which she even expresses a private hope that “we may none of us be deprived in heaven,”—and brimming over with anecdote and allusion, makes her running comment on the Dean’s historical sketch a treat to read even though it leaves no very definite impression of purpose behind it.

“The Mission of John the Baptist” is an investigation by Mr. Wm. Jevons of the accounts given of the Baptist in the four Gospels, which are very minutely and carefully compared, and from the discrepancies of which Mr. Jevons gathers that their details are to a considerable extent legendary; that John was really an independent religious reformer, though “of the same school” as Jesus; and that the idea of his being the forerunner and witness to Christ rather grew out of the event than was really present to his mind.

We opened the article on “The Life, Labours, and Creed of Ulfla, Bishop of the Goths,” with a pleasurable expectation, which it hardly fulfils. The record of the times when Christianity was silently spreading from its Roman centres through the very hordes that were gradually closing in upon the decadent and enfeebled empire is full of interest. We hoped for a biographical study; an attempt to discern, through the dim records which remain, something of the living presence and work of the Apostle of the Goths. We have instead, from Dr. Samuel Davidson, a learned critical dissertation, partly on the discrepancies in the accounts of his life, but chiefly on the verbal and textual peculiarities of Ulfla’s Gothic version of the Bible. This, however, is, we need hardly say, very ably and fairly done, and will make the work easier for some future sketch of the more biographical kind. We have not time to follow Dr. Davidson’s criticisms, but it is a relief to find that he thinks there is no good reason for doubting the quaint story of Philostorgius, that Ulfla, in translating the Bible for his people, omitted the warlike books of Kings as likely to supply a stimulus by no means desirable to the savage and sanguinary instincts of the barbarians whom his life was devoted to softening and civilising.

The biographical branch of study is, however, sufficiently represented in the number by the Rev. C. Kegan Paul’s admirable and appreciative article on John Keble, and the editor, Mr. Beard’s, account of “The Curé of Ars,” John Baptiste Marie Vianney, one of the noblest types of the saintly parish priest produced by the modern Romish Church.

Huddled together into one article at the end of the number as “Miscellanea Theologica,” much in the same way as, in subscription lists, after the guineas, we find the widow’s mites lumped into “Sums under five shillings,” are two articles shorter, indeed, but none the less interesting on that account. The first is by Mr. Samuel Sharpe, “On the Enigmatical Passages in the Bible,” and gives some very curious instances of historical allusions disguised under supposititious names, and even under a reversing of the alphabet akin to some kinds of cypher writing. The second is by Mr. Harry Rawson, on “The Expediency of an Extended Lectionary in Public Worship.” Mr. Rawson thinks that our services suffer by the “lessons” being taken only from the Bible. He points out with some force that in Sunday-schools reading was once as rigidly confined to the Bible as it still is in the churches; and that the Sunday home reading for young and old was formerly limited in the same way. The Bible has, however, been found insufficient to supply these wants. Why should we not in like manner look beyond it in our public worship? We fully admit the argument, and that there are vast stores of religious literature outside the covers of the Bible, from which passages full of beauty and instruction might be drawn. And yet we cannot agree with our friend’s practical conclusion. In the first place, we do not admit that the limitation to the Scriptures “is practically to say that the streams of revelation ceased some 2,600 years ago,” or rests upon the belief that the books of the Bible are inspired. The custom, we apprehend, rests not upon a common theory of inspiration, but upon the universal reverence which produced the theory of inspiration, instead of being produced by it. The question is whether any other selection of sacred literature could be formed which would secure the reverence even of any single church, let alone winning the consensus of Christendom, necessary to its being put upon the same footing as the Bible. We do not think it possible, and as for ministers of religion being cast adrift in the ocean of religious—or what they might deem religious—literature without restriction, we own we shudder to think of the congregational sufferings which might be involved.

THE GREAT MEETING AT WORMS.

As none of the English religious papers reach me here, it is of course impossible for me to form an estimate of the opinion in England upon the late Protestant Council at Worms. Such English papers as I have seen, have regarded it only as an Anti-papal meeting of the type common at Exeter Hall. If it be not too late, will you kindly allow me to call the attention of your readers to a fact which has perhaps hitherto escaped them, viz., that the “Council” was summoned by the Liberal party of South Germany. It is most significant that one of the principals was the celebrated Dr. Schenkel, the heterodox professor of the heterodox University of Heidelberg. The meeting met with little or no support from the orthodox party. They stood coldly aloof, showing that they felt that in reality the movement was as much directed against them as against Rome.

It is my good fortune to have been present at the Council, and certainly it was the most important and impressive meeting I ever attended. The immense congregation was mainly composed of peasants and farmers, many of whom had come from a great distance. Among those who attended as deputations there was a gentleman who had come from Hungary. The congregation at once proved how wide spread and deep rooted the liberal feeling is in Germany. While the meeting was called to protest against the invitations of Rome, its objects went much further. For the key note of every speech was, that henceforth the human conscience is to be free from every priestly yoke of every sort. Without any violent demonstration, or invective of any kind, the people, quietly, but decidedly and unanimously declared that they regarded the conscience as free, and that all religion must be in true harmony with Modern Knowledge and Culture.

I have since been informed on good authority that it is intended to print the day's proceedings, and distribute the copies throughout Germany for signature, and then to forward them—not to Rome—but to the Prussian Government, as a hint that the German Protestants are determined to bear no religious yoke of any sort.

CHAS. T. POYNTING.

OUR AMERICAN ANNIVERSARIES.

OUR Unitarian friends in the United States had their equivalent to our Whit-week meetings, in Boston, during the week commencing May 23rd.

The Meeting of Ministers was held in the handsome vestry of the new Church of the Disciples, and was well attended, a larger number of ministers from abroad than usual being present.

The Conference meeting, on Tuesday morning, was held at the Hollis-street Church, and was largely attended. The Rev. W. P. Tilden conducted the opening services, and spoke with feeling and pertinency on the Sonship of Humanity. He was followed by the Rev. S. H. Winkley, the Rev. Dr. C. Palfrey, the Rev. Thos. Timmins, of England, the Rev. C. F. Barnard, Mrs. Gibson, and the venerable Father Taylor.

The forty-fourth annual meeting of the Unitarian Association was held in the same place on Tuesday, at 10 a.m., the Hon. Thomas D. Eliot presiding, and the Rev. Joseph Osgood offering prayer. After reading the records of the last year's meeting, C. C. Smith, Esq., treasurer, presented his annual report, from which we learn that the income of the association last year was $98,345.35, and the expenditures were $92,543.03. The Receipts embrace: Donations, $47,337.06; for India Mission, $2,133.86; merchandise (sale of books, &c.), $21,107.11; with the following Payments on sundry accounts, viz.: New England States, $8,845.09; Middle States, $10,783.40; Southern States, $2,405.25; Western States, $12,481.17; India Mission, $3,175.74; National Conference, $1,199.21; ladies' commission on Sunday-school books, $115.87; African Methodist Episcopal Church, $556.45; Sunday-school Society, $1,000; theatre preaching, $810.99; Monthly Journal, $8,671.80; merchandise (books, &c.), $24,008.81; salary of secretary and assistant secretary, cost of stationery, fuel, postage, advertising, &c., $7,582.04.

The Rev. Chas. Lowe then read the report of the executive committee, from which it appears that

The association assisted 69 societies last year, and supplied preaching in 124 places where no Unitarian societies exist. It has been unable, for lack of means, to assist societies in building churches, as it would gladly have done. Owing to the increased efficiency of the local conferences, the missionary work of the denomination has been carried on with more success than ever before, and missionaries have been appointed and paid for, to some extent, from the funds of the association to work within the limits and under the direction of the conferences. The Rev. Dr. Stebbins has been appointed general missionary, and will begin work the first of June. He gave an account of the theatre preaching, which has been carried on hitherto as an experiment. The results show that, as a method of missionary activity, this plan of operations deserves careful consideration. An additional missionary has been sent to India, and the appropriation for that mission has been increased. A good deal of un-denominational work has been begun, and more would have been done but for want of means. Libraries for ministers of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, consisting of 40 volumes selected by the bishop, will soon be distributed. About 300 copies of books and tracts have been circulated, and books have been given to 43 different institutions. Ministers have received 3,300 volumes from the association, and $20,000 worth have been sold. The plan of having collections taken up in the churches on the first Sunday in November is an excellent one, and should be continued. Fifty-eight churches gave $17,000 last November, and the contributions of the other churches carried the sum up to $42,000. Mr. Lowe closed his admirable report with a fervent and eloquent appeal in behalf of the objects and works of the association and the cause of liberal Christianity.

The Hon. Thomas Gaffield spoke of the encouraging contrast between the contributions of late years and those of former times, urging more system in taking up collections for denominational purposes. The Rev. E. E. Hale offered the following resolution:

Resolved,—That the Unitarian movement in America ought to be represented by a literary, scientific, and theological review, such as may command the respect and sympathy of the liberal Christian public; that this review should be issued under the auspices and at the charge of the Unitarian Association, and that the executive committee be directed to take measures as soon as possible for the establishment of such a review; that, as a basis for its publication, they be requested to make such arrangements with the proprietors of the Christian Examiner as may unite that journal, which has so ably represented us in the past, in the journal now proposed.

The Rev. Mr. Hale supported the resolution.

The Rev. A. D. Mayo thought the Association should be the great book-concern of the denomination and own and issue all the works the denomination needs. The Rev. Dr. Stebbins thought that such a magazine as was proposed would be less successful in the hands of the Association than in those of private individuals. The Rev. Crawford Nightingale thought the new magazine should contain articles of a miscellaneous character and general interest, as well as those of a theological cast. The Rev. Dr. Bulfinch doubted whether such a magazine could be managed by the Association with success, and wanted it referred to the Executive board. The Rev. H. C. Badger wanted a further discussion of the subject, and urged the importance of a "voice" that would make itself heard. The Rev. C. H. Brigham thought the denomination needed an organ that should represent its best thought and culture, as none does at the present time. The Rev. Dr. Bellows thought our need, at the present time, was not a popular magazine, but a learned philosophical and theological review. The Examiner has been allowed to die of neglect. It has a great name, has exerted a vast influence, and can be very easily revived and made one of the most influential and valuable journals in the country. Individuals should be relieved of the load with which they have encumbered themselves by the denomination, whose work they are doing at personal loss. The denomination cannot afford to be deprived of the stimulus and character which a dignified and scholarly organ would give it. The Rev. A. D. Mayo did not quite agree with Dr. Bellows' idea of making the review purely philosophical and theological, and thought such miscellaneous writings as those of Mr. Hale, and others, could be printed in it with profit. The Rev. Mr. Hale thought the denomination should own and carry on its own works. It was a shame to ask private individuals to do this for a rich denomination, and the denomination cannot afford to risk its publications to the chances of popular favor in private hands. The subject was further discussed by the Revs. Messrs. Nightingale, Lowe, Tiffany, and Osgood, when it was voted to refer the whole subject to the Executive Committee, with full power. The Unitarian Association has thus practically voted to purchase the Christian Examiner, and make it an organ worthy of the intelligence and scholarship of the denomination and suited to the wants of the age. The Examiner is an old magazine. It dates back to the early days of Unitarianism. It has been conducted by some of the ablest men and best scholars in the Unitarian body. It has had among its contributors a succession of accomplished students, authors, essayists, and preachers such as few magazines in this country can boast. Its articles compare favorably in talent, style, and intrinsic value with those of any similar magazine in the world.

At 12 o'clock the polls were opened for the election of officers, and continued opened half an hour, when the following who had been proposed by the Nominating Committee were elected: President, the Hon. Thomas D. Eliot, of New Bedford; Vice-Presidents, Henry P. Kidder, of Boston, and the Hon. Seth Padelford, of Providence; Secretary, the Rev. Charles Lowe, of Somerville; Assistant Secretary, George W. Fox, of Dorchester; Assistant Secretary for the West, the Rev. Charles H. Brigham, of Ann Arbor, Michigan; Treasurer, Charles C. Smith, of Boston; Directors, the Rev. Robert Collyer, the Rev. Edward H. Hall, the Rev. George H. Hepworth, the Rev. Leonard J. Livermore, the Rev. Grindall Reynolds, the Rev. Richard Metcalf, the Rev. Abram W. Stevens, the Rev. John F. W. Ware; William Chickering, the Hon. Freeman Cobb, William Crosby, Martin P. Kennard, Arthur T. Lyman, and George O. Shattuck. Several matters of minor importance were acted upon, when the Association adjourned.

The Unitarian Association held its great public meeting at Music Hall, on Tuesday evening last, which was very fully attended, and the exercises of which were especially animated and interesting. After prayer by the Rev. Dr. Morison, and the singing of a hymn, the President (Hon. T. D. Eliot), the Revs. Medcalf, Dr. Bellows, E. E. Hale, Adams Ayer, and J. F. W. Ware delivered addresses.

The Unitarian Festival, at Music Hall, a banquet annually given by the laymen to the ministers present at the meetings, is an occasion without which Anniversary week would be sadly incomplete, and, as usual, the laymen of Boston and vicinity sent greeting, at an early day, to their friends of the pulpit, inviting them to meet in Music Hall, on Thursday afternoon, at five o'clock. At that hour the great hall presented a beautiful and animated spectacle. Tables bountifully spread filled the hall, the platform, and the balcony at the end, while about them were seated many of the best and the fairest representatives of the culture and refinement, not of Boston alone, but of all New England. Floral decorations were suspended from the galleries and grouped with lavish profusion on the platform, refreshing the eye with their beauty, and loading the air with the fragrance of spring. Among the distinguished clergymen and laymen on the platform were the Revs. Drs. Bellows, Peabody, Hedge, Stearns, Bartol, Stebbins, Clarke, and Morison; the Revs. Messrs. Hale, Mayo, Brigham, Hepworth, O. B. Frothingham, of New York, Chadwick, Bailey, of Portland, J. F. W. Ware, of Baltimore, A. P. Putnam, of Brooklyn, C. Briggs, R. M. Hodges, and David Reed, and the Hon. Josiah Quincy, the Hon. Ginery Twichell, the Hon. F. W. Lincoln, jun., the Hon. Otis Norcross, Judge Chapin, of Worcester, and the Hon. George B. Emerson. The chairman opened his address with a cordial welcome—

"To the clergymen who are here from all parts of the country, with their good wives, to the clergymen who are here without their wives, and to the young clergymen who are here alone—poor fellows!—because they have no wives to bring with them, but who, we trust, when the festival of 1870 comes round, will have some one to sit by their side other than a stranger—to each and all of you, the laymen of Boston give a most cordial welcome to the festival of 1869."

Of the other meetings held during the week we have only space for very brief mention.

The Union for Ministerial Work and Help had its first annual meeting on Monday afternoon at the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Union, 300, Washington-street. The Rev. E. E. Hale explained its objects, which were to promote a better acquaintance among the clergy of the Unitarian denomination; the enabling of parishes which are in need of ministers, and ministers who are without parishes, to be brought together, and to make provision for the care of the families of its members should circumstances make it needful.

A great mass meeting of the Sunday-school children was also held and the anniversary of the Young Men's Christian Union.

Our contemporary the Boston Christian Register also says:

"The morning Conference meetings during the week were well attended. These must be regarded as among the most valuable gatherings of the week. The communion service on Thursday was impressive, and the hearts of those present were brought into the fellowship of the Spirit. The unceasing interest from year to year for so long a period in these devotional meetings proves that they meet a very general want of the religious life."

FRIDAY, JUNE 18, 1869.

THE PROSECUTION OF MR. VOYSEY.

IF "uneasy lies the head that wears a crown," what must be the sensations of the head that wears a mitre in these troubled ecclesiastical days? If things go on much longer as they are doing at present we may find nolo episcopari uttered in seriousness and intended to be taken at its word. What with the Ritualists, who are always foremost in clamouring for more Bishops, but equally ardent in denouncing those they have; and what with the Times, which clamours for the Bishops to take active measures; and what with the Ecclesiastical Courts, the only certain thing about which is their costliness; and what with the heretics and their aidors and abettors, the Bishops surely have a bad time of it just now.

Hitherto the Archbishop of York has been comparatively exempt from the peculiar plagues which infest ordinary sees, and has won a good reputation for activity without attacking anybody. In an evil hour, however, he was beguiled, or perhaps worried, by some of those clerical busybodies who enjoy the spectacle of episcopal prosecutions none the less for having neither the odium nor the expense to bear, into commencing a suit against the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, who from his quiet parsonage at Healaugh has for some years been sending forth "Slings and Stones" sufficiently irritating, it must be allowed, to the orderly Anglican mind. For, let any one read the following queries which are culled out of his own list (in the preface to the third series of these Sermons) of those on which he specifically challenges the common thought of orthodox churches:

"Is it true that the human race was ever under the curse of God?"

"Is it true that God needs the intervention of another to mediate with men, and to bring them into a state in which He will be more favourable towards them than He is already?"

"Is it true that there is any God but He who made us?"

"Is it true that God ever was, or ever is, at a distance from this world, so that in any sense it can be true that He comes and goes to and from the earth, or sends some one to act as envoy on His behalf?

"Is it true that the doctrine of vicarious punishment is of any moral benefit to mankind, or at all redounding to the honour of God?"

"Is it true that men are to be saved or lost according to their religious belief?"

But, then, see the effect of a threatened prosecution? Mr. VOYSEY becomes a hero. The unhappy episcopal instrument is pilloried in the newspapers and pelted with sarcasms and hard words. There is general hilarity among unclerical people who enjoy a row among the parsons, and chuckle most delightedly over the discomfiture of a Bishop. A defence fund is started, and the prosecutor sees his proceedings condemned by men to whose opinions he cannot be indifferent. We have before us the circular of the Voysey Defence Fund. Among the names down upon it are Lord AMBERLEY, Dr. DAVIDSON, Dr. HINDS (late Bishop of Norwich), Sir CHARLES LYELL, Rev. Prof. JOWETT, JOHN RUSKIN, Miss F. P. COBBE, and the Dean of Westminster, Rev. A. P. STANLEY! Dr. STANLEY indeed has not confined himself to the general support involved in a £10 note, but publishes his reasons in a long and careful letter which is now made public. We cannot follow all his arguments, suffice it that, while "strongly deprecating" Mr. VOYSEY's "mode of treating Biblical and sacred subjects," he regards it "as an exaggeration caused by equally reprehensible exaggerations of another kind," and expresses strongly his "sense of the utter impolicy and practical injustice" of all such prosecutions. But if the Archbishop is unfortunate in his enemies, he is almost more unfortunate in his allies. It is not pleasant to a man who has chosen the part of an active moderate Churchman with Evangelical leanings, to find himself distinctly opposed by Dr. STANLEY, but what must it be to be patted on the back by the ultra-ritualists of the English Church Union? And yet he has had to suffer even this. That august body, which has been a thorn of infinitely larger dimensions than Mr. VOYSEY in the side of all steady going Bishops, is taken with a virtuous furor for the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and though its leaders have themselves only just escaped deprivation by the skin of the teeth, raises £500 to help Dr. THOMSON in depriving Mr. VOYSEY. That no element of absurdity might be lacking, some evil genius prompted them for once to an ebullition of fraternity towards a body nearer home than Rome or Greece, and they made overtures to the Church Association, which is strongly Evangelical, to raise a like amount and offer it to the Archbishop as a joint encouragement to him. Their overtures however were twice over rejected; the Church Association would have nothing to do with them. Thereupon they addressed themselves direct to Dr. THOMSON, who with equal promptitude and decision declined their offer, plainly telling them that the proceedings of some of them, who appeared to represent the Union, and had not been disowned, had been such towards him for two or three years past in his "difficult office" that he could not accept a gift of this kind "as an appropriate sequel." So here is £500 for the prosecution of heresy going a begging, and the hostility of the different sects which make up the so-called Church of England has now reached this point that they will not even take each other's money!

What does all this teach? It is the reductio ad absurdum of ecclesiastical prosecutions, all dispassionate observers will say at once. We admit this, but we do not think this is its only lesson. To us it speaks far more powerfully against the system, out of which such prosecutions grow, of attempting to maintain a forced union between elements of religious thought which manifest no disposition to unity, and which if left to themselves would live and work apart. Better they should live and work apart. If they do not, however, the onus of the disturbance and disquietude rests with those who, accepting certain conditions of union, deliberately ignore them. It is simple nonsense for men who accept a creed, and avail themselves of the position which the acceptance of that creed gives them, to talk about making a struggle for liberty. Mr. VOYSEY is morally right in the abstract in exercising the freedom of his mind, but the moral edification of his testimony is very largely discounted by the fact that he persists in enjoying the luxury of freedom in a position the price of which is the deliberate promise of conformity. It may be a praiseworthy pursuit to destroy dandelions; but if a man obtain admission to the public garden of a community which cultivates dandelions under the distinct condition of conforming to their principles and practices, it is a questionable kind of heroism to indulge his destructive principles there. Nor is the case mended by the fact that the beadle may not be agile enough to catch him. Let him go outside, and then his protest, if less striking by its audacious inconsistency, will have more of true dignity, and in the end will be more effective.

THE LATE REV. J. J. TAYLER, B.A.

At the first meeting of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, held June 8th, 1869, Samuel Sharpe, Esq., president, in the chair, the following resolution, proposed by the Rev. Henry Ierson, and seconded by Alfred Lawrence, Esq., was unanimously adopted, to be signed by Samuel Sharpe, Esq., president, and the Revs. R. Brook Aspland and Robert Spears, secretaries:

"That the death of their late associate, the Rev. John James Tayler, Principal of Manchester New College, London, calls for the expression of their deep sorrow, and of their profound respect for his memory. That they remember with gratitude a long series of disinterested and valuable services rendered by him to this Association. That, extending their view to the varied labours of his life, they desire to record their admiration of his attainments as a scholar, of his benignant spirit, and of his generosity in promoting every good and Christian work."

"That a copy of this resolution, together with the resolution adopted at the Anniversary Meeting, in relation to Mr. Tayler's visit to the Unitarian Church in Hungary, be forwarded to Miss Tayler, with the assurance of the sympathy of every member of the committee with her in her sorrow, and of their hope that she may be comforted by the recollection of the pure and noble life of her late father, and by the prospect of a re-union with him in the better world above."

"NOTHING THAT IS FAIR CAN STAY."

"NOTHING that is fair can stay."

Those fond forms we have caressed,
Those young hearts we oft have blessed—
Weary wanderers after rest—

They have found a purer kingdom,
And a lighter, brighter home;
Where no breast is heaved with sighing,
Where no eye is red with crying;
Where no flower is reared to perish

'Neath the chilling blasts of winter,
And no grief can ever come:
Friends that here we may not cherish,
Now have passed the mystic portals
To the land of the immortals,
To the home where peace shall flourish
In eternal bloom;

There they greet us, as they meet us,
With the ever-joyous welcome, "There is room!"

"Nothing that is fair can stay."
Friends below'd, like phantoms flitting,
Earth's cold, chilling scenes are quitting,
To regain a home more fitting

For their souls no longer burdened
With a covering of clay;
And, as each one journeys by us,
Stretching o'er the cords which tie us
To the fleeting things of earth,
Freed, we leave its scenes of mirth,
And we find with ravished feelings

All our sorrows flee away;
And the while our feeble singing
Thro' the pearly gates is ringing,
We can hear their voices near us,
As they pass to cloudless day.

"Nothing that is fair can stay."
Flowers the loveliest and the rarest,
Friends the holiest and the fairest,
Hearts the lightest, hopes the brightest,
All must pass away for ever

From this toilsome earth:
Grief bows down our head with sorrow—
Hope points to a glad to-morrow—
And, amid the desolation
Which is ever breaking forth,
Heaven reveals some blessed token (Felt and treasured, tho' unspoken)
Of the land where sorrow cometh not for aye.

Sounds a voice for ever o'er us, "All is well,"
Sing the spirits gone before us, "All is well,"
Like the sapling lowly bending,
Like the bird when high ascending,
Soft they whisper words to cheer us

From that paradise unending;
Where the tyrant's pow'r is o'er,
And wearied suffering sighs no more,
Where the tempest-stricken spirit basks in sunshine and in love;
Home of rapture! home of glory!
Hope of fainting ones, and sadden'd!
How the drooping soul is gladden'd,
As it hears the wondrous story
Of the blessedness and peace in that pure home above!

JUGGERNAUTH.

We take the following account of this terrible idolatry, slightly abridged, from the Pall Mall Gazette:—"Juggernaut, the 'lord of the world,' has been worshipped in the sacred town of Pooree, lying about 300 miles from Calcutta, for 700 years past, and the pilgrims, believing that his shrine has the power to obliterate the sins of all who make their offerings in person, constantly increased in numbers till the year of the fatal famine, when the whole country was strewn with the dead. Five years or so ago, attention was called to a celebration in his honour, within a few miles of Calcutta, at which several natives fell or threw themselves beneath the car and were crushed to death. Of old the great festivals were never deemed complete unless the triumphant path of the god had been stained with the blood of his worshippers. But the priests dare not encourage that custom now. If a devotee flings himself down before the idol, the Brahmins cry out that it was an accident. The idolatry, however, still costs hundreds of lives every year. The weak and sickly perish by the wayside, and a cholera epidemic usually breaks out at Pooree when the city is most overcrowded with pilgrims. The poor creatures are huddled together in a way which seems almost incredible to the European. Dr. D. B. Smith, the sanitary commissioner of Bengal, who has recently made a report on Pooree, tells us that in the best room of the best 'hotel' eighty men and women were packed, the dimensions of the room being thirteen feet long by ten broad. When this statement was first made by Dr. Mowatt everybody doubted it, but an experiment was tried in the principal gaol of Bengal, and it was found that ninety full-grown natives could squat in a cell ten feet square, and 120 could stand in the same space. It must be remembered that their clothing took up very little room."

The abode of the "lord of the earth" is a melancholy one at any time. There are, of course, no sanitary arrangements whatever within the town. As the inhabitants or pilgrims die they are taken to the sands which skirt the sea-face of the town, and there partially burned. This spot is called "Surga-Dwar," or the gate of heaven. It seems anything but what it is called to the eye of the stranger from other lands. Skulls, bones, and still more ghastly relics of mortality, strew the beach. On another part of the shore is a small enclosure, without a tree or shrub or any green thing to be seen anywhere near it. It is the English graveyard. On every side of it there is nothing but sand, and the sea-spray from the adjoining surf, in stormy weather, is driven by the wind against the monuments, the inscriptions of which have in many cases thus become faint and almost illegible tracings. Such is the town which some one has called, with no great felicity, the "Jerusalem of India."

The Temple of Juggernaut stands in a large enclosure in the centre of Pooree. There is a Grecian column of black basalt in front of the principal gate, brought from Kanarock. The god lives in a large tower, and about 640 persons are employed to minister to his supposed necessities. There is an attendant who puts the idol to bed every night, another who wakes him, a third whose office it is to place water and a toothpick comfortably within his reach, a fourth to paint his eyes for him every morning, as if he were a faded London beauty, several others to cook and give him his food, 120 dancing girls to amuse him in his heavy moments, and 3,000 priests to worship him—and plunder the pilgrims. All this goes on year after year—is going on in the midst of this hot month of June, while the pilgrims throng every road which leads to the shrine. For months past the priests have been going about the country inviting the people to save their souls by prostrating themselves before the dread deity. The women everywhere pay more heed to these appeals than the men. "They visit houses," says a native writer, "at an hour when their male inmates have gone out on business, and then they commence to gull the females. Some of these are induced to leave their homes from superstitious motives, others with a view to break the shackles of the zenana;" others, he says, with still lower motives. Then they go away in droves led by the priests. They toil on with scarcely sufficient clothes to cover them, almost worn out with privations and hardships, suffering often from disease, exposed to all the severity of the weather, and robbed at every stage by the Brahmins. Still sadder is their plight on their homeward journey. At Pooree every pice they had has been taken from them. They try to push on for home, sometimes trudging at the rate of forty miles a day, and getting a little rest at night by the roadside. When the weather is wet (and the rainy season begins before the festival is over) the pilgrims suffer the extremity of discomfort. They lie down in the mud, exhausted by hunger and fatigue. It is wonderful from how great a distance the poor creatures will come for the sake of this holy pilgrimage. Dr. Smith says: "While I was passing along the crowd I observed a party of up-country men. I spoke to them and found that they were Punjaubees, who had just come down all the way from Hazara, some 2,000 miles. They told me they had been travelling between four and five months; that they were going to stay a day or two at Juggernaut and then at once return to their homes."

The great day of the festival is that on which the god is dragged along by the people. He is placed upon a car forty-five feet in height, with sixteen wheels, and a large platform running all round it. The god is hoisted into his proper place amid beatings of tom-toms, cries, and great excitement. He is not beautiful in appearance. His face is black, and large eyes painted white give him a fierce appearance. The nose is a pointed snout; the mouth a streak of red paint curved upwards; chin he has none. An arm without a hand projects from each side of the head. The priests collect together on the platform, and two cables of immense length are attached to the car. The people lay hold of the ropes, and pull with all their might. An immense din arises from the crowd, and shouts of "Jye Jaganath! Jye Jaganath!" (Victory to Juggernaut!) rend the air. The low plaintive cry of the women, "Bululu! Bululu!" which no one ever forgets who has heard it once, mingles with the clamour. The car is taken in this manner to another temple, and after that the steady worship of the god begins. Scenes of the wildest licence take place, and many a wretched woman poisons herself, rather than encounter the reproaches of her friends at home.

The priests have invented various ingenious pretences for fleecing the pilgrims. Each worshipper is expected to measure the temple with a long piece of cloth, which costs ten rupees (£1). The poorer sort are let off upon condition that they give up all they happen to possess. The native writer just quoted mentions with horror that Hindoo females, "even in affluent circumstances," are obliged during the pilgrimage to sleep in the same room with men. "A scamp residing at Cuttack used to visit Pooree regularly every year, on the plea of Juggernaut's attractions, while his real object was to flirt with the female pilgrims." The same writer asserts that the priests sometimes sell the women who come to worship the god. "They are told they have been pressed into the Company's service, but when they pass Jubbulpore they become awakened to a sense of their real danger—that they are destined to enter a Mussulman zenana." The inhabitants of Orissa, who contribute a large proportion of the worshippers, are among the least progressive people in all Bengal. Their superstition is so great that they have been known to worship the figure-head of an English ship which was wrecked on the Pooree beach. The head was intended to represent the Queen of the Ocean. A toy-cat out of a box of English playthings was also elevated into a deity. They smoke Indian hemp, and cook their food with castor-oil. They have no objection to eat rats and ants besides rice. During the famine between 1865 and 1867, in the three districts of Orissa, nearly a million persons died of starvation, or disease produced by want. Whatever may be the evils which arise from the annual pilgrimages, the Government cannot interfere, unless it made some sanitary precautions in Pooree imperative, and assisted the pilgrims on their homeward journey. Some have recommended the prohibition of all pilgrimages, but the religious exercise is recommended by the "Shastras," and its extinction must be left to follow the increasing intelligence of the people.

MERCY AND PARDON.

In the reign of the first Napoleon, there was an insurrection in Paris. One of the ringleaders was brought before the Emperor; and as this was his second offence against the Government, he was sentenced to be transported.

The day after the trial it was told Napoleon that the child of the convicted man was waiting to see him. "Bring her in," said Napoleon; and a fearful, trembling little girl, on being led in, cast herself at his feet, and implored him to have mercy on her father.

"My child," said the Emperor, touched by her distress, "this is the second time your father has been guilty of treason; I cannot save him." "O, sir," said the kneeling child, "it is not justice we want, but mercy and pardon." Napoleon, much moved, raised the girl to her feet, and said, "For your sake I will release your father."

Does not this story apply to us? Are not our wants the same as that little child's? It is not justice we want from the great King, but mercy and pardon.

SCOTCH SINCERITY.

I SAID to one who picked me up
Just slipping from a rock,
"I'm not much good at climbing, eh?"
"No, sir, ye arrn't," said Jock.

I showed him then a sketch I'd made
Of rough hill-side and loch;
"I'm not an artist, mind," I said;
"No, sir, ye arrn't," quoth Jock.

A poem next I read aloud—
One of my num'rous stock;
"I'm no great poet," I remarked;
"No, sir, ye arrn't," said Jock.

Alas! I fear I well deserved
(Although it proved a shock),
In answer to each modest sham,
That plain retort from Jock.

All the Year Round.

WEST RIDING UNITARIAN MISSIONS.

THE annual meeting of these Missions was held in Bradford on Wednesday week. In the morning, a sermon was preached by the Rev. John Wright, B.A., of Bury, in the Unitarian chapel, Chapel-lane, from "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, for He hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor." (St. Luke iv., 18.) Afterwards a numerous company sat down to a collation in the saloon of St. George's Hall, and subsequently the annual meeting was held. Mr. J. A. Binns, of Bradford, occupied the chair, and there were also present the Revs. J. Kenrick, J. Thomas, B.A., Huddersfield; W. Blazebey, B.A., Rotherham; Goodwyn Barmby, Wakefield; Thomas Hincks, B.A., Leeds; R. Pilcher, B.A., Bradford; J. L. Short, Sheffield; F. R. Elliot, Hunslet; T. H. Smith, Halifax; R. Wilkinson, Holbeck; J. Bevan, Pudsey; J. Smith, Idle; Edmund Kell, M.A., Southampton; Messrs. H. R. Halstead, Bradford; J. Lupton, Leeds; Thos. Hollings, York; Mark Glover, Bradford; Geo. Buckton, Leeds; Josh. Cliffe, Leeds; H. J. Morton, Halifax; and W. T. Kirk.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, said he conceived Unitarianism as essentially the free religion of free men. They were not indifferent or careless as to what truth was, but they refused to attach the penalties to failure in finding it out which were fashionable in orthodox churches. He thought sometimes that those threats of penalties ensured failure in the search. It required a strong man to break through the terrorism, and dare to be honest. "Be successful or be damned" was a hard alternative, and the weak would naturally take what seems the safest course. They held the opposite principle—the fundamental Protestant principle, proclaimed elsewhere but not elsewhere acted out—the right of private judgment, and its correlative, the duty of independent thought. What good was the right without the duty? In the exercise of that judgment, they accepted consequences, they followed them even to the discarding of many doctrines which some held sacred, and to the exaltation of the Christian life above the Christian theology. Having reached this conclusion, they tried to teach it. They sought to popularise the principle of religion in its broadest sense, not to proselytise, though they welcomed willingly those who came from other churches, when they found those churches failed to give the spiritual nutriment they needed. But outside all churches lay a vast field for labour, and in that field their missionaries mainly worked. Notably there was a class which demanded something like coherence in the statement of its faith, and revolted at first sight from overstrained metaphysics and Athanasian absurdities. They would accept mystery, but refused to put faith in contradictions. They confessed their incompetence to comprehend the Supreme, but refused to affirm of His existence that which was plainly inconceivable. They saw the beneficial influence of Christianity, but they did not believe all the legendary details which profess to account for its origin. Their simple faith which permits freedom of opinion commends itself where no creed-bound church could gain a moment's attention. In this sense, perhaps if orthodox friends would think over it, they might find the existence of Unitarianism tolerable, as helping to bridge over the gulf between ultra-scepticism and the serene heights of truth whereon they believe themselves to live. But, after all, did not many concurrent signs point to the spread of their principles, if not to the extension of their Church. It seemed to him (the chairman) that the rising tide of newer, truer, and diviner thoughts was submerging the old theological landmarks. The foremost men in many churches belonged more to the church universal than to those with which their names were connected. Names like those of Maurice, Jowett, Robertson, Stanley, Colenso, Lynch, Kirkus, and many more, were sufficiently significant. It was significant, too, that literature absolutely ignored what he called technical religion. As a matter of conformity, great numbers of people went to church or chapel, upon whose unresponsive souls the talk of the pulpit fell with as little result as raindrops on the sea. Out of all this a great evil grew up—indifference, which hardened men and weakened their sense of duty. True work must spring out of honest conviction, and in these days conviction must be based on something reasonable. These requirements, he thought, their free religion met, and this they tried to teach through the West Riding Mission.

The Rev. GOODWYN BARMBY read the report:

The committee reported that on the whole the prospects of their mission are cheering. Their principal stations are doing well, and their congregations consolidating themselves for efficient work. At Pudsey, since the last meeting, the Rev. John Bevan has succeeded the Rev. W. A. Clarke, and reports an increase of spiritual life and earnest work during his ministry. The average attendance is, in the morning forty-nine, and in the evening ninety-seven. The Sunday-school is in a healthy condition. In the Eland pulpit the Rev. John Ellis has succeeded the Rev. T. R. Dobson, inheriting, in common with his predecessor, the difficulties connected with our cause in that place, and having an up-hill work before him. Christ Chapel at Eland is now free from debt. Pepperhill, like Eland, has to suffer from local circumstances, although of a different character. In the case of Pepperhill there is a new cause to quicken into life, without due warmth around it, and with a chapel distant from the nearest nucleus of population upwards of a mile. Under these discouraging circumstances our adherents at Pepperhill have been true to their cause. They have an attendance at their Sunday services of about 20 in the afternoon and 24 in the evening. Their Sunday-school attendance averages 45 in the morning and 55 in the afternoon, with three teachers. At Lydgate the Rev. E. Allen reports that the average attendance at the religious services in the chapel has been 20 in the morning and 30 in the afternoon. The Lydgate Sunday-school is in a healthy condition. At Dewsbury the continued endeavours of the Rev. Charles Howe have made good the promise of his first efforts. In our last report we acknowledged the receipt by our treasurer of £35 from the Dewsbury congregation, being the amount of its seat-rents since the opening of its new church. This year, inclusive of its annual collection, the Dewsbury congregation has contributed the amount of £52. It had otherwise proved its successful working by the money test. The average attendance at the Sunday services at Dewsbury is 55 in the morning and 85 in the evening. The committee further recorded their regret for departed friends, the late Mr. Henry Briggs, of Outwood Hall, Wakefield, and Mr. S. C. Kell, whose services to philanthropy as well as to our Unitarian cause, deserve very honourable mention. "May we bear in mind that these losses leave us yet more to do, and may we prove equal to doing it. Our veterans fall nobly in the foremost ranks. It is for us to fill up their vacant places. The banner drops from their hands—the banner of Religious Truth, and Honesty, and Freedom. It is for us to take it up and to maintain its cause, in our peaceful warfare against error, and superstition, and mental oppression."

Mr. GEORGE BUCKTON, of Leeds, the treasurer, read the financial statement, from which it appeared that the expenditure had been £415. 4s. 6d., and the balance due to the treasurer was £8. 13s. 6d.

The Rev. JOHN KENRICK moved a resolution adopting the balance-sheet and the report, and appointing the officers for the ensuing year.—The Rev. Goodwyn Barmby was re-elected secretary, and Mr. George Buckton treasurer.—The Rev. EDMUND KELL seconded the resolution of Mr. Kenrick, and it was carried unanimously.

The Rev. R. PILCHER moved a vote of thanks to the Rev. J. Wright, the preacher of the day, which was seconded by Mr. H. J. MORTON, and carried.—The Rev. J. WRIGHT having responded, another resolution was passed, cordially thanking the missionaries for their services at the stations at Dewsbury, Pudsey, Eland, Pepperhill, and Lydgate.—The Rev. C. HOWE, of Dewsbury, the Rev. E. ALLEN, of Lydgate, the Rev. J. ELLIS, of Eland, and the Rev. J. BEVAN, of Pudsey, responded, and concluded by introducing Mr. Joseph Lee, of Barnard Castle, a lay preacher, who was on a tour collecting subscriptions for the erection of a church at that place.

The Rev. W. BLAZEBY, of Rotherham, moved, and Mr. J. LUPTON seconded, a resolution sympathising with the family of the late Rev. J. J. Tayler, on their bereavement.—The resolution was passed in silence, the whole of the audience standing to mark their respect for the deceased.

The Rev. G. VANCE SMITH, of York, proposed a vote of thanks to the congregation of Chapel-lane Chapel, and also to the Chairman.—The Rev. Wm. BLAZBY seconded the motion, which was carried.

Mr. J. A. BINNS responded; and the proceedings terminated.

ADDRESS OF REV. ATHANASE COQUEREL.

At the meeting of the Free Christian Union, on Wednesday, June 2, reported in our last number, in response to a very cordial acknowledgment of his service in preaching to the Union the previous evening, M. Coquerel gave the following interesting address:

I cannot express as I should like, the deep feeling of gratitude with which I receive at your hands such a hearty and brotherly welcome. I may say, however, that when you call liberty of religious conviction a characteristic belonging to French Protestantism, I feel it is a great honour for me to stand here as a representative of a church to which you show so much esteem. I do not stand here isolated. A few weeks ago, after I had received with a great eagerness and joy the invitation to be present here, we had in Paris the meetings of our religious societies, which take place in April. After those meetings were over we assembled to dine together. There were present fifty pastors, and elders, and presidents and secretaries of religious societies—several of them men whose names are not unknown to you. They were presided over by my excellent and amiable friend, M. Martin Paschoud. M. Fontanès, pastor of the Reformed Church at Havre, was there also. He had presided over our conference in the morning. My friend Dr. Reville had left us a few minutes before. He had occupied my pulpit, and we had been very happy to hear from him a masterly and essentially Christian and pious sermon. I asked those gentlemen to give me a mandate for this society. I told them of the effort that was being attempted here; I told them I should have the honour of addressing you to-day, and they immediately with great applause unanimously charged me to be their messenger to you, and to thank you, the founders of this society, for having, as you have done, upheld the great principle of free Christian union, of love amongst people who belong not to the same Church. (Applause.) Though a foreigner has scarcely any right to speak of one whom you knew a great deal better than he did, I may perhaps say that one of the honours and the joys I hoped for here was to shake hands with and to know personally the man you have lost, that admirable writer and scholar, that kind-hearted minister of Christianity—Mr. Taylor. It has been to me a great grief that I arrived too late. But now, perhaps, I ought to show you how much the Reformed Church of France, in the midst of all her struggles, deserves the honour you pay her in calling her a representative of religious freedom and free religious conviction. I should wish to give you a few details of the past history and present condition of that Church. You are struggling in the same cause in which we have struggled, and for which some have suffered in both countries; and it may be doubly interesting to you not only because you sympathise with us as brothers, but also because, the question being the same under different shapes, there may be some instruction, some useful hints to be gathered from what has occurred amongst us. The Protestant Church of France in its early days was strictly exclusive. It had a confession of faith written by Calvin and Theodore Beza, which, in 1572, sometime before St. Bartholomew's night, was signed by Queen Jeanne d'Albret of Navarre, by the Prince who was to become Henry the Fourth of France, by the Prince de Condé, and by several leading members of the Royal Family. That confession of faith, contained in forty articles, was exceedingly strict and severe. I shall quote only two articles. One says that "the sword hath been put by God's hand into the hand of the reigning powers, magistrates, judges, kings, not only to enforce obedience to the second table of the Ten Commandments, but also to the first;" which means not that, when Protestants were burnt at Paris it was a thing bad in itself, but only that it was a mistake—they ought to have burnt the others. That was the whole meaning of it. It was thought that those who held the truth had not only the right, but it was their duty to persecute by all means those who would not accept their faith. In the same creed there is another article, which says that little children, even unborn children, are condemned to eternal perdition in hell, and if they die without being baptised they cannot be saved by any means whatever. That creed lasted for some time; but a movement against its exclusiveness soon set in. Very remarkable books were written by the Theological School where Du Plessis-Mornay long resided, he being the chief magistrate of the town. At an academy there, professors taught theology, and as they taught they thought Calvin and Theodore Beza had been too hard, and they found means not quite to reject the creed, but to make it rather elastic; they found those means which are ever found when a creed becomes insufferable, and that party, the party with Liberal tendencies, has ever since existed, though under different names at different times. When, in 1685, Louis the Fourteenth shut all the Protestant academies in France, and when he declared that there were no more Protestants left in that country—that they were all converted to Roman Catholicism—when all pastors were obliged to leave France in a fortnight, one excepted, the most celebrated of all, whose privilege it was to have to leave within twenty-four hours—when the Church was thus cut off at its root, and the King thought he had put an end to it—it did not quite disappear, but struggled, and suffered long. In Smedley's "History of the Reformed Church of France," it is said that no church has suffered so lately, so long, and so much from persecution as the Reformed Church of France, and I think his statement is perfectly true. The last pastor who was hanged because he was a pastor died in Paris in 1762, hardly more than a century ago. Those Protestant Churches during that time called themselves Les Eglises sous le Croix—considering themselves under the cross of the Lord—and also Les Eglises du Desert, because they assembled in desert places, where sometimes they were found by the soldiers and fired upon. When they were so discovered the men who were not killed were sent to the galleys for life, and the women were shut up in such places as the Tower of Constance. The sister of one of the pastors remained for fifty years confined in a large wide room with a number of other women. There were no windows to the place, but only slits, by which air and wind came in. Still, Liberal principles became more and more powerful. Nothing teaches people so well the value of freedom as the want of it; and when these Protestants found that the Romish Church in France was so severe with them, they learnt that they had no right to be so hard upon those who did not exactly believe as they did. I possess the letters and papers left by Paul Rabaut, who was the head of the Protestant Church in the latter part of the reign of Louis XV. and in the reign of Louis XVI. He was so very useful in keeping the Protestants quiet that, though he was condemned to death as all other pastors were, the Government wished to save him, and the soldiers had very stringent orders never to lay hands on him. He was so amiable a man that his services were appreciated by the Government in keeping the Protestants in peace and order. He was orthodox in his views, but at the same time a friend to liberal feelings, and not exclusive in his opinions. His son studied at Lausanne and Geneva. On his return to France as a minister, the first piece of information he received on putting his foot on his native land was that a dear friend of his father had just been hanged. The young man understood that this would be his own fate also, but though he could easily have recrossed the frontier he did not for one moment think of turning back. He went forward and became a pastor of the church at Nîmes. There his views became a great deal broader than even those of his father. He was once preaching au desert, when, after his sermon, a military gentleman of great reputation and high rank threw himself into his arms. It was Lafayette, to whom Washington had given the advice to try and secure liberty for the Protestants in France. He came to Nîmes, attended one of the meetings, was enraptured with what he saw and heard, and invited the minister to come to Paris with him. Before that time Protestants were nonentities in France. The first thing Lafayette and Rabaut did was to obtain from Louis XVI. in 1787 an edict that gave us civil rights. Rabaut St. Etienne assembled the principal Protestants in his room, and conducted the services there. At first their meetings were half in secret, but after a time they prospered, and openly worshipped together. Similar progress took place in other churches all over the country. It must be remembered that the creed had not been re-established. It has never been re-established up to this day. (Applause.) In 1848 there was a synod held—not an official one, because we had no right at that time to have a regular synod—at which about eighty representatives were present from different churches. I was a member of it, and we formally refused not only to re-establish the old creed, but to establish any other. (Applause.) A few of them seceded because they thought a Church was bound to state its faith in detail, and to give a creed to its members. At that time we had, and we have still, a habit of reading the so-called Apostles' Creed, which never any of the Apostles knew a word of, because it was written long after their day—(laughter)—but that habit is losing ground every day. When we were sous le croix in the churches du desert, we had no books. All Protestant books were seized and burnt. Books containing liturgies and forms of prayer could therefore only be obtained from foreign lands, and we got the habit of reading the Apostles' Creed from Geneva—a very bad habit it appears to me. (Hear, hear.) It has been ascertained that it is dependent on no law of the Church. Several churches have adopted the wise plan of leaving their pastor at full liberty to read the Creed or not. That is the case in Nîmes. The church at Nîmes is one of the most liberal in France. The majority there is decidedly Liberal, but the opposite party has always its place. Two of the pastors belong not to the Liberal party, and they are nominated by their adversaries, who never will leave those who wish for such instruction without it. There are eight or nine pastors, and two are always given to the minority. (Applause.) Those two read the Apostles' Creed, and the others generally do not, or if they do, it is because they like to do so. A few years ago another Consistory, that of Tournay, decided officially that every pastor should be at liberty to read it or not, as he pleased. I think we must not consider this habit, which is dwindling away, as a proof that our Church has a creed. The state of things in our Church at present is this:—There are two parties, one generally called Liberal, and the other Orthodox; but those denominations are not perfectly true, because among the Liberals there are various shades of opinion. One of the most devoted and pious men I ever knew, a man who has not a thought other than for his Church, my friend M. Montandon, is Orthodox in his theology, but he is with us—struggling with us, fighting with us; and when in the Consistory people ask him, "How is it possible that you, who believe what we believe, are always against us and with those people who hold tenets different from your own?" he answers, "Because you are not just." (Applause.) I will not deny that the greater number of the best known men are not very Orthodox in their views; perhaps the majority of Liberals in small towns, in villages, and out-of-the-way places are more or less Orthodox, only that they hold fast to the principle of liberty. They will not have people thrown out of the Church because they do not believe exactly what the others believe. (Applause.) I should like to add some account of what has happened in the Church in Paris. The Consistory there consisted of a number of gentlemen generally highly esteemed and very wealthy. Most of them were wealthy bankers, knowing one another, and sticking together a great deal. M. Guizot, the celebrated minister, was their intimate friend, and almost always acted with them. These gentlemen were originally nominated in a very strange manner. When the first Emperor was consulted about it in 1802 he said, "Now, the twelve most wealthy persons in the place shall be the Consistory." That was so absurd that it never was properly carried out. But M. Guizot, who never was a wealthy man, was from the first day a member of that Consistory. To be an elder of the Church the question asked was not "Is he a moral man?" "Is he a religious man?" "Does he believe in something or nothing?" but, "How much does he pay in taxes?" (Laughter.) Sometimes things are so exceedingly bad that they cannot work in their own direction, but really act against themselves. So it was in this case. The system never was so bad in practice as might be supposed. In 1848 the Consistory was re-elected by universal suffrage, and this was the cause of great changes. Some of the members had sat there for nearly half a century, others for forty years; for as they possessed the right of electing members they always re-elected themselves. In 1848 we in France were not extremely well-disposed towards Liberal action. We were rather a little shy of anything decidedly Liberal, and many said, "Why displace these gentlemen?" and the genuine ultra-Conservative feeling of that day kept them in their places. There was really no opposition, and they were re-elected. The day they were so they had this feeling, "Now that we have been elected by universal suffrage we are powerful and will make our views prevail." They had for a long time seen that my father was deeply beloved and esteemed in the Church, and that he had great power over the minds of the people under his charge. They considered that a very unhappy circumstance, and they tried to limit his influence, but they could not. They could not prevent his having immense audiences every time he preached. They engaged very celebrated ministers to preach in order to diminish his influence, and among others they had M. Monod, a remarkable preacher and Orthodox, who had his church quite full, but when my father preached at the same hour his church was not a whit the less full for that. There are in Paris a great many more people who love free religious inquiry than is generally supposed, and it could not be denied that my father attracted to his church a great number of people from other churches. I had helped my father without being his regular assistant, and in 1848, a few days before the Revolution, I was nominated chaplain to a college in Paris for three years. When those three years were over it was found that those who were flocking round my father were not exactly turning the cold shoulder on me, and so I was re-elected for two years, not three, and at every re-election for fifteen years I had something very unpleasant to hear about my principles, my views, my way of speaking and acting not being exactly what were wished for. I knew it perfectly well, but I hope I may say that I never altered in any degree the way in which I expressed my faith and my feelings. At last the elections in the church in Paris being more and more disputed, a society was founded to some extent analogous to this one. It was called L'Union Protestante Libérale. The members of the Consistory were very powerful, and had all power in their own hands. They were sure of the votes of all the poor who received help from the church, and of all the people connected with the church services in any way; but the new society was created by laymen who thought they had a right to take a larger part in the direction of the church than was at that time allowed them, and at every election they tried to find the electors and secure their votes. It is a difficult matter in such a town as Paris to find the Protestant electors. However, the society frightened the Consistory; and I was told on more than one occasion that if I would take upon myself to promise that the union should cease to exist I should be re-nominated. It was not said officially, but it was clearly said. My answer was, "First, I can't; and, secondly, I won't." (Applause.) "They have a right to carry on their work, and I shall never give them that cowardly advice to leave it." Then I had written some articles about a book that attracted great attention at that time. I acknowledged that there were some very fine things in the book, but I wrote more against it than in its praise. However, I was supposed to be too favourable to M. Renan's views, and I was excluded from the Church. A short time afterwards M. Martin-Paschoud was also excluded. Now, a Consistory has no right either to nominate or to dismiss a preacher without the Government giving their permission, and Government said, We shall not dismiss him. Thus he remains there; and in the special Consistory of Paris, as he is the oldest member, he is the president, and presides over those who believe he is no Christian, and who tell him so to his face. (Laughter.) This state of things is going on year after year, but we get more and more hopeful, for we see that the congregation at large are with us, and consider that we have been ill-used. When for me and M. Martin-Paschoud there were demonstrations of goodwill, many persons said, "Oh, that is only for a few days; Parisians are fickle; that will not last." Well, I have been dismissed now five years, and it exists more than ever, and it shall continue to do so. (Applause.) I say so because I am here as a representative of the liberty that we will have in the Church. It is impossible that that liberty shall not be given sooner or later. When we saw that public worship was getting more and more in the hands of very illiberal men, we took a new step. We thought when my father died that we must not leave the congregation without preachers after their own mind, and so two young ministers and myself wrote to the Minister of the Interior asking for liberty to preach in rooms. We received permission to do so, and now every Sunday we worship and preach in a room. At the same time, as we have never been legally ejected from the Church, we can baptise, marry, and perform funeral services in the church, but we cannot preach there on a Sunday. Of course such a state of things is quite absurd, and shows that when people want to persecute a man they ought to kill him outright, for if they leave any part of him alive that is enough to resuscitate the whole. (Applause.) In Paris there are many difficulties in the way of getting a suitable place for our services. It is extremely painful for a man to say anything against the organisation of things in his own country when he is in another land. (Hear, hear.) We have difficulties to encounter of which you cannot have the slightest idea. At every step we are hemmed in. Though the Government is not unfavourable to us, the existing state of things is unfavourable to us. In Paris there is no public life as there is here, and it is a very difficult matter to find a convenient room. We have now a low-ceiled, long room, exceedingly close and suffocating. If, as we hope, we can be readmitted completely, with all our rights, into our old historical Church, we shall be able to have a fit place of worship. Perhaps I have not enough referred to one feeling which has been a very painful one to me, caused by the way in which my father had had to suffer in the last years of his life. When he saw that I was dismissed it was to him an immense affliction. He had always hoped to work with me in the same Church, that I might continue to sustain and disseminate his principles and he was deeply hurt at the way in which I was treated. He was old and suffered a great deal from it. He was obliged to ask for another assistant, and according to the law he had a right to have an assistant. Of course he asked for one who held similar views to his own, and when he mentioned one whom he approved of, the Consistory, who had the power of refusing to appoint any particular person, took six months to consider the matter, and then discovered what they knew before, that the proposed assistant held the same opinions as my father, and they would not appoint him. Then he had to propose another, and in four different years he proposed assistants and met with refusals. Immediately after they refused the last my poor father died. All those who have followed what has been going on there must have seen how difficult it is for people, not cruel or unfeeling, but prejudiced, when once they have set out on the wrong road, to retrace their steps. They are almost obliged to go further and further, even if they have to tread upon the body of an old pastor whom they love. (Applause.) One word more. When I understood what you were doing here I was overjoyed, because I thought it was the beginning of a movement which we really want in the Church. I cannot but feel that what you are doing and what we are doing in France is the very thing that is wanted in these days. People want religion. Every day people come to me calling themselves philosophers, and say, "I have no religion, but I wish to have one; I cannot live without it; I cannot bring up my family without it; but I cannot accept any creed or anything that shall prevent me from thinking and living according to what my conscience tells me is right and necessary." Then they ask for something like that which you purpose. I am quite sure that your object is no visionary and impractical one. I trust you will work actively in all places and by all means to forward your views and to make people understand what they are. Let them know that your object is no more to have unfurled here and there in the air flags representing this creed, or that creed, or any creed, but to have one unfurled representing Christian love, Christian faith, Christian spirit. That is the want of the age. I am sure that when such a principle as that on which this Union is based has been quite openly declared, it is a trust from above, and you have no right to let the flag fall to the ground. You must keep it with a firm hand; if possible, make everybody see it, and cause the words of Peace and Love written upon it to be legible to every eye. That is what I feel bound to say with all the strength I can put into the expression. (Loud applause.)

INTELLIGENCE.

ASTLEY.—On Sunday last, afternoon and evening, the annual sermons were preached by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington. The congregations were large on both occasions, and the collections amounted to £16. 5s. 6d.

BARNARD CASTLE.—On Sunday last, special services were conducted in the Broadgates Chapel by the Rev. John Bevan, of Pudsey, the offertory being in aid of the fund for building the intended new chapel here. The congregations both morning and evening were good.

CHOWBENT: THE LATE MR. THOMAS SALE.—Our paper of last week announced the death of Mr. Thomas Sale, clerk of the chapel at Chowbent, in the 83rd year of his age. Appointed in the year 1807, as successor to his grandfather, who bore the same name and had held the office from 1757, the subject of this notice discharged his duties with unflinching regularity and much acceptance for upwards of 61 years. In Chowbent the clerk has always had the direction of the musical part of the service, for which Mr. Sale's rich and powerful voice, fine ear, and great skill in music eminently qualified him. The selection of the hymns was also a part of his duty. This practice, now little known outside the Established Church, necessitated the closest attention to every part of the service. Strangers have been astonished at the singular propriety with which the selection of hymns was always made; adapted as the service proceeded, often to the Scriptures and prayers, and always in conclusion to the sermon delivered. Brought up to the business of a silk weaver, appointed to the office of Registrar of Births, Marriages, and Deaths on the passing of the Act of 1838, he was compelled some years ago to resign his other engagements, but his attachment to the services of the chapel continued to the last. He was in his desk and officiated as usual on the last Sunday in May, and was present at the administration of the Lord's Supper on the first Sunday in this month, and quietly passed away on the morning of the 9th instant, while taking his natural rest in sleep. A large attendance in the chapel on the Sunday following his death, and a special anthem by the choir, testified the respect in which he was held, and the minister took leave of an old friend and fellow-labourer in a discourse from the text, "One day in thy courts is better than a thousand." It is an interesting fact that the office of clerk at Chowbent has continued in the same family ever since the beginning of last century, having during this long period been held by four persons only, including the deceased. The first of the four was clerk in the original chapel, of which the congregation were deprived in 1720 by one of the Atherton family, who, in resentment at their thwarting him at an election, handed it over to the Church, and had it "consecrated," obliging the congregation to build the present chapel.

LEICESTER: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—On Sunday, June 13th, two excellent sermons on the subject of Education were preached in the lecture room, Temperance Hall, by the Rev. J. W. Lake, of Warwick, when collections, amounting to £6. 10s. 8d., were made on behalf of the Sunday-school.

LONDON AUXILIARY SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The fourth annual United Service of the schools in connection with this Association was held on Sunday last, the 13th inst., at Unity Church, Islington. There was a very large attendance, the church being completely filled. The schools represented were—Carter Lane, Clerkenwell, Chapel-street, Hackney, Hampstead, Islington, Stamford-street, Newington Green, and Worship-street. On arriving at the place of service, a drink of milk was given to each child, a grateful and welcome refreshment to many after their long walk. The service was commenced by the Rev. Henry Ierson, and the Rev. Dr. Osgood, of New York, delivered a short and simple address from the words, "Feed my lambs, feed my sheep." The singing of the hymn, "For ever with the Lord," and a prayer, brought the service to a close. Although the singing was very fair, there was room for improvement, and it would be well if a few meetings for practice among the teachers could be arranged previous to the gathering. Among the visitors were the Revs. T. L. Marshall, J. Taylor, J. Heywood, and E. W. Hopkinson (Newcastle), and Messrs. H. J. Preston, P. Martineau, and J. Wade.

LONGTON.—On Sunday, June 6th, two services were conducted in the Unitarian Mission Room, by Mr. Hawley and the minister, the Rev. N. Green, on the occasion of opening a new harmonium. Several anthems were given by the choir.

STAND.—On Sunday last, the 13th inst., sermons on behalf of the Sunday-school were preached in the morning by the Rev. J. Black, M.A., in the evening by the Rev. J. Page Hoppes. The congregations were very good, particularly in the evening, when the chapel was crowded. The collections amounted to nearly £45.

STANNINGTON.—On Tuesday, 8th inst., the sixth meeting of the Sunday-school Union, of the Sheffield district, was held here, 50 teachers present. After tea, the Rev. J. Lettis Short presiding, an essay was read by Mr. George Revitt, one of the superintendents of the Stannington Sunday-school, on the subject, "Why do our elder scholars leave our Sunday-schools?"

THE COMING WEEK.

LONDON: MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.—On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, annual examination. On Thursday, meeting of trustees.

LONDON: ROSKIN-HILL CHAPEL.—On Sunday, the Rev. Dr. Osgood will preach.

PENMAENMAWR: PENDRYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. J. W. Lake. Service at 11 a.m.

Rotherham.—On Sunday, school sermons by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington.

Swinton.—On Sunday, annual sermons, afternoon and evening, by the Rev. A. Gordon, M.A.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—Notice is hereby given, that the next Half-yearly Examination for MATRICULATION in this University will commence on Monday, the 28th of June, 1869. In addition to the Metropolitan Examination, Provincial Examinations will be held at Owens College, Manchester; Queen's College, Liverpool; Stonyhurst College; St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw; Queen's College, Birmingham; and St. Patrick's College, Carlisle.

Every Candidate is required to transmit his Certificate of Age to the Registrar (7, Saville Row, London, W.) at least fourteen days before the commencement of the Examination. Candidates who pass the Matriculation Examination are entitled to proceed to the Degree conferred by the University in Arts, Laws, Science, and Medicine. This Examination is accepted (1) by the Council of Military Education in lieu of the Entrance Examination otherwise imposed on Candidates for admission to the Royal Military College at Sandhurst; and (2) by the College of Surgeons in lieu of the Preliminary Examination otherwise imposed on Candidates for its Fellowship. It is also among those Examinations of which some one must be passed (1) by every Medical Student on commencing his professional studies; and (2) by every person entering upon Articles of Clerkship to an Attorney, any such person Matriculating in the First Division being entitled to exemption from one year's service.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

According to a table drawn up, of the Bishops and Archbishops who are to have seats at the Ecumenical Council preparing at Rome, the whole number is 922, of whom about 600 belong to the Latin races.

The Levant Times says that the Grand Vizier is engaged in preparing a comprehensive and liberal scheme of popular education for the whole empire.

The Turkish Government has granted a sum of 25,000*l.* towards the restoration of the churches in Crete which were injured during the rebellion.

On the 5th instant the people of Cadiz witnessed one of the first effects of the religious liberty recently proclaimed in Spain. This was the funeral of a Protestant resident (a Swedish gentleman) who was interred in the cemetery of the town, the service being read by the chaplain of Her Majesty's ship Pallas. This, we believe, is the first instance, of a public Protestant funeral in Cadiz. As the deceased was much respected, a great number of the Gaditanos were present.

A well-known Church association in London has addressed a memorial to the Pope setting forth the claims which the archbishops and bishops of the English Church have to a recognition of their episcopal orders by the Western Church, praying that their validity may be acknowledged, and that they may be admitted to the Ecumenical Council.

Three bishops have now commenced prosecutions against benefited clergymen of their dioceses for alleged violations of the Church's rule on ritual, as laid down recently by Lord Cairns, in his judgment in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in the case of Martin v. Mackonochie. The Bishop of London prosecutes the Rev. C. F. Lowder, vicar of St. Peter's, in St. George's-in-the-East; the Bishop of Chichester prosecutes the Rev. James Purchas, incumbent of St. James's Chapel, Brighton; and the Bishop of Winchester prosecutes the Rev. R. Hooker Wix, vicar of St. Michael and All Angels, Ryde. If the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declare that Sir Robert Phillimore, the Dean of Arches, is bound to receive letters of request in the case of Sheppard v. Bennett, the Bishop of Bath and Wells will make a fourth, prosecuting the Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, vicar of Frome Selwood, for alleged unsound doctrine. These do not include the prosecution for heresy of a different kind, which has been commenced against the Rev. Charles Voysey.

The Bishop of Honolulu recently arrived at Rio Janeiro from Bahia, on his way to his diocese. His lordship was the first English bishop who has visited Brazil, and advantage was taken of his presence to consecrate the English churches and cemeteries at Pernambuco, Bahia, and Rio.

Mr. Spurgeon is, it is said, about to build another offshoot chapel near the Queen's-road Extension, Battersea Park.

On Friday, a deputation from the Established Church of Scotland General Assembly had an interview with Mr. Gladstone to present a petition from that body praying for an abolition of the law of lay patronage in the Established Church of Scotland, &c.—Dr. Norman Macleod, moderator of the General Assembly, read the petition, which he stated was agreed to in the General Assembly, comprising, at the time it was brought forward, 281 lay as well as clerical members. He said that this measure of lay patronage was introduced by an unscrupulous Minister of the Crown for selfish purposes and against the wishes of the nation.—Mr. Gladstone said he had no objection to this question being brought before Parliament. He had spent a large portion of his time in Scotland, and expressed his sympathy with the Scotch Church. It could not be expected that so late in the Session any measure not of a pressing and vital importance could be brought forward. Having referred to the history of the Church, he inquired if the petition was to be regarded as an expression of national feeling.—The Rev. Dr. Perry replied in the affirmative, and said that the agitation on the subject which took place was expressive of the national sentiment.—Mr. Gladstone suggested that a full statement of the whole case should be drawn up, as he considered the petition was too brief for the information of the Government and the Parliament. He thought they would have to argue over all the facts, and to consider the attitude of other religious bodies in Scotland in reference to this subject.

The Churchmen of Sheffield, being anxious that the late Church Conference in Sheffield should not be allowed to result in mere talk and nothing more, Dr. Sale, the vicar, gave definite effect to it by summoning a meeting for Monday evening last, to consider how practical advantage could best be derived from the Conference. A discussion took place on parochial work and the best way of doing it thoroughly by lay and clerical co-operation. Various schemes were proposed, and it was resolved to appoint a committee to consider the suggestions thrown out and any others that might be made, and to prepare a plan to be submitted to a future meeting.

The Methodist New Connexion Conference has just been held. The decrease in the Connexion of 555 members led to a searching investigation into its causes. The inquiry was private. It appeared that the year was an exceptional one, and that the increase of the membership in Great Britain during the last ten years had been upwards of 30 per cent., being an average annual increase of three per cent.

The annual Conference of the New Connexion General Baptists (the orthodox section of the general Baptist body, which formed a new connexion when the old Baptist Assembly became too predominantly liberal, if not Unitarian), has been held this week in the Cemetery-road Chapel, Sheffield. At seven o'clock on Tuesday morning the Association met for prayer, and conference was held, when an address was delivered by the Rev. J. Sage, his subject being, "Ministerial success: how it is hindered by Christians." At ten o'clock the conference re-assembled, when another address was delivered by the Rev. J. Salisbury, M.A., chairman of the Association, on the subject of "Christian work." The Rev. J. Clifford, the secretary, read the annual report, which stated that all the churches had reported this year except thirteen of the smaller churches, whose past history justified the assertion that their returns would not affect the net results very materially. The returns this year had a measure of correctness which had not been attained for some years; but that correctness had been purchased at some cost. The Association now numbered: Churches, 155; chapels, 227; (one "church" sometimes consists of the members of several chapels); members, 20,896; pastors, 120; preaching stations, 65; local preachers, 265, plus one female—(laughter);—scholars, 27,781; teachers, 4,012. Five pastors had died during the year. Additions: Baptised, 1,249; received, 406; restored, 111; new church, 44; total, 1,910. Reductions: Dismissed, 270; excluded, 142; withdrawn, 197; removed, 721; dead, 348; total, 1,714; thus showing a clear increase of 206. The increase, however, was much greater than it appeared, owing to the increased correctness of the reports. Some of the churches had had great prosperity. Their foreign mission churches returned a clear increase of 86; Longford had baptised 72; Burnley Lane 45, &c. The Rev. G. Hester moved a resolution cordially welcoming to these sittings ministers and members of other denominations.

The annual meeting of the Northern Association of Baptist Churches (the Particular Baptist body) has also been held at Bury. An analysis of the statistical returns shows that last year there was an increase by baptism of 124, by letter 47, by profession 8, by restoration 7, or a total increase of 186; there being a decrease by death of 27, by dismission 30, by withdrawal 6, by erasure 8, and by exclusion 17, making a total of 88, or a net increase of 98, as against 9 in 1868. Mr. John Hurst, of Rochdale, read a paper on "The relation and connection that should exist between the pulpit and the pew in the work of Christ."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The great topic in all the newspapers, secular and, as they are called, "religious," is the majority of 33 in the House of Lords for the second reading of Mr. Gladstone's bill for Disestablishing the Irish Church, and the probable course which will be taken in committee. The largeness of the majority took everyone by surprise, and it is accounted for (the fact being undoubted that the opponents of the bill were really immensely in majority, if they had chosen to use their strength), by some confusion and miscalculation among the "whips," who had intended to allow a majority of two or three, but had, by mistake, given too many leaves of absence.

A strong attempt will now be made to adopt amendments in the direction of concurrent endowments. The Times is evidently throwing out feelers in this direction, advocating that at least the ministers of all denominations shall be furnished with parsonage and glebe.

The Irish papers discuss the division of Saturday morning and the future of the bill with much earnestness. The general idea in both Liberal and Conservative journals is that the amendments will be in the direction of a "concurrent endowment." The Freeman's Journal says:

"Lord Grey will raise the question on going into committee, but the fate of such a proposal would not be doubtful in the Lower House. We do not know what truth may be in the statement that at one time the Cabinet resolved to frame the bill on Earl Grey's principle. But if ever they were of that mind, they are not so now. The idea is impracticable. The House of Commons would not entertain it, even if the Government proposed it. The Lords are in a hurry to terminate the Irish Church business as rapidly as possible. They were bored to death by drivellers, and brought into conflict with public opinion by representations that the Lords were the steadfast friends of the Irish Church and of Irish Orangeism. They refuted the calumny in voting the second reading, and will scarcely follow Lord Derby and Lord Cairns in trying to force obnoxious amendments on the House of Commons, and propping up Orange ascendancy in Ireland."

The Northern Whig has "never concealed from its readers that in committee the measure will encounter serious obstacles. . . . 'Complete disestablishment, and as much disendowment as to render that disestablishment complete,' was the policy indicated by the Marquis of Salisbury, who may now be called the real leader of the Conservative peers. It is plain from the whole tone of the debate that, in order to save as much to the Church as possible, an attempt will be made to engraft the system of concurrent endowment on the bill. If the Lords suppose that they can gratify their prepossessions in favour of concurrent endowment at the expense of the taxpayers of the United Kingdom they will find themselves very much mistaken." The Evening Mail urges the friends of the Irish Church to put themselves in the hands of Lords Salisbury and Westbury in framing amendments.

Not unnaturally, the really uncompromising High Churchmen who have hoped in the Lords are immensely disgusted with the Earl Derby's sham fight of last week. Archdeacon Denison, writing to a contemporary, says:

"Above the bar, on Saturday morning last, June 19, A.D. 1869, Lord Salisbury and the Bishop of St. David's cut the throat of 'Church and State.' Below the bar, the two archbishops, having neither boldness to assist nor courage to forbid, rung its knell. Lord Salisbury, it is said, comes into Lord Derby's place; but there is no place to come into. 'Conservatism' has slain itself with its own sword. It is nothing wonderful that a party whose differentia it is to surrender its posts one after the other at the first formal demand of the enemy should have died this death. What is to be the new party name? I suggest 'Hybridism.' I know of no word which comes so near the fact. I have been contending a good many years for 'Church and State.' This part of my vocation is finally gone. 'Church and Queen' may still be the cry at Hybrid dinners; but it is a cry which has no meaning now. Clergy may still say the prayer for the High Court of Parliament, but it cannot be said without mockery. For my own part, being, I am glad to say, something more than Conservative, after the disestablishing vote of last Saturday, I care nothing what becomes of the bill; and, if I were a peer, should not go near the committee. The blow has fallen, doubtless, more from the fault of Churchmen than of anybody else. What I want is, if possible, to open their eyes to the position, so that when the Nemesis which the two archbishops have invited comes upon the Church in England, as it will come, we may be a little more ready to meet it than we are now."

Apropos of the debate, there has been a conversation in the House of Lords on the indecent manifestation of feeling among the strangers in the gallery of the house, which took place on the last evening. It seems that one of the most prominent delinquents was "an eminent dignitary of the Church." Lord Granville privately communicated with him on the subject, and received in reply "a charming letter," with "a present of a book treating of the debate of last year!" There was also a neat passage of arms between Lord Granville and

Lord Cairns. Lord Granville said that "probably the great majority of the persons in the gallery on that particular occasion were from a part of the United Kingdom where the people are supposed to be more impulsive than elsewhere—(a laugh)—and that having heard their own thoughts better expressed by one of their own countrymen than they had ever been able to express them themselves, the temptation to cheer was irresistible." (Laughter.) Lord Cairns retorted by a still keener stroke, the blow aimed at Mr. Bright being none the less effective from its apparent impalpability: "The noble earl seems to have ascertained the nationality of those from whom the manifestations proceeded—(a laugh); but I am rather disposed to regard them as an example of that quality which has been so recently commended in this House—viz.: that feeling of John Bullism which is always sure to make its innate ideas and convictions known, without reference to the suitability of the place or time, or to the manner in which they are expressed."

The Nonconformist gives the following resumé of the provisions of the Endowed Schools Bill:

"The Endowed Schools Bill is second only in importance and in breadth of purpose to the Irish Church Bill, to which, indeed, although in relation to a different subject, it bears some analogy. It has its commissioners as that has, and, under the responsibility and control of the Council of Education, it vests in them extraordinary powers. With certain specified exceptions and within prescribed limits, it authorises them to deal with all the educational endowments in the kingdom, for the purpose of extracting from them the best educational results. Their functions, it is true, are limited by this bill to a temporary object—that, namely, of reconstructing endowed schools. But their powers, while carefully guarded against caprice and abuse, are ample for the end for which they were given. Their chief business will consist in not merely considering, but also in applying, schemes for the beneficial application of existing endowments to meet the educational wants of those for whom they were founded. Neither governing bodies, nor trustees, nor masters can stand in their way. They will have all the authority of the Court of Chancery to remodel the institutions which the bill puts within their range. In regard to the evil they may do, they are compassed by stringent limitations; in regard to the good they may propose, the discretion given to them is all but unrestricted. In regard to the religious, or rather the ecclesiastical, character of endowed schools, the bill is as satisfactory as it can be made in the present transitional state of public opinion. No religious teaching, no attendance upon worship at a particular church or chapel, is to be insisted upon in reference to scholars whose parents object. In fact, no school is to be treated as a denominational school, unless where it is clearly provided for in the deed of foundation, or under the authority of the founder, or by statutes or regulations made within 50 years of his death, and continued in force down to the present time. And in respect to all endowments not made denominational by these conditions, the governing bodies or trustees will be open to Dissenters as well as Churchmen, who may, if they think fit, and for anything contained in this bill, appoint masters irrespectively of the ecclesiastical communion to which they may be attached. The greater number of what are called Edward the Sixth's Grammar Schools will thus be de-sectarianised, or, in other words, will cease to be exclusively Church of England institutions."

On Sunday, a pastoral letter from Archbishop Manning was read at the Roman Catholic Churches in London, urging the importance of activity in the work of religious education. Dr. Manning, amongst other matters, said the work of providing Catholic education for their poor children, vitally pressing as it must always be, is rendered at this time a still more urgent obligation by the certainty that in the next session of Parliament a scheme of national education will be attempted. Having dwelt upon the necessity that existed for more funds, he observed that by recent changes in the statutes, and by the just administration of the Poor-law Board, 400 Roman Catholic children were removed from Protestant institutions to certified Catholic schools, and said that this number would fill up the existing schools. Fifteen hundred Catholic children were still in Protestant Poor-law schools, and he hoped the clergy and laity would labour together to provide means to rescue them.

On Sunday afternoon last, the anniversary of the Queen's accession, the Dean of Westminster preached a sermon on the royal supremacy. He showed how fully that doctrine was recognised by the Church of England, and enlarged upon the consequences which followed from it, without, however, referring directly to the Irish Church Bill or to any other event of contemporary history. At the epoch of the Reformation it was supposed that the Emperor of Germany, as the head of the holy Roman empire, and the Pope, were superior to all other European potentates. It was against this intrusion of a foreign power, in the person of an Italian prince, that the Protestant sovereigns, especially the Protestant sovereign of England, declared themselves thenceforth free. He protested "that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm." That was, in other words, to say that no institution or person, however venerable or sacred, could interfere with the allegiance of Christian ministers to their own country and their own laws. Up to the time of the Reformation, too, in every country, there had been a deep gulf which divided class from class, which made an empire within an empire, and which threatened to rend empires asunder—he alluded to the separate privilege of power which had existed on the part of that grand profession which at one time or another had done more good or more evil than any other—the sacred order of the clergy. It was one of the fundamental principles of the Reformation that henceforth this separate, this overwhelming power of the clerical order should cease, and that the clergy, like other classes of the community, should neither themselves be controlled nor be able to control others by rules of their own making, being bound only by those laws which bound the whole community. That was the meaning of that part of the royal supremacy. The Queen was head of the Church because she was the head of the nation; the ministers of the Church were, for the same reason, ministers also of the nation; the law of the nation was, for the same reason, the law of the Church.

AMERICAN NOTES.

Henry Ward Beecher has several times declined the honorary degree of D.D. When asked to give his reasons for doing so, he said: I declined it because I did not want it. I had it already. Every Irishman called me "Doctor." Every man that begged for 50 cents called me "Doctor." Indeed, I was called "your reverence"—a title which belongs to the Cardinal, I believe. What good would a college degree do a man who already had it conferred upon him by the great university of the common people?

The Romanists in the United States have succeeded in making a first inroad upon the uniformity of the Common School system. The corrupt Legislature of New York lately voted 20 per cent. of the Excise Fund at their disposal, amounting to $60,000, to the support of sectarian schools, the larger part going to Roman Catholic schools. The Protestants of all grades are very indignant, but whether they will be able to obtain an immediate reversal of the vote is doubtful. The Romanists are not holding their ground in the States, in spite of the great influx of Irish, and they know that their only chance is to get hold of the schools; but the people at large are so deeply impressed with the value of secular and undenominational education that they have no chance of doing this excepting where the ruling body has become thoroughly rotten, and no compact is too disgraceful to be entertained.

In reply to a correspondent, who contends that the code of Christian ethics, which prescribes forgiveness of injuries and patience in our relations with wrong-doers, is not applicable to nations; that the first duty of a statesman is to bear the flag with honour, though it might be his duty as an individual to turn his right cheek to the man who had smitten him on the left, the Nation very justly and seasonably observes:

"This distinction exists, it is true; but as civilisation advances, every nation's estimate of what is due to its honour is influenced by the consideration of the grave consequences attendant on all attempts to vindicate it. Hot words and unhandsome behaviour between individuals may be avenged simply by coolness, or fisticuffs, or mutual slaughter. In any case, all that happens is that two high-minded and touchy gentlemen have their clothes torn and their lives or limbs imperilled. No great interest is seriously affected by their manner of terminating their differences. But when nations come to blows, the moral and material welfare of millions, both of the present and coming generations, is involved in the contest. The very march of civilisation is retarded by every shot that is fired, and fountains of misery are unsealed which often flow for centuries. The man who can approach a controversy which may have to be closed by such an arbitrament as this in the same spirit, and with the same loose watch on his tongue, with which he would approach a difference between individuals, not only need not disclaim the character of a Christian, but would find some difficulty in enrolling himself in any recognised school of philosophy or jurisprudence. The bravest soldiers and the finest gentlemen that have ever lived have been the heartiest in their horror of war, the readiest to exhaust all other means of obtaining redress before resorting to it; and men who really dread war, as all good men ought, are just as careful about creating the state of feeling out of which war may flash unexpectedly as about striking the first blow. Taunts, defiance, and passionate charges are things, therefore, which men in positions of responsibility are bound to avoid until the moment of physical action is near at hand. They have no place in civilised diplomacy, and it is not till the resources of diplomacy are exhausted that the war-drum should be beaten."

Dr. Williams, of Pekin, China, has presented to the American Bible Society a very ancient Hebrew manuscript of Genesis, Exodus, and part of Leviticus, obtained from Jews in that country.

The New York Tribune says that the Rev. Mrs. Buffum, of Chicago, announces herself as president of the "New American church," which is regularly formed and now contains 300 members. The Deity is addressed as the "Divine Family—Lord the Mother, God the Father, Christ the Son, and Soul the Daughter."

The Atlantic Monthly gives the following striking account of a visit to a coal mine paid by a devoted minister, now gone to his rest:—When he found himself in the heart of the mountain, surrounded by this immense body of coal, which he was told extended for miles on every side, he looked about him for some moments in speechless awe and wonder, then reverently took off his hat; theology bowed before geology; and he called to the miners, in a sudden, loud voice, that echoed portentously through the long dim-lighted cavern: "Praise the Lord! get down on your knees every one of you, and praise the Lord for His wonderful providence!" This summons he delivered with such prophetic power of lungs and spirit that all the miners except one threw down their tools and knelt with him on the spot. "I thought first I wouldn't kneel," said the exception; "I never had knelt for any man, and I didn't believe I ever should. But he begun to pray, and I tell you if my knees didn't begin to give way under me; he put in, and my legs crooked and crooked, till I couldn't stand it no longer; by George! he prayed me down." I thought the power of the preacher must have been somewhat to bring such rude men to their knees. Not uninteresting to contemplate is the picture of the little group bowed in worship there in the hollow mine, lighted only by the small lamps hooked on to the miners' caps and by the serene eye of day looking in smilingly at the end of the cavern.

The session of the Connecticut Legislature was was recently opened with prayer by a coloured clergyman.

An Indiana paper has two columns of religious news and comment, the one edited by a Catholic priest, and the other by an Episcopalian clergyman.

The two oldest Jewish rabbis in the United States have issued a call inviting "their theologically educated colleagues who favour decided religious progress to a Rabbinical conference."—The Jewish Times, which publishes this call, makes the following comments upon it:—"Such a conference, a desideratum for years, has now become an absolute necessity. In this country, where no necessity exists to temporise and compromise, where those who are in sympathy with the ideas of progress congregate together, and make no concessions to those who yet are tied with iron chains to the habits of the past, the advocates of decided positive reform should come out boldly and proclaim their views and principles, and bring about a harmony of practice with the weight and authority which such a conference would impart. Such questions as divorces by the civil courts, the Levirate marriage, and others of a like pressing nature, want an authoritative solution. A concurrent declaration should establish for ever, if in our Agenda prayers for the restitution of animal sacrifices, for a personal Messiah, for a re-construction of a temporal kingdom in Palestine, and for the Hebrew language, as the principal language of prayer, are to be retained, or whether reformed Judaism is to drop obsolete customs which have no longer any meaning and significance in our days."

THE ORTHODOX HELL.

THE Chicago Tribune of May 17 reports verbatim a powerful sermon on the above subject, preached the evening before in the Church of the Messiah, by the Rev. R. Laird Collier. We give the following extract:

"I read this very day (probably you did) that the wife of an honourable member of our National Congress, from the State of New York (Lockport, I think), had recently gone mad—suddenly—I think last Monday—through the preaching of the Rev. Dr. Hammond, an Orthodox minister. When I was a pastor of a Methodist Church in this city I attended two or three of his meetings. He had hundreds of little children before him. I never so shuddered; I never so felt that Christianity was misrepresented. I heard that man tell little children that they were condemned; that they were under the wrath of God; that unless they were converted they were hell-bound. I saw little children shudder and weep and cry and tremble. I saw little children almost crazed there by this horrible heathenish preaching. No wonder that an intelligent woman, if she accepted it at all, has been crazed; and I simply say that this doctrine of an endless hell has never yet terrified man's heart; it simply terrifies his nerves. If it has saved them at all, it has been their terror and not their purification. I wish to say, and to say just as boldly as I can, that 'if truth cannot save a man, terror and error never will.'"

SUNDAY-SCHOOL GOVERNMENT.

THERE can hardly be any greater contrasts than those afforded by the different modes in which Sunday-schools and Congregations are generally managed. The former, as a rule, are democracies, pure and simple; the latter take any shape but that, and are never absolutely popular. They may be autocratic, or aristocratic—are generally oligarchic—or there may be no recognised form of government whatever. Often enough they present marked illustrations of the old saying, that what is everybody's business is nobody's, and so nobody does what everybody ought at least to feel an interest in seeing done efficiently and well. In a school, on the other hand, all the teachers share an equal responsibility in whatever concerns its welfare, and the suffrage is universal. Sex is no barrier, and youth no disqualification. The election of a superintendent, or the appointment of a minister to preach the anniversary sermons, rests as much in the hands of the inexperienced as of the mature, and the recruit has the same rights as the veteran.

Now, one consequence of these opposite systems of government is frequently discernible in an extreme and chronic jealousy between the governing bodies of the school and of the congregation. Each watches the other with sleepless vigilance and unfading suspicion. The most active men cultivate an esprit-de-corps which imposes on each side the duty of maintaining an attitude of self-defence, even if no aggression be attempted. The Chapel Warden and the School Superintendent are the leaders of contending forces, when they should be the mutual aids and reconcilers of the interests they respectively represent. They regard each other as natural enemies, rather than as faithful and sympathising allies.

How far this mutual dislike would be removed by assimilating the forms of government of the two bodies, it may not be easy to determine. Perhaps the scheme requires an infusion of the aristocratic element, which, in the congregation, would be improved by some admixture with a more popular spirit and tone. Indeed, it seems hardly reasonable, on the face of it, that a youth or a maiden, while still perhaps unenfranchised from the teens, should be admitted at once to a voice and a vote in the administration of school affairs. The subject of deliberation may be a question of discipline, of finance, of government, or of general policy; it may be a matter involving character, or some equally delicate point—demanding extreme care, sound judgment, and the tact of experience and skill. But, under prevailing conditions, it is submitted unreservedly to a miscellaneous body, possessing no qualifications for its decision save good intentions and undoubted zeal.

Under circumstances such as these, it is not a matter of marvel that Teachers' Meetings for business are generally unsatisfactory. They are but ill-adapted for careful deliberation on many subjects, and for others are almost entirely unsuitable. Discussion is vague, protracted, and consequently tedious, and tends to distraction and weakness. The thoughtful and modest are overpowered by the presence of numbers, whilst the temptation to the talker becomes from the same cause almost irresistible.

It can hardly be doubted that some change in these respects is greatly needed. The members of a congregation depute the administration of their affairs to a small and selected body, held responsible to their constituents. Why should not the teachers of a school elect a committee from among themselves, to whom they should remit the general superintendence of their interests and the oversight of their operations? Ample guarantees can easily be secured for the faithful discharge of this, as of other trusts, as the general body would always possess the power to displace the incompetent and the negligent. The greatest experience, the ripest wisdom, the best culture, in a school, would thus be placed in authority and invested with power. That sense of responsibility would be induced which is the parent of energy, industry, and enterprise. The general body of co-operators would learn, in giving the privilege of government to others, to surrender for the time being, or at least greatly to qualify, their own claims to its exercise, and would emulate each other in respectful deference to the executive department they had jointly created.

At present, our Sunday-schools are examples of that scattered power which is equivalent to weakness. They need a despotism tempered with a studious regard to courtesy and kindness, but resolute to maintain authority and enforce discipline. If it be true that the first qualification for a governor is that he should learn to obey, it must be true that our teachers would largely promote their own efficiency, and augment immeasurably the useful capacities of their schools, by delegating to a small number of colleagues all the duties of government, and by devoting their thoughts and energies with exclusive care to the immediate and most important functions of their high office. DEATH OF REV. R. B. ASPLAND, M.A.

"FRIEND after friend departs." While we are still feeling the deep sense of irreparable loss in the death of one of our foremost scholars, we learn that another of the most honoured men among our ministers has passed from among us. The Rev. Robert Brook Aspland, M.A., long minister of Dukinfield, and in later years of our church at Hackney which had been a generation ago associated with the name of his father, died suddenly near midnight on June 21st. He had for several months past been out of health, but quite recently had appeared to be in better health and spirits than for some time previously. On the day of his death he had seen several friends and written many letters, and retired about eleven. Within an hour, having risen up owing to a fit of coughing, he fell down and expired.

Mr. Aspland was a man not only of deep religious feeling but of great practical sagacity. During many years he was one of the secretaries of Manchester New College, and soon after his removal to London he took in hand the affairs of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which he steered through many difficulties with rare tact and ability, and leaves perhaps the most flourishing and active of our institutions. Nor must the services he rendered to the cause of liberal Christianity, especially in its historical aspects, by his long editorship of the Christian Reformer, be forgotten.

On the day of his death he had been very deeply gratified by receiving from his congregation a kind request that he would take three months' holiday and rest. A longer, happier rest is his, and the "well done, good and faithful servant," and the new and nobler tasks of heaven.

A BISHOP'S BELIEF.

DR. CLAYTON, Bishop of Clogher, who died in 1758, makes the following remarks in his "Vindication of the Histories of the Old and New Testament:—"

No one can believe anything unless he hath some reason or other for believing it. . . . As our belief in the sacred writings dependeth upon the nature and reason of things, as well as upon testimony, it is irrational to suppose that we ought to believe anything, let the testimony be ever so strong, which is contradictory to nature and reason.—Part ii., letter iii.

The Athanasian exposition of the Trinity seemeth not only contradictory to common sense, but also to the Scriptures both of the Old and New Testament. For they represent the Messiah as being the Mediator between the Supreme God and man; whereas, the Athanasian doctrine will not allow him to be an intermediate Being, as the term Mediator naturally implies, but to be a composition of two parties, perfect God and perfect man. The Scriptures represent the Messiah as being a separate and distinct agent from God the Father, and as acting in obedience to His commands; but the Athanasian doctrine will have him to be the Supreme God himself; and asserts the Father and Son, the Begotten and the Begotten, to be still one and the same undivided Substance or Being; and is not content with declaring the Son to be of the same kind of Essence with the Father, but insists upon his being the same undivided or individual Essence or Being with the Father. The Scriptures represent the Messiah as having been sent upon earth not to do his own will, but the will of the Father who sent him (John iv., 34; v., 30); but the Athanasian doctrine will have the person sending and the person sent still to be but one and the same Being, and to have but one will, not only in harmony or agreement, but in reality. For, as Lord Bacon expresseth it: "A Christian [that is, a Christian according to the sentiments of Athanasius] is one that believes things his reason cannot comprehend. He believes three to be one, and one to be three; a father not to be older than his son; a son to be equal to his father; and one proceeding from both to be equal with both; he believes three persons in one nature, and two natures in one person." And Dr. South, speaking of the same opinions, says that "If they were not to be adored as a mystery, they would be exploded as a contradiction." And I desire your lordship will tell me whether you think that such doctrines as these are likely to gain over many thinking persons from Deism to Revelation?

But Lord Bacon, who was no great favourite with the clergy, sheltered himself from their resentment for this description which he here giveth of a Christian, under that well-known apology of believing things which our reason cannot comprehend. As if faith and reason were to be kept at perpetual variance; or like the two ends of a balance, were always one of them to be up, when the other was down. Whereas, as I before observed, it is absurd for a rational creature to believe anything unless he has some reason for believing it. And in my humble opinion, a reason which he cannot comprehend, is to him no reason at all. The virtue or merit of believing does not consist barely in believing; for then the most credulous persons would be the most virtuous or meritorious believers, which is absurd. But the virtue or merit of believing, consists in believing upon reasonable grounds.—Part iii., letter i.

Whatever proposition contains a manifest contradiction in itself, cannot possibly be true; and therefore ought not to be believed, because no such proposition can come from God. As for example: Suppose an angel from heaven should say that the Son of God was begotten before all worlds and yet was self-existent; as the two terms begotten and self-existent are contradictory terms, I would with St. Paul (Gal. i., 8) say, Let him be accursed; as such an angel could not possibly be an angel sent from God.—Part iii., letter i.

The common expression, believing a mystery, seems to be a very improper one. If we insert the word secret instead of mystery, we shall readily see the impropriety of speech in saying that we believe a secret. For while a thing continues to be an absolute secret, it is impossible for anyone to believe anything about it. We may indeed believe that there is a secret; but we cannot properly be said to believe the secret.—Part iii., letter i.

Heretic is a term of reproach which designing men who have no other merit but their reputed orthodoxy, are fond of giving to those whom they would have excluded out of the Church, because thereby there would be more room made for themselves and others as ignorant as they. But to a rational inquirer after truth who is not self-condemned, it is vox et præterea nihil.—Part iii., letter ii.

There cannot be a stronger sign of the falsehood of any doctrine than when its advocates are for making a mystery of it, exclaim against the use of reason in religious affairs, and are unwilling to have their opinions tried by that touchstone. For set aside reason, and it must be equal, whether you are a Brahmin or a Christian divine. Or rather, the heathen priest must be preferable to the Christian; since if we set aside reason, the more absurd our belief is, the more meritorious it ought to be.—Part iii., letter ii.

Falsehood generally struts about the streets in majestic state, surrounded with guards and attended with hectors to keep people at a distance, and to prevent them taking too near a view. Her outside is fair and specious, and upon her forehead is a name written, Mystery. (Rev. xvii., 5.) Whereas Truth, on the other hand, dwells in a homely and retired cottage; the road to which is intricate and narrow, though it widens as you proceed, and over her gates is written, Prove all things. Let us then, in God's name, proceed and pursue our inquiry; and let us not be afraid of entering that maze of doubt through which every one must pass who expects to be approved, and find out the road which leads to truth.—Part iii., letter ii.

As he supposeth the second and third persons in the Trinity to be self-existent and co-eternal and co-equal with the first, the supposing one of them to be a son, and to have been begotten—even before all worlds—is undoubtedly a contradiction.—Part iii., letter iv.

Are there any sexes in God? Hath God a son? And doth God beget Gods as men beget children? Forbid the thought! But when we speak of Christ as the Son of God before all ages, this expression must not be understood as being significative of the manner of his production into existence, but only as intended to denote God's affection towards him. . . . The denominations of a son, a first-born son, and an only son, being the nearest and dearest relations which mankind is acquainted with. For this reason it was that God, to show Pharaoh the great regard and love which He had for the children of Israel, ordered Moses (Exod. iv., 22) to express himself after this peculiar manner, Thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Israel is my son, even my first-born.—Part iii., letter v.

There cannot be a stronger proof of the falsehood of that doctrine which asserts the Father and the Son to be one and the same undivided or individual substance, than this uncontroverted declaration of the Scriptures that the Son of God was born of the Virgin Mary, whereas neither the Father nor the Holy Ghost were either begotten or born. Since there cannot be a greater contradiction in nature than to assert that one and the same individual substance was at the same time in the same place and not in the same place, was born and not born.

DOUBT AND FAITH.

I LONG the good and true to know,
In certainty of hope to grow;
Oh, satisfy my soul's desire,
And with Thy spirit mine inspire!

The mysteries of time and space,
Exhausting reason's power to trace;
Raise in my mind the solemn thought,
"Man in the universe is nought."

"On the sea shore, of sands a grain;
A single drop in ocean's rain;
In space, a point we cannot see;
A moment in eternity."

"Possessing no immortal soul,
Except as part of nature's whole;
The race perpetual, but man's breath,
Absorbed in nature's life, at death."

Dismayed, I ask, "Can God intend,
With this short life my life to end?
That I should seek, yet ever miss,
The goal of knowledge, virtue, bliss?"

The wise, the good, of every age,
Look for the brighter heritage;
Where life, begun in pain below,
Shall onward to perfection flow.

This instinct deep of human hearts
God's ever-living truth imparts;
This we may trust, and feel secure,
Man, like his Maker, will endure.

HENRY NORRINGTON.

BIRDS OF THE GUANO ISLANDS.

A WRITER in the New York Times, in relating the story of his life on a Guano Island, thus speaks of the feathered population:—Among the chief objects of interest on Baker's Island to a visitor are the birds, and they are well worthy of study. During the first night of my stay on this forlorn spot it seemed at times as if the house were besieged by innumerable tom-cats; then the tumult resembled the suppressed bleating of goats, and I heard noises as of bats grinding their teeth in rage; again it was the querulous cooing of doves; and soon the chorus was strengthened by unearthly screams, as of ghouls and demons in mortal agony. But on going forth into the darkness to learn the cause of this infernal serenade, all was apparently calm and serene, and the radiant constellation of the Southern Cross, with the neighbouring clouds of Magellan, looked me peacefully in the face, while from another quarter of the heavens the Pleiads shed their "sweet influence" over the scene. The most quiet time of night with the birds is about daybreak, when they seem to subside into "catnaps," preparatory to the labours of the day. By day many of the birds range on tireless wing, over leagues of ocean, in quest of fish. But still the number of those that remain about the island is so great as to defy computation, and as you pass through their haunts, in some places they rise in such clouds as actually to darken the air above you. The eggs of some of the birds are of fine quality, and are much esteemed by the Americans as well as the Hawaiians on the island. Those of a bird called the nu-e-ko are the most valued. This name is an imitative word, derived from the cry of this restless creature, and is applied to it by the Hawaiians, who have quick intuitions in onomatopoeic matters.

In regard to moral character, the birds of Baker's Island may be divided into two classes—those which make an honest living, and those which are robbers. The gannet stands at the head of the respectable birds, and is a thrifty and honest citizen of the air. The representative of the thievish class is the frigate pelican, or man-of-war hawk (tachypetes aquilus). This bird has a dense plumage of gloomy black, a light, wiry body, that seems made for fleetness, and wings of even greater spread than the gannet's. Its tail is deeply forked, its bill is long, sharp, and viciously hooked. Audubon regards the frigate-bird as superior, perhaps, in power of flight to any other. It never dives into the ocean after fish, but will sometimes catch them while they are leaping out of the water to escape pursuit. It is often content to glut itself with the dead fish that float on the water, but it depends mostly for a subsistence upon robbing other birds. It is interesting to watch them thus occupied. As evening comes on these pirates may be seen lying in wait about the island for the return of the heavily-laden fishing birds. The smaller ones they easily overtake and compel them to disgorge their spoils; but to waylay and levy black mail upon those powerful galleons, the gannets, is an achievement requiring strategy and address. As the richly-laden gannet approaches the coast of his island home, he lifts himself to a great height, and steadily oars himself along with his mighty pinions, until he sees his native sands extending in dazzling whiteness below. Now sloping downward in his flight, he descends with incredible velocity. In a moment more he will be safe with his affectionate mate who is awaiting his return to the nest. But all this time he is watched by the keen eye of the man-of-war hawk, who has stationed himself so as to intercept the gannet in his swift course. With the quickness of thought the hawk darts upon him, and, not daring to attack boldly in front, he plucks him by the tail and threatens to upset him, or he seizes him at the back of the neck and lashes him with his long wings. When the poor gannet, who cannot manœuvre so quickly as his opponent, finds himself pursued, he tries to buy his ransom by surrendering a portion of his fishy cargo, which the hawk, swooping down, catches before it has had time to reach the earth. If there is but one hawk this may be a sufficient toll, but if the unwieldy gannet is set upon by a number of these pirates he utters a cry of real terror and woe, and, rushing through the air with a sound like a rocket, in his rapid descent, he seeks to alight on the nearest point of land, well knowing that when once he has a footing on terra firma not even the man-of-war hawk dare come near him. The man-of-war hawk is provided about its neck and chest with a dilatable sack, of a blood red colour, which it seems to be able to inflate at pleasure. On calm days, about noon, when the trade wind lulls, giving place to a sea breeze that gently fans the torrid island, these light, feathery birds may sometimes be seen at an immense height balancing themselves for whole hours without apparent motion on their outstretched vans. Whether they are able to increase their specific levity by inflating their pouches with a gas lighter than the atmosphere, or whether they are sustained by the uprising column of heated air that comes in on all sides from the ocean, is a question I am unable to answer. While floating thus, this bird has its pouch puffed out about its neck, giving it the same appearance as though it had its throat muffled in red flannel.

A LARGER HEART.

"I will run the way of Thy commandments when Thou shalt enlarge my heart."—PSALM cxix., 32.

One time my soul, impatient, made request
In words like these: "Dear Lord, Thou knowest well

How poor, how mean my service is at best—
How narrow are the bounds wherein I dwell—
How straitened is my life, how small my sphere;
All this, and more, doth to Thine eyes appear.

"Then wilt Thou, Lord, increase my usefulness?
Sweep down the narrow boundaries of my life?
Or set me in a newer, larger place,

Where I may share the service and the strife,
The weariness as well? I ask not rest,
But only room to do Thy high behest.

"I count with saddened heart my passing days,
So full of petty needs and petty gains—
I long for one great work whereby to praise
Thy name! one noble offering, scoring pains.
Enlarge my life—make all its pathways broad—
That so my eager soul may serve Thee, Lord!"

Then, as I mused upon the sacred Word,
Methought the answer came: "The fault lies not,
Short-sighted worker, in the narrow road—

Nor in the straitened life, nor humble lot—
Not these the hinderances that fetter thee;
Then ask not wider opportunity.

"But ask a larger heart—thy greatest need—
A heart enlarged and filled with faith and love.
Seek but for this and thou shalt learn indeed

How life below may bloom like life above;
And, with thy heart enlarged, no path can be
A narrow or a barren path to thee."

Rebuked and penitent, I pondered long

Upon the words the Psalmist breathed of old.
Viewed by their light, I felt my prayer was wrong;
Since then I only ask, by faith made bold,

"Enlarge my heart, oh, Father! for I see
That thus, and only thus, our steps draw near to Thee!"

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

THIS annual meeting of the Presbyterian and Unitarian ministers and congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire was held June 17th, in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester. Among those present were the Revs. J. Wright, B.A. (Bury), H. Green (Knutsford), A. Gordon, M.A., J. Cuckson, C. Beard (Liverpool), J. Drummond, S. A. Steinthal, W. H. Herford, B.A., Brooke Herford, B. Walker, J. Harrop (Manchester), J. K. Smith (Newchurch), H. Fogg (Ormskirk), W. Oates (Birkenhead), George Fox (Park Lane), J. Fox (Heywood), J. Black (Stockport), W. C. Squier (Stand), A. Payne (Wilmslow), H. E. Dowson, B.A. (Gee Cross), G. Beaumont (Gateacre), R. J. Orr (Preston), R. L. Carpenter (Bridport), J. T. Whitehead (Ainsworth), A. Rushton (Hindley), B. Glover (Crewe), G. Ride (Chorley), J. S. Gilbert (Rivington), M. C. Frankland (Chowbent), J. Freeston and T. Carter (Rochdale), T. Holland (Southport), D. Berry (Mossley), J. Worthington and J. Entwistle (Bolton), F. Revitt (Mottram), J. W. Rodgers (Burnley), W. Probert (Walmesley), J. C. Lunn and D. Davis (Lancaster), R. C. Dendy (Flowery Field), W. G. Cadman (Dob Lane); Dr. W. Fairbairn, Messrs. T. Avison, P. Eckersley, R. D. Darbshire, H. Rawson, C. S. Grundy, John Grundy, Thomas Worthington, Samuel Greg, Robert Nicholson, G. S. Darbshire, R. M. Shipman, F. Craven, E. Shawcross, Richard Aspdin, J. Eooks, — Marshall, G. Taylor, H. Grundy, J. Dendy, B.A., C. J. Herford, — Peacock.

The proceedings of the Assembly began with a service at eleven o'clock, led by the Rev. A. Gordon, the Rev. C. W. Robberds preaching from John xviii., 38, "Pilate saith unto him, what is truth?"

THE BUSINESS MEETING

was held, after an interval, at one o'clock, when the Secretary (Rev. J. Wright) rose and explained that the Rev. Wm. Gaskell was too ill to take his accustomed place as chairman. The meeting thereupon called the Rev. Dr. Beard to the chair.

The roll of ministers and delegates having been read, and the congregation at Kendal and their minister, and also the Rev. Benjamin Walker, now appointed permanent minister at Rochdale-road, having been added to the roll,

The CHAIRMAN opened the further proceedings by expressing his regret for the absence of Mr. Gaskell, with whom for forty years he had worked, and for whom he had the greatest esteem and love.

After the minutes of the last meeting had been read and confirmed, he announced the ministerial changes of the year: the Rev. W. Oates had removed from Derby to Birkenhead, the Rev. J. Macdonald had settled at Nantwich, R. H. Cotton at Padiham, and B. Walker at the Rochdale-road Mission. He also alluded with very deep feeling to the death of the Rev. J. J. Tayler, late Principal of the Manchester New College, who had been a beloved friend of his, and a co-operator with him in Manchester for many years.

The Rev. C. BEARD proposed a resolution to the effect that the Provincial Assembly had heard with the deepest regret of the death of the Rev. J. J. Tayler, and they desired to express their high admiration of Mr. Tayler's long and varied services in the cause of Christian truth, liberty, and charity—as an author, minister of religion, and theologian—and their deep personal sorrow for the loss of a friend whom they loved not less than they revered. It was with great diffidence that he rose to speak of Mr. Tayler in the presence of fathers in the ministry who had been much longer and more intimately associated with him, and yet he rose because of the gratitude and love which he felt for him and which would not be satisfied without he did so. He scarcely knew which side of Mr. Tayler's character to approach, whether that of his thirty years' ministry in Manchester, or his fifty years' connection with Manchester New College in a spirit ripening and deepening in faithfulness to it to the last, or his history in association with the free Catholic literature of his time. But of one thing he was sure, that on whatever side of his character they looked they could not help feeling how great had been their loss. While his learning was wide and his knowledge exact, his sympathies were with all even the simplest, forms of religious life. His learning never made him dry—never removed him from the springs of emotion. He was a great scholar, and at the same time a true religious prophet—imbued with a faith of the deepest kind; and he, for one, could not believe a church to be alien to Christianity that could produce so fine a life. (Hear, hear.) The sense of loss was brought more painfully to his mind by the approach of the College examinations. For many years he had been accustomed to meet Mr. Tayler there, but this year he looked forward to them with a heavy heart, for he feared he should have to go up without the company of their president, Mr. Gaskell, and he should miss Mr. Tayler's kind welcome. If, however, they felt as he did that it is but a blank look out as they cast about in vain for others to take the places of those who thus one by one dropped from our ranks, yet he felt assured that God would never suffer His truth to fail, and that He would raise up other servants to bear testimony to it, it might be nobler than ourselves. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. EDWARD SHAWCROSS seconded the motion as one who had been associated with Mr. Tayler during his ministry at Upper Brook-street.

The Rev. GEORGE BEAUMONT was then elected "supporter"—to conduct the service next year, when the Rev. A. Gordon will be the preacher—and the next Assembly was appointed to be at Gee Cross. The officers for the next year, on the motion of the Rev. J. DRUMMOND, were also appointed, after which

Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE read a report from the Sub-Committee, to whom, last year, Mr. Darbshire's propositions had been referred. The resolution appointing them in 1868 was as follows:

"That the following gentlemen, namely, the President, the Secretary, and the Revs. J. R. Beard, D.D., C. Beard, B.A., James Drummond, B.A., B. Herford, J. Page Hoppes, and S. A. Steintal, with Messrs. W. J. Lampert, R. M. Shipman, and R. D. Darbshire (Convenor), with power to add to their number, be requested, as a Committee of the Assembly, to consider the propositions and report, with especial regard to the advantage of a satisfactory declaration of the objects and constitution of the Assembly; and to prepare such resolutions on the matter for the consideration of the Assembly of 1869, as they may think fit; with power to circulate a report and recommendations before that Meeting."

The Committee now reported:

"The Committee feeling that protracted discussions of questions as to the objects and constitution of the Assembly, such as have for several years past occupied successive meetings, tend to the postponement of more interesting matters, and even to promoting a certain disaffection towards the Assembly, reports unanimously in favour of some satisfactory declaration on these subjects."

After careful consideration, the Committee has prepared the following Declaration for the consideration of the Assembly of 1869, and recommends its adoption:—

PROPOSED DECLARATION.

I. The name of the Assembly shall be "The Provincial Assembly: an Annual Meeting of Ministers and Congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire."

II. The objects of the Assembly are—(a) The assembling, under the solemn sanctions of a religious service and a special discourse from a selected preacher, of such ministers and members of congregations from all parts of the province as may choose to attend; for (b) Free conferences on questions of general interest, or the theory of special agencies; and (c) the friendly intercourse which springs out of such assembling, repeated year after year.

III. As the Organisation of the Assembly, there shall be annually appointed a President, a Secretary, and a Treasurer, and also a Committee, consisting of these officers, and Five Ministers and Five Laymen. The Committee shall keep the roll of ministers and congregations; shall fix the time and place of its meetings; and, generally, shall make all needful arrangements for the holding and course of the same. Ministers or congregations shall be added to the roll on application to, and by a vote at any Assembly. Every person present, being a minister or member of a congregation on the roll, shall be at liberty to vote.

IV. For the purpose of maintaining the interest of the congregations, and securing the attendance of members from as many of them as may be possible at successive Assemblies, the Secretary of the Assembly shall regularly issue to the ministers, and to the officers of each congregation and to such laymen as may intimate their desire to receive the circulars, at least three weeks before the day fixed for the Assembly for the year, notice of time and place of meeting and of the order and nature of the matters to be brought forward.

The Committee is of opinion that, for the full development of the various opportunities afforded by the Assembly Gathering, several modifications of the course of the business of its meetings might advantageously be introduced, especially with regard to the form and conduct of the religious service, and the regular provision and discussion of subjects of general interest; but it considers that these points had better be reserved for discussion and suggestion at the hands of a future committee.

Mr. Darbshire said the Committee had carefully gone through those subjects, and had drawn up the declaration with great minuteness and after full consideration. The chief points were, as would be perceived, the change in the name of the Association, omitting the phrase "Presbyterian and Unitarian;" the declaration on the object of the Assembly—for the purpose of meeting for worship, for conference, and for intercourse; and, the substitution of the right of every member of a congregation which was on the roll to vote, instead of the present system of delegate voting.

The CHAIRMAN said, as representing Mr. Gaskell, it was his duty to propose the adoption of the report which had just been read. He was particular in his statement, because although his name was on the list of the committee, and although he had attended, he did not positively approve of this change. In order that the meeting might see its bearings, he might mention that the point of difference between them, as at present constituted, and as they would be constituted if the report should be adopted, was work. Some years ago Mr. Gaskell, himself, and some others, had taken great pains to give to that Assembly benevolent work. Their proposed plans were adopted only in part, but they had called into existence some societies which had been very efficient in the great work of promoting the Gospel as they understood it. The East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, the Manchester District Association, the East Cheshire Association, and the Mission Society in Liverpool, had done and were doing good work. Those four societies were connected with the Assembly, as children with a parent, and made their reports partly through the Assembly. The connection of the Assembly, however, with work, was not immediate. They had again and again tried to institute instrumentalities proceeding from and immediately answerable to the Assembly. Some of them, of whom he confessed himself to be one, would rather develop the element of work in the hands of the Assembly. Others, like his friend Mr. Darbshire, would rather eliminate that element. He might be asked why, being a member of the committee, he appeared as a consenting party to the recommendation. For a series of years they had had meetings on those occasions, the general tenor of which, at any rate very much in their tenor, had given him very great pain. He did not think that a religious influence of a proper character had been exercised at those meetings; and on that ground, and in the hope that the element of dispute and disagreement might be eliminated, he acquiesced in the proposed arrangement. He now proposed the adoption of the report which had been read.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTAL seconded the adoption of the report, and with regard to the change in the name of the Assembly, said he would remind them that was not the first time they had altered their designation. The Assembly was once known as the Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian Divines; and when in the lapse of time certain other congregations were established definitely holding Unitarian opinions, it was considered proper to admit them to all the advantages which the Assembly could offer. But at present they had noticed that a change was coming over the whole constitution of the religious world; and the committee believed that it would be to the advantage of all if the Assembly were to be so far an open one as to admit into its membership not only those holding certain definite views with which the members of the Assembly agreed, but also any churches that desired to co-operate with them. The alteration in the name was, therefore, proposed in order that churches of a similar character to their own might be freely admitted to membership. Then, as to the second point, the change of object of the Assembly, he differed somewhat from the Chairman's remarks. He did not believe that a varying Assembly like the present, one in which they did not from year to year see the same faces, was a fit and proper association to carry out definite works. Yet he believed that they had a high and holy work to do in that Assembly. They could come together year after year to refresh their spirits by communion one with another, by dwelling on those sacred truths that formed the foundation of their spiritual life, and inspiring one another with renewed zeal and earnestness in the advance of truth; that was where the work of the Assembly really lay. He was secretary to the missionary branch of the Provincial Assembly, and if any person could speak as to the inefficiency of that missionary branch, he could do so, for he knew how utterly impossible it was for them to do any work from that Assembly. There were matters of detail connected with the leading features of the proposed plan which it would be impossible fully to discuss in an assembly of that kind, and, therefore, if it should be adopted, a committee would be appointed for the purpose of carrying out the details.

The Rev. J. S. GILBERT objected to the vagueness of the title proposed. He admired catholicity, but thought the idea of admitting others than Unitarians was Utopian.

The Rev. B. HERFORD moved as an amendment to the first section of the declaration in the report: That the name of the Assembly should be "The Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire;" but that this name should be followed in all public and official documents by the words "established by the English Presbyterians under Act of Parliament, A.D. 1646; altered into an assembly of Presbyterians and Unitarians in 183—; and opened to all ministers and congregations in the province in 1869." He felt the desirableness of keeping the short public name, as suggested by the committee, free from any sectarian meaning; but he thought the name should, when they put it forth to the world, be accompanied by a few words which would sufficiently connect the Assembly with the past, explain its historical position, and show that the words which had heretofore been associated with it as a sectarian denomination, had not been left out from any shame of Unitarianism, but simply in a spirit of catholicity.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTAL and Mr. DARBISHIRE said they were willing to accept Mr. Herford's proposal as an integral part of the report.

Mr. JOHN DENDY objected to their cutting off all the historical parts of the name of the Association.

Mr. JOHN GRUNDY said he had not had an opportunity of reading the report before coming to the meeting, but having now heard it read he did not feel satisfied that it should pass. He had heard no reason to recommend the change of name. If he understood it properly it now represented what they were—an Assembly of Unitarian and Presbyterian ministers and congregations, and until they heard that somebody was knocking at the door and desirous of coming in, he should be much inclined to retain the name which correctly described them. He trusted he was second to no man in that meeting in true catholicity of spirit, and he should be delighted to see an assembly of Christian ministers of various denominations, attended by their congregations, in Cross-street Chapel. ("Hear, hear," and great laughter.) But why hanker after a thing you cannot have? (Hear, hear.) We are separated from the rest of the Christian community by broad and known lines, and though you may attempt it, you will never get rid of the name which describes you. You are Unitarians—(hear, hear)—and Unitarians you must be called—(hear, hear)—and Unitarian I delight to be called. If those who brought forward this report could show that by their name they had excluded any one congregation, however humble in rank, he for one should be content to make some alteration by which the sensitive church should be brought in; but to alter their name for the purpose of inviting others who would not come, appeared to him to be idle and foolish. He could appreciate the spirit of the Chairman in moving the report, but he could not disguise the fact that they were asking the Assembly to get rid of work. They had had a missionary branch which had fallen still-born—but if the laymen had co-operated he was sure it would not have done so. Then the report shelved the delegate system. He objected to the proposition giving every member present at the Assembly the right to vote. Under such a rule, a single congregation might outvote an Assembly. He thought they ought to enter into their work with a greater spirit of self-sacrifice, and get rid of the wretched discussion about the name. At the proper time he should be prepared to move that the third proposition be disallowed.

The Rev. A. GORDON, M.A., also objected to the proposals, the wording of which he criticised. He moved "that the report be referred back to the committee, with an instruction to them to issue a statement of the existing constitution of the Assembly, adding such alterations and suggestions as may seem desirable; this statement to be presented at the next meeting of the Assembly."

The motion was seconded by Mr. W. MARSHALL.

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD explained at some length the grounds of the committee's proposition. He was sorry to hear this old worn out cry about being ashamed of the Unitarian name. The real objection was not that anybody thought he was ashamed of it, but that somebody outside might say he and those with whom he was acting were. They ought not to be prevented by such considerations from taking the right course. If it was right to open their doors at all, it was not right to wait till those outside were actually knocking at their doors for admission. As to the delegate system he urged that it was a failure and must be. They had no synodical powers, and there was no real attempt made to send gentlemen there as representatives, but people were appointed because it was likely they would be in the neighbourhood of the meeting. As to practical work, what could the Assembly do? The congregations of the Assembly were units, and jealously guarded their individual rights. Nothing could be done to bind the congregations; how, then, could work be done by the central association, which had no power over the affiliated congregations? The adoption of the proposed declaration would do away with a sham, would get rid of much unnecessary formal business, and would do something to form the opinion of the body at large.

JOHN HARWOOD, Esq., objected to the remarks of Mr. Beard on the delegate system. He approved of the delegate plan as a means of adding to the number of persons attending the Assembly.

THOMAS AVISON, Esq., having known the meetings before and after the adoption of the delegate system, spoke strongly in favour of it. He believed nine-tenths of the delegates present were in favour of it. Its abolition would be damaging to the Assembly.

R. M. SHIPMAN, Esq., strongly opposed the delegate system.

The Rev. J. WRIGHT read a return showing that during the last five years there had been 60 congregations on the roll of the Assembly. The average number of those which appointed delegates was 36; the average number from which delegates attended was 28; average numbers of delegates present was 51, and the average number of ministers present was 50. It would be seen, therefore, that delegates had been present from less than half the congregations and that the number of ministers had been within one of the number of delegates. At the present meeting there were 45 delegates, who represented 27 congregations, and there were 46 ministers present.

A vote was then taken on Mr. Gordon's amendment referring the report back to the committee, and it was carried by 55 to 36.

After some other desultory discussion, the PRESIDENT ruled that the Assembly had agreed to send back the proposed declaration to the committee—the committee already existing, who had, however, power to add to their number.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, as secretary to the Missionary Branch, said during the year no applications of any kind had been made to the committee, and, therefore, they had made no report. The balance in hand at the date of the last report was £193, and the amount received since had increased it to £255. There had been no expenditure, and since the balance sheet had been made out he had received £30 more, which brought the amount in hand up to £285.

On the motion of the Rev. BROOKS HERFORD, it was referred to the committee of the missionary branch to consider and report as to what should be done with the money.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL moved the adoption of a petition in favour of the stoppage of the sale of intoxicating drinks on a Sunday, which was carried by a large majority on a show of hands.

THE DINNER

took place a little after four o'clock, when about 250 persons assembled at the Memorial Hall.

R. D. DARBISHIRE, Esq., presided, and after expressing his regret at the absence of Mr. Gaskell, and giving a layman's tribute to the deep worth of the late Rev. J. J. Tayler, spoke of what the Assembly might be if it were faithful to its traditions. He concluded by proposing the health of the Queen.

Mr. JOHN DENDY spoke to the sentiment of Civil and Religious Liberty. The sentiment was no new one to us. It was a necessity of our existence. He believed this was the only meeting where there could be such freedom as we enjoyed. In France such a meeting would be absurd, in Russia impossible. He sympathised with the Chairman's remarks; he expressed his conviction that all civil liberty was founded upon religious liberty. This thought alone reconciled him to the present condition of the religious world. The Catholics were rousing themselves and marvellously extending their influence. On the other hand, there was a widespread latitudinarianism, which swept away all religious faith by a denial of man's capacity of understanding God. Liberty, especially religious, was not licence. To all degrees of credal infallibility liberty must oppose itself; but it must be the first condition of liberty to believe in God. The liberal school of theology said, Be free. The greatest misrepresentation of God was to say He would be angry if truth were thoroughly searched into. What God wanted of His children was that they should be true. We should remember to-day that thirty Puritans drove back Lord Derby and his men at Salford Bridge in the olden time by a psalm. He wished that we had a more psalm-singing spirit now and went forth to fight our Earl of Derby, to gain freedom for the Irish Church, and perchance for that of the English Church as well. (Cheers.)

Mr. EDWARD SHAWCROSS proposed the health of the preacher and supporter of the day.

The Rev. C. W. ROBERTS acknowledged the compliment paid to him, and hoped he might consider their welcome to him as an indication of their sympathy with the principle he laid down, that truth on the highest subjects was to be obtained, and that it was our duty to be loyal to our convictions. It was of importance that men should realise the greatness of a life devoted to truth, to something more than the acquisition of wealth, or the pursuit of pleasure. There were grounds for fearing that with many the feeling that there was an uncertainty in religious knowledge was leading them to a worldly external life. He hoped we were determined to be true to our freedom, for our position as the advocates of free religious thought was that from which at once the claims of an authoritative church on the one hand, and the assaults of an irreligious materialism on the other, could be most successfully withstood.

The Rev. A. GORDON, M.A., rose to thank the Assembly for their reception of his services. The Chairman had offered him a text, "The Progress of Religious Thought." He often wished they heard more of the progress of religious work. (Hear, hear.) These festive meetings were not the placed to discuss such plans, but he hoped after we had worn out the old debates about names, constitutions, and the like childish matters, we should begin to talk about the progress of work. (Applause.)

The Rev. CHARLES BEARD, B.A., spoke to the toast of the "Provincial Assembly" and observed that as to the matter of these childish disputes about names and so forth, he must recall Mr. Gordon's recollection to the fact that if it had not been for his own amendment they would have worn it out in the morning. (Laughter.) The Assembly represented their Churches. It had two faces, one which turned to the past and one which turned to the future. We were born into a Church as into a family; and a man's ecclesiastical ancestry was therefore of importance. Noble links only should unite our religious past with our future. The Provincial Assembly was such a link. The religious history of the Assembly could not compare with that of Roman Catholicism, nor with that of the Church of England; but we could claim that we were descended honourably from the fathers of the Reformation, who left their position to be true to their principles; and there were many obscure heroes besides these who had been true to their convictions, and whose lives had not been stained by cruelty or tyranny, to whom we were related. What was the position of our ministers to-day? There were three sorts of ministers—first, those who were struggling frantically against the spirit of the age; second, those who tried to put themselves in relation with the spirit of the age, yet who shut their eyes to dangers, and tried to put new wine into old bottles; third, those, not many, who believed that the path of truth was ever upwards, and that safety was in the constant development of religious truth, side by side with scientific research. We belonged to that third position. A friend of his, a member of the Church, had said that Church clergymen were twenty-five years behind the age. They opposed every measure for progress, but they always came round at last. He was proud to remember, however, that Unitarian ministers had not been in that sorry position of having to "come round at last." Every movement of the last forty years had been in the direction of our principle, or our views. We were all free traders, and reformers. We were all in favour of the freedom of the Irish Church. People talked of the Unitarian controversy having died out; but the fact was the time had come when we had to fight our battles over again; only we found our opponents agreeing with us at many points that were once in controversy. It had been said some men are better than their principles; the highest praise we could take was that our principles are better than we are. (Cheers.)

JOHN GRUNDY, Esq., spoke upon missionary associations. The Missionary Branch of the Assembly was dead, it was said, but of no particular disease. But had not the successful meetings of the Assembly been owing to the missionary spirit infused among us many years ago? He hoped there might be some scheme laid down for the Assembly by which there might be times of serene contemplation, without the ignoring of work, and he would plead for a more devoted support to the missionary associations of the province. It was the dream of his youth, and still the hope of his manhood, that in every populous town of the province there should be heard in a Unitarian chapel a Unitarian minister preaching our truths. He did not believe any of them were afraid of the Unitarian name, and he could appreciate the delicacy of those who wished to remove it in the background for the sake of others. But he saw no need of this, and if there were any effort made with us he would like to see it under the name by which we had suffered so much. He would ask for help for the missionary associations. This Memorial Hall would not have been built but for the laymen feeling that there was an opportunity of combining past traditions with a present practical work. He referred to the Home Missionary Board as having sent forth fifty preachers of Christ's Gospel. And if the missionary spirit were not fostered, our church life must become withered. Look at the Presbyterian chapels throughout the land—where the missionary spirit has been active they have prospered, where not, they had declined and become dry heaps of dead bones. That they could not deny. He had great respect for our Presbyterian forefathers; but modern Unitarianism alone had made our churches what they were. Were the results satisfactory? In some degree, yes; but much remained to be done. No new Unitarian congregation had failed where the proper conditions of success had been supplied. Where those conditions had been provided there had Unitarian churches been founded on a satisfactory basis—real churches, not lecture halls for breaking down old beliefs merely, but places for the development of the religious life. As a Unitarian, he was not content with the extent of our church influence, or the money spent on missionary objects. If they wished to keep their young people amongst them, they should enlarge the boundaries of their churches. Referring to the matter of ministers' salaries, and eulogising Mr. Shipman for his efforts to increase them, he said these must be raised by making ministers a commodity the people required. They should be more liberal, too, in their gifts to the missionary associations, and there would be greater life in the churches, an outpouring of the spirit. He advocated the scheme of a local chapel building society, for the more speedy erection of suitable chapels, for it was painful to see the weeks and months it sometimes took to raise £500. We were not poor. Go into the House of Commons, and there you would find the Unitarians better represented than the Roman Catholics, the Jews, the Baptists, or the Independents. The same thing might be noted if they were to watch the bench of magistrates—the Unitarians there were not of the pauper class. Great results could be realised if the means were provided, if our greatest preachers were sent out to proclaim our truths to men where now they were not heard. So long as we believed in our convictions we should try to extend them as the means of making not merely disbelievers in the Trinity, but the best of men and women. Would to God that we had more such men as was the late Robert Heywood—(hear, hear)—who was never absent when the call of duty summoned him. With the heart of a youth he sympathised with every effort made to plant a Unitarian congregation in any part of the country. His was a liberal hand with a youthful heart, and his example should stimulate all of us. (Loud applause.)

Dr. MARCUS addressed the meeting on unsectarian education.

The Rev. J. WRIGHT, B.A., proposed the health of the Cross-street congregation and their ministers, and the thanks of the meeting for their hospitality.

Dr. FAIRBAIRN acknowledged the toast on behalf of the congregation, and said that he had now been a worshipper at Cross-street Chapel for 55 years.

The Rev. G. H. WELLS, M.A., proposed the thanks of the meeting to the Chairman.

The proposition was carried with acclamation, to which the CHAIRMAN briefly responded.—The Assembly then separated.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

THE annual examinations of this institution were held on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday last, at University Hall, Gordon Square, London. Among those present at some part or other of the proceedings were Samuel Robinson, Esq., President; Rev. James Martineau and Russel Martineau, Esq., M.A. Professors; Revs. John Kenrick, M.A., and William Gaskell, M.A. Visitors: Thomas Ashton, Esq., Treasurer; R. D. Darbishire, Esq., B.A., and Rev. C. Beard, B.A., Secretaries; the Lord Mayor; the Revs. T. Madge, Dr. Sadler, H. Ierson, Moncreu D. Conway, R. A. Armstrong, B.A., T. L. Marshall, P. H. Wickstead, B.A., H. Solly, S. A. Steintal, A. Lunn, T. Hunter, R. Shaen, M.A., and Joseph Heywood; Messrs. Samuel Sharpe, Mark Philips, Joseph Lupton, W. J. Lamport, Robert Philips, W. A. Case, E. Enfield, W. Shaen, M.A., W. D. Jeremy, Dr. Longstaff, J. T. Preston, and Richard Aspdon, Assistant Secretary.

The following was the course in which the various examinations, &c., were taken:

Visitor's Address

The examination on the whole was of a satisfactory character; but a feeling of sadness was thrown over the proceedings by the removal of the honoured and beloved Principal, Rev. J. J. Tayler, and the sudden death of the Rev. R. B. Aspland, who for many years most ably filled the office of secretary to the college, and had been latterly one of its vice-presidents. Mr. W. A. Case kindly took the examination of Mr. Tayler's classes in Latin.

At the close of the proceedings, a number of other gentlemen, and of ladies, were present, when the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, as one of the visitors, delivered the address to the students. After referring in feeling terms to the loss which the college had sustained by the removal of Mr. Aspland and Mr. Taylor, he drew the attention of the students to various points in the life and character of their late Principal, which had made his course so useful and honoured, and exhorted them from his example to set their aims high, and prepare themselves to make their mark in the world, and aspire to a share in influencing its destinies for good.

INTELLIGENCE.

The address of the Rev. Brooke Herford is changed from Kersal-terrace to 6, Arthur's-terrace, Higher Broughton, Manchester, N.W.

BIRMINGHAM: LAWRENCE-STREET CHAPEL.—The annual congregational excursion took place on Monday. This year Dudley was chosen. The party numbered nearly 300. Tea was well served in Baylies's School, the use of which was given by the trustees. The castle grounds, the ruins, and the caverns were, as on former occasions, the great source of pleasure. The friends returned to Lawrence-street a little before nine.

GLASGOW: PRESENTATION TO THE REV. HENRY W. CROSSKEY.—Last Monday evening the members of the geological class of the Glasgow Mechanics' Institution held a farewell meeting with the Rev. Mr. Crosskey, who has conducted the class with singular success for some time past, and who is leaving Glasgow for Birmingham. Mr. A. M'Master presided. About sixty ladies and gentlemen sat down to tea; after which the Chairman briefly addressed the meeting, and called upon Mr. Nelson, who presented Mr. Crosskey, in the name of the class, with a handsome marble dining-room clock, with a suitable inscription. Mr. Crosskey having replied, the meeting was addressed by Dr. Moffat, Professor John Young, and other members of the Council of the Glasgow Geological Society.

KINGSWOOD.—The meeting of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and the neighbouring counties was held at Kingswood on Tuesday, the 15th inst. The service in the chapel, at 11 30, was introduced by the Rev. H. M'Kean, of Oldbury, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. B. Wright, of Birmingham, from 2 Cor. ix., 15. Ministers were present from the following places: Birmingham, the Revs. S. Bache, C. Clarke, E. Myers, J. Wilson, and B. Wright; Oldbury, the Rev. H. M'Kean; Tamworth, the Rev. J. Dean; Colesey, the Rev. H. Eachus; Dudley, the Rev. M. Gibson; Evesham, the Rev. J. Gordon; Stourbridge, the Rev. D. Maginnis; Cradley, the Rev. W. Cochrane; Belper, the Rev. Rees L. Lloyd; and Kingswood, the Rev. J. Birks. The ministers and several lay friends were afterwards entertained at dinner by Mr. Councillor Baldwin.

NOTTINGHAM: THE REV. J. J. TAYLER.—At a meeting of the committee of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, held in the High Pavement Vestry, Nottingham, on June 15th, 1869, it was resolved, "That the committee of this association, meeting—for the first time since the death of the Rev. John James Tayler, B.A.—on the spot with which his family has been connected for nearly 70 years, desires to record its deep and sorrowful sense of the great loss which the cause of liberal Christianity has sustained in the removal of one who, for almost half a century, has enriched our churches by the fruits of his scholarly research, elevated thought, and clear spiritual insight; and who, by his wise and faithful elucidation of the Gospel, and by the saintly graces of a beautiful and noble life, has shown forth in many ways the Christian aspects of faith and duty."

PADIHAM.—The school sermons were preached on Sunday, the 20th inst. The collection amounted to the large sum of £63. 6s. 2½d.

STOCKPORT.—The annual sermons, on behalf of the church funds, were preached in the Unitarian Church, St. Peter's-gate, on Sunday last, by the Rev. Joseph Freeston, of Rochdale. The collection amounted to £36. 14s. 6½d.

THE REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER.—At a session of this body on Thursday week the following resolution was agreed to, with only three dissentients:—"That, whilst strongly objecting to certain clauses in Mr. Gladstone's Irish Church Bill which affect the interests of our religious body, we hereby record our approbation of the principle of religious equality on which it is founded, and our conviction that it is, on the whole, a statesmanlike measure, that it is the only one practicable in the present state of public opinion, and that it will tend to abate sectarian animosities at present unhappily dividing and distracting this country."

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.—WHAT IS TO BE DONE?

To the Editors.—Before the interest excited at the last meeting is cooled or lost in the whirl of new subjects of thought and care, may I make one or two practical suggestions?

I. That the Special Committee be summoned immediately, whilst the various matters raised in discussion are fresh in the memory. In former years (no doubt for reasons perfectly excusable), many months have been allowed to elapse, and the greater has been the difficulty of securing a large attendance and an unabated zeal.

II. That the Committee be greatly enlarged, so as to include representatives of all shades of thought, and especially of the younger members of our congregations, and the active men in the less affluent and outlying churches.

III. That laying aside for the moment the question of the designation of the Assembly, and other vexed points, as to which it is clear that opinion is not yet ripe for settlement, the Committee should direct its attention to matters immediately affecting practical operations, and try to satisfy the demand for work, by suggesting such plans as are at once practicable, and in harmony with the constitution of the meeting.

IV. That the proceedings of the Assembly should be so far re-cast as to include—(a) a religious service, as at present; (b) a luncheon, substantial but inexpensive, and occupying not more than an hour; (c) a general meeting, to read minutes and call the roll, and then to hear the President's annual address; (d) to divide into two, three, or more sections, in which should be read short papers, and discussions held, as to the theory of special agencies, such as missions, church finance, Sunday-schools, &c.; (e) to close the proceedings with a soiree, the main object being social intercourse; tea and other light refreshments would be provided, and the proceedings varied with music and occasional addresses; the terms of admission would exclude none, but admit a much increased number, especially of the younger and less wealthy members of our churches.

This scheme implies, of course, the abandonment of the present dinner arrangements, which are a serious bar to numbers who would otherwise attend, are cumbrous and increasingly costly, are a heavy tax on the hospitality of our wealthy congregations, and oppose insuperable difficulties to the invitations which might otherwise be offered to the Assembly by congregations of more limited means.

I respectfully but confidently suggest that this plan would be found perfectly practicable; would greatly extend the interest of the body in our venerable Assembly, which would thus "renew its youth," put forth new shoots of usefulness and power, and attach to it many who have hitherto been strangers almost to its very name.—I am, yours respectfully,
HARRY RAWSON.
June 21st, 1869.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

To the Editors.—It may be useful to the members of the Assembly, as they have sent back for further consideration the scheme submitted to them for the future regulation of their proceedings, to have an opportunity for calmly considering the aspect the question bears in the mind of one who has been led by circumstances to give it considerable thought.

An annual gathering of the ministers and members of a group of congregations may be held for either of two purposes: to inaugurate and maintain schemes for doing religious work, or to form a conference for the expression of opinion and the discussion of principles. The special Committee, whose report was presented at the recent meeting, considered that the Assembly should take the latter character, for the following reasons. 1. Because thus a greater benefit may accrue to those who are present; they will go back to their respective work, enlightened, stimulated, spiritually refreshed. 2. Because the attempt to get practical business transacted at such a gathering is attended with difficulties which render it doubtful whether it can be thoroughly successful. 3. Because there are other societies in the Province—District Missions, Sunday-school Association, Unions, &c., which actually do the work, while there is none that aims at a religious conference. 4. Because the history of the Assembly renders it undesirable to fix on it a theological character, such as is inseparable from a practical organisation.

If the Assembly came to a conclusion to devote itself to earnest and thoughtful conference on religious questions, other points, on which there is a difference of opinion among the members, would easily be decided by a consideration of their bearing on the main purpose of the meeting. As it was at first a Unitarian meeting, but was so free that it has allowed its members to become Unitarians, it would be seen to be possible to continue this freedom, and not to call for a denominational name, since men of different theologies may usefully confer together, if they all possess and value individual freedom. As it would be for the expression of thought rather than the organisation of action, it would cease to be a matter of consequence who should have the privilege of voting. The desire which is, I believe, universal among us, to make it more useful would be fully gratified, and we should no more have to look back upon each successive meeting as another wasted opportunity.—Yours faithfully,

JOHN WRIGHT,

Late Secretary of the Provincial Assembly.

THE EXTENSION OF THE LECTIONARY IN PUBLIC WORSHIP.

To the Editors.—In your "Review" in last week's Herald is a brief notice of Mr. Harry Rawson's article in the Theological Review on this subject. It is a subject of great importance and it is desirable there should be a free expression of opinion upon it. Mr. Rawson has shown most conclusively that it would be well to supplement the Scripture lesson with a selection from our most devotional literature. You admit the force of Mr. Rawson's arguments but would not trust ministers to select from any other book than the Bible. But surely a minister who could not be trusted to select a passage to read to his people ought not to be trusted either to pray for or to preach to them. No doubt care and discretion would be required in making such selections, but there would not be much danger or difficulty if the minister would bear in mind that his great object should be to select those passages most likely to awaken pure thoughts and holy aspirations.

Fortunately our country is rich in devotional literature. God is as good to His children now as ever He was. The people of no past age or nation have ever had greater cause for gratitude and faith than we have, and there is no need that a reverence for the past should prevent a full appreciation and free use of the present. In making the addition suggested by Mr. Rawson no violence would be done to present custom. The Bible would still be the chief book used, only the passages read would be shorter and more select. I may say that I have sometimes, and I think with advantage to my people, read from the pulpit short passages out of such books as "Holy Thoughts," "Suggestive Thoughts," "Life Thoughts," "Beauties of Channing," "Aids to Devotion," and "Silent Pastor."

Ministers willing to give a calm consideration to this subject should correspond with each other and with Mr. Rawson, and perhaps a selection for each other's use could be made of the most inspiring passages from our best authors, and thus something might possibly be done to make the reading portion of public worship more interesting, instructive, and devotional.—I am, &c., J. FREESTON.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Pope has given another "allocation." In a Secret Consistory held for the purpose of creating fourteen archbishops and bishops, his Holiness deplored a good many things in the state of the Roman Catholic world, among which the most noticeable seems to have been the new law adopted in Italy, for subjecting clerical pupils to military conscription, as being an infringement of the immunities, the rights, and the liberty of the Church.

The present state of the Roman Catholic Church in Poland is clearly shown by the fact that, since the recent exile of the Awgustowo Bishop, Count Lubensky, in the whole of Poland there remain only two representatives of the Roman Catholic hierarchy: the Bishops of Sedlo and Sandimir. All the others are either exiled or have absconded in consequence of the persecutions of the Russian Government.

The Roman Catholics of London are about to erect a college for the training of their foreign missionaries; and Mill-hill, Hendon, where there has for some time past been a temporary college, will be the site of it.

The first stage in the prosecution of the Rev. Charles Voysey for heresy has been got through. The prosecution was instituted by the Archbishop of York, Mr. Voysey's diocesan, but as the books containing the alleged heresy were printed in London, Dr. Jackson had to appoint commissioners to inquire whether they were prima facie grounds for proceedings, who have reported that there are such grounds. The commissioners were:—Sir Travers Twiss, the Chancellor of the diocese; Archdeacons Hale and Sinclair; the Rev. John Edward Kempe, rector of St. James's, Piccadilly; and the Rev. James Moorhouse, vicar of Paddington.

In the neighbourhood of the Tower there is a dense and very poverty-stricken colony of Roman Catholic labourers; and a meeting was held recently, to provide poor schools and industrial schools for them, which is interesting from the "free Christian union" it evinces. Protestant pastors, Dissenting ministers, and Jews met together, with a number of earnest Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, noblemen and gentlemen. Lord Denbigh took the chair, the Duke of Norfolk supported him, as also did half a dozen members of Parliament, and a large array of benevolent ladies. The work before them was to build schools for the children for 7,000 Catholics living within a radius of 300 yards. At present not one-fifth of the number of their children have school accommodation.

The amendments proposed in the House of Lords, to the Irish Church Bill, are very numerous. The Archbishop of Canterbury desires to postpone the process of disestablishment from 1871 to the beginning of 1872. Lord Salisbury, Lord Lilford, and the Duke of Cleveland are at one in proposing to relieve the Church Body from any payment for ecclesiastical residences; and Lord Cairns would give the land on which schools are built to the Church. As to private endowments, the Archbishop of Canterbury would date them, not from 1660, as in the bill, but from the second year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, historical and other evidence not strictly legal being admissible to show that an endowment was private. The principle of concurrent endowments is adopted by Lord Lilford and the Duke of Cleveland, who would allow grants of land or money to Catholics and Protestant Non-conformists, as well as by Lord Russell, who would apply the surplus to the building of churches, chapels, residences, and graveyards for Catholics and Presbyterians. Lord Russell further proposes that landowners should have the option of purchasing title rent charges or having them continued in perpetuity and paid to Episcopalians, Catholics, or Presbyterians as they choose. Lord Cairns has two amendments of a somewhat vague kind, the object of which seems to be to protect the episcopal authority in the new Church; and Lord Clancarty would permit existing archbishops and bishops to retain their seats in the House of Lords for life. There are also several amendments by the Archbishop of Dublin and Bishop of Peterborough intended to secure larger compensation to the clergy. If all these should pass, the bill would be like a certain pair of spectacles that had been mended with new frame and new glasses. The Lords, however, are in good spirits, and carried the change of date from 1871 to 1872, with a run. Evidently they think that by passing the second reading they have laid in a stock of merit, purchased a sort of political "indulgence."

A new alliance, both Protestant and Evangelical, under the title of the Evangelical Church Union, has been formed "to prevent the increase of Romanism in England." It seeks to accomplish its great object by obtaining a revision of the Prayer-book.

On Sunday morning, June 20, the Rev. W. Brock, D.D., preached his annual sermon to young men and maidens at Bloomsbury Chapel. The attendance was very large. Shortly after half-past five in the morning many persons took their place by the door to secure an early entrance, and by half-past six, when the doors were opened, there was a large crowd waiting to get in. By a quarter to seven not only was every seat occupied, but every inch of standing room as well, and the congregation must have exceeded 2,000. Mr. Brock preached from the text, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest."—Eccles. ix. 10.

The case of Mr. Bennett, the vicar of Frome, who is accused of holding heretical views as to the nature of the Eucharist, is to be tried in the Court of Arches. The Dean of the Court, Sir Robert Phillimore, some time ago declined to accept the "letters of request" which were presented to him. The matter was thereupon carried before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and that tribunal decided, yesterday, that Sir Robert should hear the case.

The Irish Presbyterians are assuming a very decided attitude on the subject of the distribution of the surplus property of the Church. We have the assurance of the Moderator of their General Assembly that "they expect to be placed in every particular in a position of equality with the Episcopal Church." Whether as regards outlay on Churches or the granting of glebes, they "emphatically protest against being left in a position of inequality with the Episcopal Church." Whether as regards outlay on Churches or the granting of glebes, they "emphatically protest against being left in a position of material disadvantage in a settlement which to be satisfactory and final, must be equitable in every part."

As our readers are aware, the Jamaica Clergy Act will expire with the present year. Lord Granville received a deputation on the subject the other day, and the tone of his reply to the statements submitted to him is certainly not calculated to weaken the report that Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues contemplate the complete disestablishment of the Jamaica Church.

The Rev. Dr. Cumming has been corresponding with Dr. Manning in order to ascertain whether if he attended the Ecumenical Council free speech would be granted him. Dr. Manning having referred Dr. Cumming to the Pope himself, the Protestant divine informed a meeting at Leeds last week that he is now writing a letter to the Pontiff.

We have ourselves always felt the objectionableness of ministers advertising for pulpits at all, and have done our best to discourage the practice; but what will our readers say to the following advertisement which we cull from the ordinary advertising columns of the Christian World?

TO BAPTIST CHURCHES.—Have you heard him? If not, he is now at liberty to supply with a view to the pastorate.—Please address to Adin Williams, Esq., High-street, Oxford.

The Rev. Newman Hall has been preaching for some time on Sunday evenings at St. James's Hall, but he is going to resume the Surrey Chapel pulpit. He said that he had been requested to continue his Sunday evening services at St. James's Hall, but he did not feel justified in doing so, as he understood a large portion of his congregation had absented themselves from their sittings on Sunday evenings, which he looked upon as a kind of silent protest.

Mr. Edmond Beales has come out as a preacher. He preached last Sunday night at the Burdett Hall, Limehouse, to a crowded audience, from the text, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

At the Baptist Chapel, Rochdale-road, Manchester, of which the Rev. Mr. Taylor is pastor, the collections on Sunday week, to defray the expenses of painting and repairing the church, amounted in the morning to £229. 16s. 8d., and the minister announced that there would be no collection in the evening, as the sum received was more than enough for the purpose.

The Rev. Dr. Parker, of Cavendish-street Chapel, Manchester, is about to remove to London. It is said that the congregation inviting him have offered him £2,000 a year, with £700 for removal expenses.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Very little is saying except about the Irish Church Bill, which is the one topic in almost every editorial mouth.

The Post says it is not a little curious to observe that the only amendments which are really incompatible with the principles of the bill as it at present stands are, with the exception of the Duke of Cleveland's, those proposed by Earl Grey and Earl Russell.

The Spectator cordially approves both Earl Grey's and Earl Russell's amendments. Ireland is Catholic, and a Catholic country has a right to endow Catholicism if it likes; but the noble ears are crying for the moon. The House of Commons will not vote for any such project, and we shall be lucky if we can get decent houses for the clergy of all denominations.

The Economist says that to endow or re-endow any of the Irish Churches directly—and not indirectly as the only way of compensating life interests—would be strictly a breach of faith with the constituencies. Yet if this be so, almost the only feasible amendment which has been talked of appears to be condemned. It seems to be thought that the hardships of making the disestablished Church pay for its parsonages and glebes may be averted by using the surplus to endow the other churches with the same possessions—if they will have them. Perhaps out of very weariness the House of Commons' majority may assent to this deviation from the principle of the measure, and there are good practical reasons for it; but it is nevertheless a plain deviation, and one which might have damaged the Government had they played with it at an earlier stage.

The Saturday Review believes that if such a proposal as Lord Russell's could be submitted to the decision of the Protestant laymen of England who have really taken the trouble of thinking over the difficult question of the Irish Church, nineteen out of every twenty would enthusiastically accept it, and the judicious friends of the Irish Church would gladly catch at it. But however much we may wish to see a desirable object attained, we must take into account the difficulties that lie in the way of attaining it; and the difficulties that lie in the way of embodying Lord Russell's amendments in the bill seem very great. One does not see where the motive-power to carry the bill through the Commons would come from, except by a coalition between the Government and the Opposition. But the Government came into office avowedly to resist levelling up. To adopt these amendments then would not only lower their prestige, but in all probability break up their party.

The Examiner hopes that one consideration will be uppermost in the minds of all who take part in the coming debates in the Upper House, and that is the paramount importance of closing the controversy and getting rid of the Irish Church question this session. Any bill would be better than none. The country is weary and sick of the subject. A final measure of universal and satisfactory settlement is obviously not to be hoped for; but we should not be an inch nearer that if we wasted three years more in discussing details. What has really been decided clearly and finally is disestablishment. Let us book that fact in a statute this year, and be thankful.

More wisely, to our thinking, writes the Pall Mall Gazette:

"The purpose of these amendments is to retain in the hands of the future Church, in its disestablished condition, as large a portion of its present emoluments as can be preserved in the coming revolution. With this view the Bishop of Dublin and Bishop of Peterborough seek to improve the position of benefited clergymen and curates to such an extent that they will in fact be better off in the Church of the future than they are in that of the present. With the same general intent, the Archbishop of Canterbury proposes to substitute the year 1560 for 1660 in defining the endowments which are to be considered 'private,' and to be preserved as such. And various suggestions for improving and increasing the provision left in the hands of the Church in the form of glebes and for exempting it from payment for ecclesiastical residences, are in the same general direction. Of course these amendments, taken separately, are liable to no objection of principle. They are scarcely worth dwelling on in detail. But of one thing we are sure, those who insist on them are no true and sagacious friends, we will not say of the Church of Ireland—that phrase has come to cover a multitude of merely secular meanings—but of the cause of Protestantism in Ireland. The principle of the present bill is that this cause—the cause of all us Protestants, not of the Anglican body only—shall no longer lean on establishment for support. The ci-devant Church must rely on its own intrinsic merits and on the zeal of its adherents, as other voluntary bodies do. To this—however the crisis be delayed by ingenious expedients—it must come at last. The worst of all possible policies would be that of postponing it. The longer the Church is allowed to rely on remnants of adventitious support, the less able it will be to walk alone when the inevitable time arrives."

The Daily News says the concurrent endowment amendments are the most dangerous of those proposed.

"The enemies of the Government, knowing that Mr. Gladstone's majority in the House of Commons was returned last autumn on the clearest understanding that there was to be no 'levelling up,' are actively propagating the rumour that a measure of that character is to be carried by a coalition of the Liberal party and a portion of the Conservative party, headed by some of the Bishops. This is simply untrue; it is plainly impossible that the Liberal majority in the House of Commons can be used for such a purpose. But it is well known that a number of Liberal and Conservative Peers, and some of the Bishops, are prepared to act together for the end described. We do not believe that such a project can ever succeed, to the extent of leaving Mr. Gladstone in the position to choose between accepting it from the House of Lords and giving up the Bill. But it will be well that the Protestantism of the country should stand upon its guard."

Has the Kirk, says the English Independent, well considered what it is doing in raising the patronage question now? Does it not know that its own time is coming as soon as the Irish Church is disposed of? What does it read in the motion by Mr. Maclaren for a return of the mode in which the £20,000 annually paid to the Church of Scotland out of the Consolidated Fund is disposed of? Let us hope that its leaders are wise men who, foreseeing the changes with which the future is big, are making haste to provide their Church with new standing-ground and are trying to settle it upon a popular basis before they are deprived, as they know they soon will be, of the treacherous aid of the State. An Established Church which admits ministers of other denominations to its pulpits and is ready to lend its churches for a funeral service in memory of a respected minister of another community will not find itself desolate or without sympathy in the hour of its trial. If there is no strong feeling in Scotland against the Establishment it is because it has not imitated the impertinences of the English Church.

Both Houses of the Convocation of Canterbury met at Westminster last week, but their proceedings did not attract much attention. On the first day the Lower House had a long and important talk about intemperance, which showed that the clergy were deeply concerned at the demoralisation wrought among the rural population by the beer-houses. The subject of the liquor traffic was broadly and wisely discussed. A resolution, asking the co-operation of the Bishops in measures of restriction, was unanimously passed. There was a good deal of temper shown when the Irish Church Bill was under consideration. The Rev. Dr. Jebb went the length of saying that to support that measure was sufficient to cut one off from all private friendship, and, after speaking strongly against Mr. Gladstone, he emphatically declared that he would never speak to any gentleman, whether bishop, priest, deacon, or layman, who voted for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The Prolocutor had, of course, to call him to order; but this little incident will show how little reason was brought to the discussion of the question. Chancellor Massingberd moved the adoption of a report in favour of union with the Greek Church, and the Primate was requested to negotiate with the Eastern patriarchs and metropolitans in order to bring about a good understanding. The principal reasons alleged for taking this step were that English children born in the East could not get Christian baptism, and English persons dying could not get the Holy Communion or be buried in consecrated ground.

The Rev. Dr. Vaughan, of Doncaster, having been remonstrated with on his patronage of a circus for the entertainment of the children of his parish schools, writes to the remonstrant:

"I have the strongest testimony from all quarters, not only to the innocent nature of the exhibition itself, but to the highly respectable character of the managers and the performers. Their presence in the town has been beneficial, not detrimental, to the cause of morality, and even religion. They have been regular attendants at church, and have opened the circus itself for a special religious service. It appears to me that, in proportion as a clergyman is bound to protest against such public amusements as are demoralising in their character, he is bound, on the other hand, to show, by word and act, that he rejoices in those popular recreations which are innocent and of good report. I cannot fear that in this instance I shall 'be found, like Samson'—to use your own words—"giving my strength and the glory of the Lord to the uncircumcised Philistines."

AMERICAN NOTES.

THE CHURCHES IN NEW YORK.

There are 460 places of worship in New York, exclusive of those of the Roman Catholics. A correspondent of the Scotsman writes:

"Of these 460 churches, 410 belong to 19 different sects of Protestants, 29 are Jewish synagogues, and the remaining 21 make up a curious miscellaneous list, bearing such names as Christian Israelites, Disciples, Evangelical, Catholic Apostolic, Swedenborgian, Second Adventists, True Believers, Congregational Methodists, True Reformed Dutch (in contradistinction, I suppose, to the Reformed Dutch, who are not truly reformed), and 'Come to the Church of Humanity.' Of the 19 different Protestant sects, the Episcopalian have the greatest number of churches—95 in all; one of them, Trinity, being a grand building, and many of the others being very handsome and costly edifices. The Presbyterians come next, having 88 churches among the five different sects, or sub-sects, into which the Presbyterians here have divided themselves. Next in strength are the Methodists, who likewise have four different sects; the Methodist Episcopalians, having 58 churches, five of which are negro churches; and the Wesleyan Methodists, the Protestant Methodists, and the Free Methodists, one each—in all 61. The Baptists have 43 churches, the Friends 29, the German Reformed 25, the Lutherans 14, the Congregationalists eight, the Universalists five, the Unitarians three, and the Moravians two. There are nine churches for seamen, and 28 'mission churches,' all of which belong either to the Episcopalian, the Baptist, the Presbyterian, or the Methodist. On Park Avenue—which, to my notion, is the prettiest street in the city—are two notable churches. Park Avenue is the only spot in New York which reminds me of Edinburgh. It is on the summit of a hill, and beneath runs the tunnel of the Harlem Railway. The tunnel is arched over, and through the centre of the Avenue are neatly-railed enclosures, carpeted with verdure, and gay with flowers, shrubs, and trees. As small things remind one of great, so do these little plots recall to my memory your charming Princes-street Gardens. On the corner of Park Avenue and Thirty-fourth-street is the Unitarian 'Church of the Messiah,' and adjoining it is the Presbyterian 'Church of the Covenant.' The former is built of brown-and-gray sandstone, and is in the Rhenish-Gothic style. The south front is elaborately carved, and is an almost perfect gem of this kind of architecture. The building cost a quarter of a million of dollars, and is worth the money. Dr. Osgood, a theologian of some note, preaches here. The Unitarians are not very numerous in New York, but they are very bold, and extremely far 'advanced.' One of their preachers is the famous Dr. Bellows. His church is a bizarre edifice, on Fourth Avenue, built of alternate layers of red and white stone, and surmounted by a dome, like that of the Radcliffe Library, Oxford. The name of the church is 'All Souls'; but the scoffers call it the 'Church of the Holy Zebra.' Another Unitarian preacher is the Rev. Mr. Frothingham—he who presided over the 'Free Religious Convention,' in Boston, the other day. He is a man of much ability, but of extremely 'liberal' views. The Presbyterian 'Church of the Covenant,' on Park Avenue, is a grand building of beautiful gray stone, in the Lombardo-Gothic style, faultless in its proportions, and elaborately ornamented wherever the requirements of that style permit ornamentation to be used. But there are many still more imposing and handsome churches than these, and a few which, without being imposing, are very pretty and charming. On Fifth Avenue alone there are 15 very admirable church edifices—the Jewish synagogue and the Roman Catholic Cathedral being the finest, but the others having charms of their own. Riding through the cross streets, you are often surprised and delighted by coming upon a church which looks as if it might have been picked up from some secluded English village, where it had stood for a hundred years, and transported hither by magic. It is built of very dark stone; there is the square tower at the corner terminating in a spire, the low walls and the sharply-pointed roof, ivy growing thickly up the sides, and almost hiding the little windows with their diamond-shaped panes of stained glass. I stumbled the other day upon a charming spot, where, behind a group of ancient trees, stood a rectory and a chapel, so much like one that is attached to the cathedral at Peterborough that I was startled at the resemblance. The Methodist churches, with one or two exceptions, are exquisitely ugly. In three-fourths of the 410 Protestant churches in the city, the 'pew system' prevails—the seats being either held in fee-simple or rented by the year, the price paid depending upon the popularity of the preacher, the locality of the church, and the degree of emulation existing among the congregation. This does very well for the minister, whose salary often comes out of the pew rents, and for the rich and well-to-do; but it works badly for the poorer classes. If a well-dressed stranger visits any of the churches—except, perhaps, one peculiarly fashionable and exclusive Episcopalian church on Broadway—he will be courteously received and shown to a seat. But there are few of the Protestant churches, except those built as 'Mission' churches, in which people of the lower classes would be made welcome, and to which they could go regularly, and as a matter of right and not of favour. The two extremes of society—the rich and the very poor—are well provided for as regards religious instruction; the former get it in their elegant churches, the latter receive it, together with earthly goods, at the hands of the almost innumerable charitable institutions and societies with which the city is crowded. But the respectable poor—the men and women whose daily toil yields them their daily support and little more—are for the most part left out in the cold. Among the clergymen of New York, there are very few who are known beyond the limits of their own circle, and I scarcely think any of them can be called great men. The one who by common consent is said to be the finest preacher of the lot is Dr. John Hall, the pastor of an Old School Presbyterian Church on Fifth Avenue. When one says to a New Yorker, 'How strange it is that all your preachers are so dull!' the reply is pretty sure to be, 'Have you heard Dr. Hall? Ah! go and hear him, and you will be delighted.' He is very good; but then he is an Englishman, who has been in New York for many years; and it is a poor answer to one who complains of the dullness of American preachers to bid him go to hear an eloquent Englishman. The most earnest workers among the preachers seem to be the High Church Episcopalians, and it is probably owing to this that the Episcopalian churches out-number all the others. They have done much good in the ordinary way of religious charity, and of late they have taken to the extraordinary method of establishing sisterhoods and guilds, which, without meaning to scoff, I can best describe by saying that they are a parody on Roman Catholic nunneries and religious houses. The 'Sisters of the Holy Communion' and the 'Sisters of St. Mary,' for instance, wear a dress like that of a 'Sister of Charity'; they live together in communities, under the rule of one of their number, who is called the 'Mother Superior'; they take vows of obedience, poverty, and celibacy, with the condition, however, that they may absolve themselves therefrom whenever they like; and they devote themselves to works of mercy and charity among the poor and fallen. The 'Sisters of St. Mary' have three houses, one of which is a refuge for fallen women. Their principal house is in Forty-sixth-street, where they have a charming little chapel, with a beautiful altar; they rigorously observe the feasts and fasts of the Church, and have a daily celebration of the Holy Communion by a chaplain of their own. These good women do nothing but good; but their work is often ridiculed and denounced by their Low Church brethren, between whom and the Ritualists there is just now a very unhappy state of warfare. The male associations of this kind have not yet got to living in community, but one of them, the 'Sodality of St. Alban,' expects to do so soon. The Church to which the Sodality belongs is St. Alban's, and like its London namesake, goes the whole figure in Ritualism."

THE REV. G. W. CONDER ON PREACHING.

At the annual meeting of the Lancashire Independent College, held on Wednesday last, the Rev. G. W. Conder delivered the address to the students. By the way, some little amusement was created relative to this address by Dr. Parker (between whom and the more cultivated ministers of the Independent body it is understood there is not much love lost) in seconding the vote of thanks to Mr. Conder for it, drily mentioning the benefit which he had himself received from the same address which he said he had heard Mr. Conder deliver sixteen years ago!

Mr. CONDER, in responding, said it was true that the address was the same as he had delivered to the students sixteen years ago. When he was asked to address them on this occasion, he sat down to compose a speech, but he found the former manuscript, and, having read it, he did not think he could write anything better. (Laughter, and "Hear, hear.") He had intended to make that fact known; and Dr. Parker had only anticipated him (as he had supposed some kind friend would do) by a few minutes. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.)

However, the address is a very admirable one, with words in it which may do many a student and young minister good, and we are therefore glad to be able to give the following extract:

"He urged them to remember the real significance of the term 'student,' which was applied to them as soon as they entered the walls of that college. To the apprehension of some the term meant nothing but a young man dressed in glossy black of an ecclesiastical cut, with a little white neckcloth, and possibly a strong dash of conceit, whose mission was to be the patronised of gentlemen, the petted of ladies, and the criticised (because the critic) of all. (Laughter.) To the shades at once with that idea. Speaking of the composition of sermons, he said the recipe which many persons followed was the weekly reiteration of commonplace twaddle about a few great central truths, with much affectionate devotional earnestness. The latter half of the recipe might be good enough, the twaddle being the only needless and injurious element. True preaching could only be the result of real living thoughtfulness, and painstaking examination and reflection. What was the reason that so many miserable failures were seen in the pulpit, and that ministers were the bore or the butt of platforms and the opiate of congregations. It was not lack of piety; nor was it want of industry, because no artisan toiled more painfully than a minister of the class he was describing. His sermon was conceived in anguish and brought forth in agony." (Laughter.) The secret of such a person's failure was that he had no living thoughtful mind, to create, to vitalise, and to vivify. He toiled with his subject in mechanical fashion; his sentences followed one another round and round like the governor balls of a steam engine. (Laughter.) They did not well up and out like water from a bubbling spring. They (the students) should believe in the wonderful vitality and power of the mind within them. If they could but get a thoroughly thoughtful mind, speeches, sermons, lectures, conversation would flow out of them, grow out of them, sometimes would flash and explode out of them, when occasion should unseal the fountain, touch the spring, or waft the spark. They would not have to manufacture sermons—(laughter)—every week; to hunt through the leaves of the sacred oracles to find a text that fit—(laughter)—and then, having found it, to look imploringly into infinite space for some kind angel to tell them what to do with it; and failing that, to sit down desperately and do with the text as hundreds of others had dealt with it, namely, to cut it up into three pieces, to subdivide each of those pieces into three more, and then say a little about each. (Laughter and applause.) If they trained themselves as he recommended, they would not be mere intellectual sponges, absorbing so much matter for the occasion, and squeezing it out precisely in the same state as it was absorbed. In their work as ministers many fell into the mistake of thinking they had nothing else to do but to reiterate the central doctrine of Christianity, namely, mercy through the sacrificial death of Christ. They would have, on the contrary, to present the whole body of Christian truth which had gathered round that nucleus. They would have to do both with what preceded and what followed the Gospel. When a man had for years been a hearty believer in Jesus Christ, and was well grounded and settled in the faith, he would want his minister to do something more than keep on telling him to believe. The Gospel, intelligently apprehended, offered as much scope for the exercise of a living mind as did any other realm of truth. The religion of Christ was manifested to sanctify the politics and the commerce of humanity, and how could it do that except through its teachers? Those teachers ought, therefore, to possess a matured, thoughtful, Christian judgment, which would find its scope, and ought to be able to make itself felt. There were many things that wanted calling by their right names and branding with deserved infamy by Christian men. Ministers of religion ought to be the first to do those things; to point to hypocrisy and boldly to say, 'There stalks a lie;' to take up the current principles of the world's coin, to clip them in two, hold up the base metal and show the devil's alloy in it. How were ministers to do those things if they were not men of power? They would have to speak by the side of a cataract, and they must not have a puny voice. They would have to speak to men deeply interested in not believing them; and it would not do to talk mincingly. Their speech must not be a professional utterance, with a pulpit twang, but the real, manly, religious utterance of their human heart and thought. They must not be mere pulpit drums, or echoes, or barrel organs able to play variations on one tune, or pulpit mountebanks; but devout, earnest, intelligent teachers, able to turn and guide the current of the world's thought and action into proper channels. In conclusion, he spoke of the paramount necessity of deep, fervent, personal piety, without which, however they might convince the understanding, they could never hope to reach and turn the hearts of their hearers."

A STRANGE ASSEMBLY.

THERE are some singular sights to be seen at Nismes, but never a stranger one than appeared there three years ago—a meeting of theologians for theological discussion, in which nobody called anyone else either a traitor or an Atheist—an assembly of clergymen who hated nobody and cursed nothing. The subject was a most delicate one—the resurrection of the Saviour—but every opinion was listened to with respect and attention; and these unique divines had so much attachment to Christianity that they not only praised its precepts but even practised them, a faith in Christ so great that they were not afraid of its being destroyed by either logic or history. It is far from Exeter Hall to Nismes, but I never realised till now how very far.

Sixty-five persons were present, partly pastors, partly laymen. After an old minister had been called to the chair and prayer had been offered, Mons. Grotz read a paper on the subject of the day. He dwelt at length on the differences and discrepancies in the concluding parts of the four Gospels; and then passed on to consider the importance of the belief to our religious life, adopting the remark of Schleiermacher that as the apostles believed Jesus to be the Son of God before his resurrection, the resurrection was not necessary to true faith in him, nor therefore to salvation. The true doctrine of the resurrection is that all that is holy and true is immortal and must triumph. In this we all agree; we all feel that a work such as his, that so much loftiness, love, and devotion, so perfect a union with the Father, cannot have ended in destruction and nothingness. The conscience of the Christian world, the conscience of every man who reflects and works, who suffers and loves, refuses to think of death in presence of the Christ. The Greek will speak of immortality; the Jew of resurrection; we shall speak of life, of life eternal. To the unbelieving, to those who find in the world's history and in their own hearts no traces of a living Christ, let us leave the barren task of proving, book in hand, that the dead Jesus left the tomb two thousand years ago. What matters it to our religious life whether or not his flesh and bones escaped the operation of the laws of biology? The doctrine we need is, that the soul and its heroisms are immortal; and its best proof is that the martyr who fell by the hands of the wicked became thenceforth the centre of human faith and love. Jesus of Nazareth! Master! I bow before thee, love and worship thee. I have followed thee through thy toilsome path and see thee now in thy glory. Thou callest me, and amidst my sins and sorrows I hear. Thou ledest me to thyself, and by thyself to thy Father. Thou livest by the power of God, and by that power shall we live with thee!

When the reader had thus concluded, discussion began. Pastor Gachou thought the question too wide for profitable discussion. Pastor Puaux declared there was nothing in the paper which had been read that had not been long ago refuted. He had once been an Atheist; he was now a Christian. He had put his belief to a judicial inquiry. He sat as judge and called before him the witnesses, and summoned skilled advocates, Abaddie and Tillotson, Toland and Voltaire. The decision to which he came was that Jesus had as certainly risen as if he himself had seen him. To this he owed his Christianity: for in truth the battle between Christianity and infidelity must be fought in the garden of Joseph of Arimathea. If he did not so believe, he would renounce his pulpit. He was glad to have thus delivered a testimony for his Saviour.

Then Pastor Dizier declared that M. Puaux had indeed "delivered a testimony," but had certainly not delivered an argument. Unless he saw signs and wonders, would he not believe? Christianity needed no such support but stood by its own sanctifying power—stat mole sud: so akin was it to the soul, that in finding Christ the conscience only found its own highest self.

Pastor Babut admired the lofty and Christian spirit of the paper that had been read, but could not accept its conclusion. His inquiries into the authorship of the Fourth Gospel had convinced him that it was the work of John. Here was an eye-witness of the resurrection; and his testimony was supported by Paul's, which, though not direct, was of early date and of undoubted authenticity. The discrepancies between the different accounts were easily explained by the confusion of mind which so startling an event would be sure to produce. He did not think belief in the resurrection was essential to Christianity; but still he looked with suspicion on the tendency to cast off old beliefs on the mere ground of their being non-essential. A man so doing was like a bird placed in an exhausted air-pump. It flaps its wings and sings, as if still breathing its native air. But its activity is the symptom not of life, but of death.

Pastor Campredon said he believed in a free and personal God, and dared not limit His power by denying the possibility of the resurrection; but though he had long believed the doctrine (mainly because he could not otherwise explain the growth of Christianity) he had now ceased to believe in it. M. Puaux had compared the question to a trial. Adopting that metaphor, he would ask what judge would pronounce a decision on the testimony of but two eye-witnesses, both of disputed authority, and both contradicted at many points by current rumour.

Here M. Puaux rose again. He said: "The last speaker regards Jesus as dead; I regard him as living. And my view is supported by ten times as much evidence as would suffice to condemn a criminal. By the means by which you disprove the Gospel narratives, I would undertake to disprove that Napoleon was ever at St. Helena, or that he ever lived, or ever died. You disbelieve, because you begin by assuming miracle to be incredible. If Christ did not rise from the dead, then he was a man like you and me."

Another pastor: "Not quite like you and me; you flatter us too much, and you flatter yourself a little."

M. Puaux: "Don't disturb yourself; I shall never compare you to Jesus. I repeat with Paul, 'If Christ be not risen, our faith is vain.'"

This little passage of arms was the only one which marred the day's proceedings; and its agitator, M. Puaux, was, by the way, only a visitor from a distant town. The discussion was continued by Pastor Privat. He admitted that the Evangelists had materialised the facts of the narrative; but was convinced that beneath all that was exaggerated and legendary there was a basis of truth. He believed the apostles experienced appearances of Jesus, of a nature which could not be exactly defined, but which had an objective reality. It were hard to say what was that Body which appeared, but facts must not be denied only because they were unexplained. History spoke of similar appearances; and kindred phenomena as to sounds had been known, as in the case of the voices which Joan of Arc, and the songs which the Cevenols, heard. He had heard illusive voices at times when he was perfectly master of his senses. His conclusion was that we must not undervalue the Gospel narratives, but yet must strive to elevate and spiritualise our belief. A religion of conscience must be based upon the facts of conscience.

M. Auguste Dide, a clever Paris journalist, concluded the discussion. He should begin by defining his terms. The resurrection was—the passing of Christ's body from death to life. Then, if that were so, it was a fact utterly unattested. The only possible witnesses were the guards whom Matthew says were posted at the sepulchre, but whom he describes as being so afraid that they became like dead men, so that they could not have seen Jesus. So far was this doctrine from being essential to Christianity, that Thomas, who declared his disbelief, continued to be not only a Christian but an apostle. And rightly so, for though the resurrection were abandoned, the soul and its faith, the conscience and its powers, would still remain. Heaven would be still over us, and in it all our hopes. Still would remain Christianity—human life viewed from the standpoint of holiness, with Jesus as founder and leader.

Then, with the President's prayer, the discussion ended. Each man had spoken as he thought, and had thought before he spoke. They hold that the flower of piety blossoms fairest where the light is strongest.

Is it wicked of them?

FRIDAY, JULY 2, 1869.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

WE are glad that an amount of attention is now being given to the subject of the Provincial Meeting, which gives good ground for hope of some speedy and real solution of its difficulties. It is far too important a gathering for its precious hours to be wasted in annually recurring discussions which remind us of nothing so much as of the debate whether a certain society should be furnished with a round table or a square one. For we cannot help feeling that the points at issue are very much exaggerated by a few extreme partisans on either side, and that on the part of the great bulk of those composing, or qualified to compose, the Assembly, there is no serious difference of opinion. We all alike feel it to be the annual gathering of our ministers and congregations throughout the province; and we all desire that it shall be such an occasion as to bring together a large number of ministers and people of all classes, to kindle in them a deeper religious feeling, to draw them together in a feeling of strong and hearty brotherhood, and to send them away to their respective churches refreshed and inspired, and informed with new ideas of Christian activity. Now, evidently the central point of all this is not what the Assembly shall be called, nor who shall be entitled to vote in any technical matters that may arise, but how shall the occasion itself be spent. And we feel hopeful, because we see that there is practically not much difference of opinion on this central point. Those who differ most widely from Mr. DARBISHIRE as to whether it is right or wrong in theory for the Assembly to attempt any special work, at any rate agree with him in desiring that in addition to the sermon there shall be a large and full opportunity for earnest conference on subjects of religious interest. Mr. RAWSON, in his letter of last week, attributes to this such paramount importance as to suggest that after the President's address the Assembly should divide into "sections, in which should be read short papers, and discussions held as to the theory of special agencies, such as missions, church finance, Sunday-schools, &c.;" and Mr. FREESTON, who endorses Mr. RAWSON's suggestions as "of a practical nature and just the kind required," says the Assembly "should exert all its power to stimulate free religious thought and encourage and support benevolent and religious activity." Well, is not here a large ground of agreement? It is true that Mr. DARBISHIRE would go further and absolutely exclude any positive work, while Mr. RAWSON and Mr. FREESTON, and we believe the great bulk of the Assembly, have no such conviction of the absolute incompatibility of united action and religious conference. Still, all agree that a good time of free and full religious conference is the first thing needful. Let us, then, secure this, and let the question of whether such conference shall result in some collective action, or only in increased local activities, take care of itself. We think it may be safely left to do. Two things are certain—first, that the Assembly will not adopt a formal constitution definitely excluding collective action; and secondly, that there are so few matters in which action can be taken by it in its corporate capacity, with as much advantage as by separate district agencies, that the Assembly is not likely to attempt much in that way. The fate of the Missionary Branch sufficiently illustrates this. The Assembly was probably as unanimous in its feeling that missionary work should spring from its meeting together as it is likely ever to be on any subject, and there was not the least intention, in forming the affiliated Associations, to shelve any activity on the part of the Assembly itself. But the simple fact turned out to be that the district agencies worked better by themselves, and the missionary branch, as an agency of the Assembly, has fallen to the ground, not as Mr. JOHN GRUNDY said, because the laymen have not co-operated, but because what co-operation they had to give was more useful given through the district Associations. True, they do not help to anything like the extent they ought. But the same principle still applies. What is needed is not another central agency, but the existing ones better supporting. And as for the Assembly, would it not do much more to help on the missionary work of the province if, instead of taking up time with reading a so-called Missionary Branch Report about what these district agencies are doing, there were a free conference on the subject of missionary work and the causes of our indifferent success?

We know that some of our laymen hold very strong opinions on this matter. We should like to hear the subject of home missions introduced to the Assembly by short papers from Mr. THOMAS WRIGLEY and Mr. JOHN GRUNDY, and then freely talked out for a couple of hours, as were the different subjects at the great Educational Conference last year. We do not think that any one would be inclined to twit such a meeting with being resultless, or to say that an Assembly, which annually occupied its time in some such way, was frittering away its opportunities in "the mere talk of a Debating Society."

Can we not agree, then, to come to this as the first stage in reform? Let us put the other question on one side for a time. Manifestly many of the subjects which would furnish the most interesting deliberations are subjects upon which no one would wish to found any definite collective action. Mr. FREESTON's axiom that there can only be deliberation if the result is to be either law or work, is to a certain extent true, but surely it is not true when used (as he uses it) to imply that the action must be collective. Men may deliberate about the methods of a work which has to be actually carried out individually. It is not a question of work v. talk; as a fact, there are no harder workers in the province than Mr. DARBISHIRE and some of those who have argued with him in favour of eliminating all organised action from the programme of the Assembly. Let the question of result, however, be left open. When occasionally questions arise in which it seems possible for the Assembly to take definite action, whether by way of petition, committees of inquiry, or even executive sub-committees, these must be considered upon their own merits. The Assembly has always been free to take any action that has seemed desirable arising out of its conferences, and will not consent to abdicate that freedom, though anxious to make the conferences themselves the central interest of its meetings.

FUNERAL OF REV. R. B. ASPLAND.

THE funeral of this greatly esteemed minister took place at Hackney on Saturday last, when his remains were laid in the grave which contains those of his father, so well known for the services which he rendered, in various ways, to our denomination. Before one o'clock, the time fixed for the mournful ceremony, the chapel, in which our lamented friend had for the last years of his life ministered with so much acceptance, was filled by members of his congregation and others, and as his coffin was borne along the aisle and placed under the pulpit from which he has so often spoken the word of life, many weeping eyes and sobbing breasts showed how deep was the regard which he had inspired, and how sincere was the sorrow that was felt for his loss. The esteem too in which he was held throughout our body was proved by the large number of ministers and friends from different parts of the country, who joined with his immediate relations in paying the last tribute of respect. Among those present were the Rev. Thos. Madge, Rev. Dr. Sadler, Rev. P. W. Clayden, Rev. H. Ierson, Rev. W. H. Channing, Rev. J. P. Ham, Rev. J. C. Means, Rev. T. L. Marshall, Rev. S. C. Davison, Rev. Robert Spears, Rev. J. Phillips, Rev. T. Hunter, Rev. John Taylor, Rev. Joseph Heywood, Mr. C. Venning, Mr. Hart, Mr. Preston, Mr. Philp, of London; Rev. C. H. Ball; Rev. John Kenrick, of York; Rev. Wm. Gaskell, and Mr. R. D. Darbishire, of Manchester; Rev. John Gordon, and Mr. Herbert New, of Evesham; Sir John Bowring, of Exeter; Mr. Hibbert, and Mr. Thornely, of Hyde. The funeral service was read in a most solemn and impressive manner by the Rev. James Martineau. After dwelling on the sublime assurance that "this mortal must put on immortality," and showing how the departure of friend after friend made this life more sacred, and took away from the strangeness of the next, Mr. Martineau said:—"Far be it from us lightly or arrogantly to claim the verdict of God's approval for any responsible soul, even when very near to our knowledge and affection. The heart's own secret account with the Infinite Holiness must ever have its mystery of reserve, which it would be an irreverence to break. Yet surely the human attachments of Christian men, the affinities that draw their mutual respect, are no faint pledges of the real thought of God. And when we remember how truly our departed friend loved the churches which he served, how he gave them the unstinted offering of his cultivated mind, his rare and happy social tact, his genuine loyalty to conviction, and his balanced reverence for liberty and truth; how he blessed warmth of zeal with minute exactitude and comprehensiveness of service; how his charity, always large, widened as his experience deepened; how his earliest friendships never waned, and his newest sufficed to make a sorrow at his death; we cannot mistake the type of the righteous, whose life is blessing, and whose end is peace. Conscious no doubt he was of such short-comings as it is human to feel, and Christian to deplore; but the Divine mercy is gentler than our best tenderness. And if even for us death glorifies the departed, we may trust an affection higher than our own, and believe that the lesser frailties drop with the coil of mortality, and vanish in the mid-passage, from earth which waves the adieu, to heaven which greets the arrival."

SELAH.

THE following remarks on this word, in the last number of the Bibliotheca Sacra show how learned men may differ:—

"The translators of the Bible have left the word Selah, which occurs so often in the Psalms, as they found it, and of course the English reader often asks his minister or some learned friend what it means. And the minister or learned friend has most often been obliged to confess ignorance, because it is a matter in regard to which the most learned have by no means been of one mind. The Targums, and most of the Jewish commentators, give to the word the meaning of eternally, forever. Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical or rhythmical note. Herder regards it as indicating a change of tone. Matheson, as a musical tone, equivalent, perhaps, to the word repeat. According to Luther and others, it means silence! Gesenius explains it to mean, 'Let the instruments play, and the singers stop.' Woehler regards it as equivalent to sursum corda—up my soul! Sommer, after examining all the seventy-four passages in which the word occurs, recognises in every case 'an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah.' They are calls for aid and prayers to be heard, expressed either with entire distinctness, or if not in the imperative 'Hear, Jehovah!' or 'Awake, Jehovah!' and the like, still earnest addresses to God that He would remember and hear, etc."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

DO GOOD.

BY WILLIAM BARNES.

AH! child; the stream that brings
To thirsty lips their drink
Is seldom drain'd; for springs
Pour water to its brink.
The well-springs that supply
The streams are seldom spent,
For clouds of rain come by
To pay them what they lent.
The clouds that cast their rain
On lands that yield our food,
Have water from the main
To make their losses good.
The sea is paid by lands
With streams from every shore;
So give with kindly hands,
For God can give you more.
He would that in a ring
His blessings should be sent,
From living thing to thing,
But nowhere staid or spent.
And every soul that takes,
But yields not on again,
Is as a link that breaks
In Heaven's love-made chain.

SUNSHINE STORIES.

BY HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN.

"Now I am going to tell a story," said the Wind.
"Excuse me," said the Rain, "but now it is my turn; you have been howling round the corner as hard as ever you could, this long time past."
"Is that your gratitude towards me?" said the Wind.
"I, who, in honour of you, turn inside out—yes, even break all the umbrellas, when people won't have anything to do with you."
"I am going to speak!" said the Sunshine.
"Silence!" and the Sunshine said it with such glory and majesty, that the long, weary Wind fell prostrate, and the Rain beat against him, and shook him, and said: "We won't stand it! She always breaks through, that Madam Sunshine; we won't listen to her. What she says is not worth hearing."

But the Sunshine said, "A beautiful swan flew over the rolling, tumbling waves of the ocean. Every one of its feathers shone like gold; one feather drifted down on the great merchant vessel, that, with all sail set, was sailing away. The feather dropped on the curly light hair of a young man, whose business it was to have a care for the goods, supercargo they called him. The bird of fortune's feather touched his forehead, became a pen in his hand, and brought him such luck, that very soon he became a wealthy merchant, rich enough to have bought for himself spurs of gold; rich enough to change a golden dish into a nobleman's shield; and I shone on it," said the Sunshine.

"The swan flew further, away over the bright green meadow, where the little shepherd-boy, only seven years old, had lain down in the shadow of the old and only tree there was. The swan, in its flight, kissed one of the leaves of the tree. The leaf fell into the boy's hand, and it was changed to three leaves, to ten, yes, to a whole book, and in it he read about all the wonders of nature, about his native language, about faith and knowledge. At night he laid the book under his head, that he might not forget what he had been reading. The wonderful book led him to the school-bench, and thence in search of knowledge. I have read his name among the names of learned men," said the Sunshine.

"The swan flew into the quiet, lonely forest, rested awhile on the dark, deep lake, where the water-lilies grow; where the wild apples are to be found on the shore; where the cuckoo and wild pigeon have their homes. A poor woman was in the wood, gathering firewood—branches that had fallen down, and dry sticks; she carried them in a bundle on her back, and in her arms she held a little child. She saw the golden swan, the bird of Fortune, rise from among the reeds on the shore. What was that that glittered? A golden egg, quite warm yet. She laid it in her bosom, and the warmth remained in it. Surely there was life in the egg! She heard a gentle pecking inside of the shell, but mistook the sound, and thought it was her own heart that she heard beating. At home, in the poor cottage, she took out the egg; 'tick, tick,' it said, as if it had been a valuable gold watch; but that it was not, only an egg—a real, living egg. The egg cracked and opened, and a dear little baby-swan, all feathered as with purest gold, put out its little head; round its neck it had four rings, and as the poor woman had four boys, three at home, and the little one that she had had with her in the lonely wood, she understood at once that here was a ring for each boy; and just as she thought of that, the little gold bird took flight. She kissed each ring, made each of the children kiss one of the rings, laid it next to the child's heart, then put it on his finger. I saw it all," said the Sunshine, "and I saw what followed. One of the boys was playing in a ditch, and took a lump of clay in his hand, turned and twisted and pressed it between his fingers, till it took shape, and was like Jason, who went in search of, and found the golden fleece. The second boy ran out on the meadow, where the flowers stood—flowers of all imaginable colours; he gathered a handful, and squeezed them so tight that all the juice spirted into his eyes, and some of it wetted the ring. It cribbled and crawled in his thoughts, and in his hands, and after many a day, and many a year, people in the great city talked of the great painter. The third child held the ring so tight in his teeth, that it gave forth sound, an echo of the song in the depth of his heart. Thought and feelings rose in beautiful sounds; rose like singing swans; plunged, like swans, into the deep, deep sea. He became a great master, a great composer, of whom every country has the right to say, 'He was mine!' And the fourth little one was—yes, he was—the 'ugly duck' of the family; they said he had the pip, and must have pepper, and butter, like the little sick chickens, and that he got; but of me he got a warm sunny kiss," said the Sunshine. "He got ten kisses for one; he was a poet, and was buffeted and kissed, alternately, all his life. But he held what no one could take from him, the Ring of Fortune, from Dame Fortune's golden swan. His thoughts took wings, and flew up and away, like singing butterflies, the emblem of immortality!"

"That was a dreadfully long story," said the Wind.

"And O, how stupid and tiresome!" said the Rain. "Blow on me, please, that I may revive a little."

And the Wind blew, and the Sunshine said, "The swan of Fortune flew over the beautiful bay, where the fishermen had set their nets; the poorest of them wanted to get married, and marry he did. To him the swan brought a piece of amber; amber draws things toward it, and it drew hearts to the house. Amber is the most wonderful incense, and there came a soft perfume as from a church; there came a sweet breath from out of beautiful nature, that God has made. They were so happy and grateful for their peaceful home, and content even in their poverty. Their life became a real Sunshine story!"

"I think we had better stop now," said the Wind.

"The Sunshine has talked long enough, and I am dreadfully bored."

"And I also," said the Rain.

And what do we others, who have heard the story, say?

We say, "Now my story's done."

CHARITABLE MONEY-GETTING.

THE Echo in a clever article on this subject exposes the hollowness of a great deal of the so-called charity of the time, and thus speaks of some of "the more popular and indirect means of raising money for charity." "This secondary alms-getting may be divided into male and female branches. The male alms-getter will, if modest, invite you to hear him read Shakespeare. A more ambitious man will plunge you into the incongruity of an amateur concert for the deaf and dumb, an amateur theatrical performance for the benefit of the hopelessly blind, or a ball on behalf of an orthopaedic hospital. All these will be more or less successful in drawing money from people who prefer to indulge a diluted benevolence. The charitable bazaar, however, which is essentially feminine, is the most delusive to the English mind. The woman knows the right way to an Englishman's heart. He is not by nature a pleasure-taker, but he is commercial. So beauty puts on the appearance of a trader, and stands behind the counter, and be the imposition never so barefaced, he will come and buy. The idea of a commercial transaction fascinates him. He has no notion of giving without a 'valuable consideration.' So ingrained is this trait of his character that the laws of his country will not allow a man to give an estate unless the recipient makes some show of paying for it. A thousand acres may pass 'in consideration of the sum of five shillings lawful money of Great Britain,' but the semblance of a bargain must be preserved. Much in the same way he will spend a hatful of money on doll pen-wipers, though not one man in fifty ever wipes his pen, except on the sleeve or the lining of his coat. The coin is to all intents and purposes given away, but the British mind is satisfied by the 'valuable consideration' which answers to the legal peppercorn.

"This, however, is by no means all. Let us follow the fortunes of a man with money who has walked into a bazaar. He has had his warning, for they made him pay for his entrance. His blood, therefore, is on his own head. He walks about calmly at first, determined not to give way to temptation. To those who urge him to buy he says he has only just come in, and is taking a look round before choosing anything. This plea avails for a time, but as the rivalry between the fair merchants waxes more warm, the commercial travellers sent out by each become more importunate. He is invited to take 'the last ticket' in a lottery for a pair of braces, so gorgeously worked that it would be absolute waste to wear them out of sight, and to win them will entail cricket playing, or rowing, or amateur gardening, to show them off to advantage. He puts in and loses, but his gambling spirit is roused, and he becomes a candidate for fire-screens, slippers, arm-chairs, card-cases, and clocks, ending by winning a huge soft sofa cushion, the colour of which will not match his furniture, and to win which he has contributed twice its value in subscriptions to lotteries. His tormentors will now insist that, having been so fortunate as to get this valuable article for 'next to nothing,' he ought really to buy something at a fair price. He is compelled, by supplication to which he is wholly unaccustomed, and which he has no means of combating, to purchase from one stall. A rival young lady at once in a complaining tone, hopes that he will be impartial and buy something from her, 'she has sold so little as yet.' Beauty in distress overcomes him; he hastens to the rescue, and exchanges gold for smiles which he enjoys, and other articles about which he is profoundly indifferent. He is next entreated to try his hand in the 'bag of Fortune.' He pays his fee and takes his chance. Chance favours him with a pair of woollen baby shoes. He knows nothing of babies, and is much dismayed. The eyes just now so supplicatory are sparkling with fun, and he is gravely recommended to purchase a very charming embroidered little frock to match the former prize. Let us drop the curtain upon this affecting picture."

"THAT'S VERY ODD."

A GENTLEMAN was recounting his travels one evening after dinner to a friend, and commenced in this way:—"When I was travelling in Russia I was attacked in crossing a forest by a pack of twelve wolves, and from my postchaise window I fired my revolver and killed the first wolf, and, strange to say, his companions stopped and devoured him, and then came on again to the fight. I shot another, and my postilion killed a third, both of which were devoured, and so we went on until only one wolf remained, and I killed him as we were entering the town, and I observed that he was immensely fat. He, of course, had devoured all his companions." "Dear me," said the friend, "that's very odd." "Very odd," said the traveller; "but not nearly so odd as that which happened on the following day. I was out shooting antelopes, and fired at one as he stood on the top of a crag, and, odd to say, the ball passed through his neck, and killed another which was standing on a crag a quarter of a mile off." "That's very odd," said the friend. "Yes, but the odd part of the story is to come. The report of my rifle so alarmed an old he-bear which happened to be up in a tree, that he fell to the ground, broke his neck, and died on the spot." "Well," said the friend, "upon my soul, that's very odd." "Yes, odd," said the traveller, "but not so odd as the sequel to my story. A thunderstorm came on, and I sought refuge in a hollow tree, and, to my horror, I descended into a nest of young bears, where I had not been very long when I heard a strange tapping, the unmistakable signs of the return of the she-bear. She ascended the tree and was descending the hollow. With the rapidity of lightning I seized her by the tail and plunged my hunting knife into her haunches, upon which she started upwards, dragging me with her, and as she went down on one side of the tree I escaped by the other." "Now, really, that's very odd," said the friend, "for it's the first time in my life I ever heard of a bear with a tail." "Yes," replied the traveller, "and it was the only time I ever met with one, and that's very odd."

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

MEETING OF TRUSTEES.

ON Thursday, June 24th, the day after the conclusion of the examinations, the annual meeting of trustees was held at the College; S. ROBINSON, Esq., president, in the chair. Twenty-two trustees were present.

R. D. DABSHIRE, Esq., one of the secretaries, read the minutes of the annual meeting in January, and the heads of subsequent committee meetings.

The Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU read the report of the tutors, and a vote of thanks was passed, on the motion of W. SHAEN, Esq., M.A., who said that it was a report of an eminently satisfactory session, and that they must all feel doubly grateful to Mr. Martineau for the way in which he had fulfilled the unusually onerous duties that devolved on him on account of the death of his colleague, Mr. Taylor.

Mr. JOSEPH LUPTON, of Leeds, moved that the thanks of the trustees be given to the visitors of the College, the Rev. J. Kenrick, M.A., and the Rev. W. Gaskell, M.A., especially to Mr. Gaskell for his address of the previous day, and that he be requested to allow it to be published for circulation among the trustees and the students. A more beautiful, appropriate, and touching address he had never listened to, and he was sure that it would linger long in the memories of those who heard it, and exercise lasting influence upon the students. The Rev. C. BRADB, in seconding the resolution, said it would be unbecomingly to praise Mr. Gaskell in his presence, but he had never heard anything that more deeply touched him, or was more appropriate to the occasion.

The two senior students who have finished their course, Mr. F. H. Jones, B.A., and Mr. P. H. Higginson, B.A., then received their customary certificates. Both gentlemen, we understand, intend to go to one of the German universities on the Hibbert Trust.

Mr. Philip Vance Smith, son of the Rev. G. V. Smith, of York, was admitted as a divinity student for the next session conditionally on passing the usual entrance examination. Another application from a graduate of one of the Scotch universities, recently a student at Berlin and Heidelberg, was referred to the committee.

The Rev. JOHN KENRICK, M.A., then moved, and J. MURCH, Esq., of Bath, seconded:

"That the trustees of Manchester New College, assembled in annual meeting, desire to put on record their very deep sense of the most efficient and faithful service rendered to the College by the Rev. J. J. Taylor, B.A., for one year as assistant tutor, for seventeen years as secretary, for six years as public examiner, for twenty-nine years as professor, and for sixteen years as principal; their high admiration of his public and private character, and the great loss which they feel that they themselves, no less than the College and the Christian Church at large, have suffered by his death; and that they hereby offer to Miss Taylor the assurance of their very warm and respectful sympathy, in the hope that she may find some alleviation of her sorrow in the thought of the universal love and reverence in which her father's memory is held."

MARK PHILIPS, Esq., said that he rose with a feeling in which they would participate in thinking of the loss of two of their best friends. He trusted that there were men to be found amongst us with education carried to the extent which our different institutions now give, who in time would be as well qualified to represent us before the public as those that have gone before them. Yet it was always a matter of deep personal regret when we lose those who have entwined themselves round our hearts and affections, whose places can never be wholly supplied. Mr. Aspland had been for many years one of the most active supporters of the College. And although there arrived a period when his views did not altogether accord in its management with those of many others of its friends, they knew that his heart was always right, and that he had as good a right to hold his opinions as others had to hold those which guided them. He had rendered a great service in giving us the admirable memoir of his father, who in his day had fought a good fight for our principles; and those principles, descending to his son, were defended by him with a warmth and courage which deserved our best thanks. He moved that, "The trustees sadly record the death of the Rev. Robert Brook Aspland, M.A., a vice-president, and for eleven years a most efficient secretary of the College; and, referring with grateful regard to his long and faithful labours, both within the College and beyond it, for the promotion of religious freedom and Presbyterian Nonconformity, the cause that was ever nearest to his heart, they offer to Mrs. Aspland and the surviving members of his family respectful condolence under their bereavement, and the comforting assurance that the character and work of him whom they have lost will long preserve his influence and memory."

The motion was seconded by T. ASHTON, Esq., treasurer of the College; and, like the last, was carried in solemn silence.

REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER.

ON Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, June 22nd, 23rd, and 24th, the fortieth annual meeting was held in the First Presbyterian Church (Rev. J. Scott Porter's), Belfast. The MODERATOR (Rev. J. A. Crozier) was the preacher, and afterwards, the Synod having been duly constituted by prayer, and the roll of ministers and elders called, the Rev. R. Cleland, of Crumlin, was appointed Moderator, the Rev. John Porter, clerk of the Synod, and the Rev. James Callwell, assistant clerk. The reports of Presbyteries were then taken. The Presbytery of Bangor reported that the Rev. J. Orr was their Moderator for the ensuing year; that they have under their care, as students for the ministry, Mr. Robert Miller, a student of the fourth year, and Mr. R. E. Berryhill, a student of the third year. The Presbytery of Armagh reported that the Rev. John Jennings is their Moderator; on the 9th March, 1869, they installed the Rev. John Jennings to the pastoral charge of the congregation of Narrowwater; on the 30th March they licensed Mr. James Kennedy and Mr. James Mulligan, students of the fifth year, to preach the Gospel; ordaining the former as assistant and successor to the Rev. William Crozier, of Kilmore. The Presbytery of Templepatrick reported that the Rev. John Dickson was their Moderator, and that they held three meetings during the past year.

The second and third days were occupied by discussion on a resolution moved by the Rev. FRAS. McCAMMON, which had been agreed to by a committee appointed on the previous evening:

"That, whilst strongly objecting to certain clauses in Mr. Gladstone's Irish Church Bill, which affect the interests of our religious body, we hereby record our approbation of the principle of religious equality on which it is founded, and our conviction that it is, on the whole, a statesmanlike measure; that it is the only one practicable in the present state of public opinion, and that it will tend to abate sectarian animosities at present unhappily dividing and distracting this country."

The previous question was moved by the Rev. R. CAMPBELL, who said that he considered that no statesman, especially in regard to so excitable a population as that of Ireland, was justified in introducing a revolutionary measure—for a revolutionary measure this was—unless he had grounds for believing that, after the evils of revolution had passed away, they would enjoy the benefits of a salutary revolution. If this bill passed, the present state of things would be disturbed, and many evils caused. Many of their weak congregations would experience great difficulties. Some, perhaps, would become entirely extinct, and many heart-burnings would be created, and all for what? Would they then have religious equality? He fearlessly asserted that they would almost be as far, and in some respects farther, from it than before.

Ultimately, however, the resolution was carried, with three dissentients—Revs. William Crozier, R. Campbell, and J. A. Crozier.

WEST RIDING SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE second annual meeting of the above association, attended by about 100 delegates and teachers in the Riding, was held on Saturday afternoon last in the Congregational Hall, Leeds, under the presidency of Joseph Lupton, Esq. The report, containing much statistical information, was read by the Rev. R. Pilcher, B.A. (of Bradford), the secretary, from which we learn that since the last annual meeting the Huddersfield school had joined the union, and the Wakefield school consented to be inspected by the visitors. In the various schools in the union there are 189 classes, containing, altogether, 1,891 scholars and 452 teachers, with an average attendance of 1,134 scholars, and 159 teachers. The committee note with especial regret the irregular attendance of teachers. During the year visits have been made to twelve schools by Messrs. Brewer and Sutcliffe, of Bradford, W. A. Morton, of Leeds, Slater, Whitehead, and Stott, of Halifax, whose encouraging reports, in a condensed form, were read at the meeting.

Notwithstanding the work done, the committee felt their powers were greatly lessened by the want of pecuniary aid, and assistance in visiting.

No reply had been received from any school suggesting suitable lectures, and in consequence no steps had been taken in that direction. The Association had to record the loss of both its vice-presidents—Henry Briggs, Esq., of Outwood Hall, by death, and the Rev. Thomas Hincks, B.A., by removal; to the services of whom the report alluded in grateful terms. The committee were able to report that the institutions in connection with most of the schools were in a flourishing condition, and their means of usefulness fully employed in the means of promotion of the mental and spiritual interest of all who came within their influence.

The report having been adopted, the officers for the ensuing year appointed, and the thanks of the meeting awarded to the retiring officers,

The CHAIRMAN in feeling terms referred to the loss which the Unitarian cause had just sustained by the deaths of the Revs. John James Tayler, B.A., and R. B. Aspland, M.A., and proposed a vote on the subject, which was seconded by the Rev. R. PILCHER, B.A.

The remainder of the meeting was occupied in the consideration of the means to be employed to make these annual gatherings more particularly useful, and the Association conducive to the progress of Sunday-school education. It was understood that the next meeting was to be held in Bradford, on the invitation of the Rev. R. Pilcher, B.A., about the latter part of July; and the Rev. T. R. Elliott, of Hunslet, was requested to prepare a paper bearing on some subject connected with Sunday-school work; and it was recommended that the committee prepare a plan of Sunday lessons for every Sunday in the year, in imitation of the plan which generally prevails among our orthodox brethren. The meeting was brought to a close about eight o'clock by singing a hymn.

IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS.

THE twenty-first meeting of the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians was held on Wednesday week in the church of the First Presbyterian Congregation, Belfast. The Association comprises the Synod of Munster, the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster, the Presbytery of Antrim, and the Northern Presbytery of Antrim.

The Rev. WILLIAM WHITELEGGE (Cork), President, having preached, the Association was constituted in the usual manner, with the Rev. William Hall, Greyabbey, as president, and the Rev. H. Moore, secretary.

The Rev. JOHN SCOTT PORTER read the statement of accounts of Michael Andrews, Esq., treasurer, which were adopted, with the warm thanks of the Association to Michael Andrews, Esq., for his services.

The Rev. HUGH MOORE moved—"That the committee of the Association be requested to use their utmost diligence to increase the ministerial education fund and the incidental fund from time to time, so that the treasurer may be always enabled to meet demands for unusual expenditure, as well as to defray charges incurred by ordinary business."

The subject of the Irish Church Bill, however, gave the special interest to the meeting. The Committee for General Purposes handed in a long report, which showed what the committee had done in the matter. The Rev. J. Orr and the Rev. C. J. McAlester had been appointed to wait upon Mr. Gladstone, at an early day, to represent to him the views of this Association on the subject, and endeavour to prevail upon him to introduce such amendments as would place the members of this Association on a level with other Dissenting bodies, and it was further arranged that the Rev. J. S. Porter and John Miller, Esq., of Comber, should afterwards proceed to London, and watch the progress of the Bill. Messrs. Orr and McAlester addressed a letter to Mr. Gladstone, informing him of their appointment as a deputation from the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians with reference to the Irish Church Bill, and asking for an interview. Mr. Gladstone was too busy to grant one, but requested them to place themselves in communication with the Chief Secretary for Ireland, to whom they accordingly submitted a statement of the alterations sought. These had reference, among other matters, to the case of ministers now in receipt of Regium Donum, who may become, by age or infirmity, unable to discharge the duties of their office; to that of the Association's theological professors; to the rights of "inchoate" congregations, at present complying with the conditions necessary for endowment, but not actually in receipt of Regium Donum; and to the claims of Licentiate of the Presbyterian Church to compensation. The desired changes have been made with regard to provisions for aged ministers; for the salaries of our theological professors and for the rights of "inchoate" congregations; but the claims of licentiates have not been recognised. They had also applied that each minister should receive an annuity equivalent, not, as the Bill had provided, to "the amount actually received by such minister during the financial year ending the thirty-first of March, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine," but to the amount he would have received had the Irish Church Bill not been introduced; and inasmuch as the Bill provided that a sum not exceeding £15,000 be paid in respect of the building of the Presbyterian College, Belfast, they urged that a proportionate sum, say £1,500, should be paid to the Non-Subscribing Association, in order to enable their providing suitable accommodation for their professors and students; and, as the General Assembly has sought a certain sum for the extinction of debts on their churches and manse, they applied that a proportionate sum should be granted to the Association for the same purposes.

The SECRETARY read a detailed report from the Rev. J. Porter and Mr. Miller on the interviews they had in London with members of the Ministry, and others.

A long discussion then took place on the subject of a sustentation fund. It was introduced by Mr. JOHN MILLER, J.P., who urged that it would be better for the whole body to have a general fund, corresponding, if possible, to the difference between the Regium Donum and the amount to be given as compensation. He believed that the laity would respond very heartily to such an appeal. Immediately after the Bill was introduced, Mr. James Andrews and himself visited all the parties able to give in the congregation of Comber, and he was happy to say that with one exception there was not a single man but was willing to double the amount of his subscription. That was sufficient to keep their congregation perfectly straight with regard to Mr. Orr. It was for the sake, then, of other congregations that he wished a general fund established, but the ministers could not be asked to put into it the money given to them by Government, unless there was a guarantee that they should not be worse off in remuneration than they are now. The difficulty which started itself to him was how were they to get persons to guarantee to the ministers the difference between the profits of the money to be given by Government and the Regium Donum—where were they to find persons to take that risk upon themselves unless there was devised some mode of securing them against loss. The plan he would suggest would be that the money to be received from the Government for the loss of the Regium Donum should be put into a general fund, and with it what the laity are disposed to give, to be placed in the hands of trustees for management. Let them pay out of that money the present amount of Regium Donum; and if a sufficient sum were not raised at once to pay the balance between the two, he suggested that the trustees should be allowed to trench upon the capital.

Mr. L'ESTRANGE proposed that Mr. Miller's suggestion be referred to the General Committee. At present they got about £3,600 a-year of Regium Donum, and the amount they would probably receive, at 4½ per cent. would yield £2,133 a-year—that left them £1,500 a-year to make up, and he was afraid it would be difficult to raise a fund the interest of which would be equal to that amount. To get £1,500 a-year about £35,000 of a fund would be required, and he did not believe they could raise that amount, and it would not be fair to ask any minister to commute unless there was a guarantee that at least his present income should be maintained.

Mr. MILLER did not think they were in such a plight as Mr. L'Estrange seemed to imagine. He had no doubt that the laity would subscribe largely.

Mr. S. MURLAND, J.P., said he agreed in all Mr. Miller had said on the absolute necessity of raising the funds, but he thought it was premature.

The proposal for a general sustentation fund was strongly opposed by Revs. C. J. McAlester and John Scott Porter, the latter of whom introduced the old grievances of some years ago, and expressed his fear that if the Presbytery of Antrim was permitted to take part in the government of the fund, it would be used as means of tyranny, for the purpose of keeping down, if in their power, the Northern Presbytery of Antrim (the Secession Presbytery formed by Dr. Montgomery and a few others, some years ago, on their failure to carry the Presbytery of Antrim with them in their requirements of a doctrinal declaration from ministerial candidates), and the congregations of the Remonstrant Synod.

Ultimately, however, after warm protest from the other ministers present against the introduction of such disputes, the Moderator put the proposal of Mr. Miller—to take steps for the formation of a sustentation fund—and it was carried by a large majority, Mr. Scott Porter and Mr. McAlester dissenting.

An influential committee to report to a future meeting of the Association was then appointed.

INTELLIGENCE.

LEGACY.—The treasurer of the Minister's Benevolent Society has received notice of a legacy of £100, free of duty, left to that society by the late Miss Downing, of Cheltenham.

ABERDEEN.—On Sunday week, a special service was held for the purpose of giving a formal welcome to the elder scholars who had joined the church during the past year. The new members were four in number; and a Bible was presented to each by the teachers, and a Martineau's hymn book by the chapel committee. The chapel was tastefully decorated with flowers, and the scholars were present and sang an appropriate piece of music.

CHOPINGTON.—On Saturday, June 26th, the first anniversary of this Sunday-school was celebrated by a public tea and meeting. The meeting, which was numerously attended, was addressed by the Revs. J. C. Street and T. Leyland, and Mr. R. Sharpe. The report showed that during the seven months the school had been in existence 146 scholars had entered, and 36 withdrawn, leaving a total of 110 scholars on the books. On the following day, three short sermons were preached by the Rev. J. C. Street; and selections of Scripture, poetry, &c., were very well recited at each service by the children. At the evening service the chapel was completely crowded.

DUKINFIELD.—At a meeting of the committee of the Dukinfield Old Chapel, held in the Sunday-school on Tuesday evening, June 22nd, 1869—James Ogden, Esq., in the chair—the following resolution was passed unanimously:

"That the Committee of the Dukinfield Old Chapel have heard with deep regret of the sudden death of the Rev. Robert Brook Aspland, M.A., who for more than 20 years (from 1838 to 1858) was the highly esteemed minister, pastor, and friend of the Old Chapel congregation, and who for a much longer period was a most able, eloquent, assiduous, and successful Christian minister, having always in his own mind a clear conception of the mission of Christ, and of the duties and responsibilities of the Christian professor, with a power of illustration and exposition seldom equalled and more rarely if ever excelled; and they would respectfully tender to Mrs. Aspland in her great affliction their sincere and heartfelt sympathy."

DUNDEE.—The Sunday-school of the Unitarian Church, with friends numbering nearly 150, made an excursion to Blebo, the estate of A. Bethune, Esq., on Tuesday last. The day was remarkably fine, and a thoroughly happy time was spent. There is a fair prospect of a site being obtained, and the building operations of the new chapel begun before long.

LONDON.—On Sunday last, the Rev. Benjamin Glover preached the anniversary sermons, in the Court-house, on behalf of the Unitarian society at this place.

STRATFORD.—This neat and beautiful little chapel was opened on Thursday, the 24th June. The Rev. Dr. Sadler took the introductory service, which was to have been taken by the late Rev. R. B. Aspland. The sermon was preached by the Rev. P. W. Clayden. On Sunday morning, the 27th, the Rev. H. Ierson, M.A., preached, and in the evening the Rev. W. H. Channing. All the sermons were highly appreciated. The son of the builder kindly lent a fine harmonium for the occasion, himself presiding at it. Such an instrument is greatly needed for the new chapel, but there is a debt of £400 to clear off yet.

WALSLEY.—On Sunday last, the annual services were preached by the Rev. J. Worthington. The collections amounted to £38. 15s. 5d., and would have been considerably more but for a storm of rain coming in in the afternoon, which prevented many friends from attending.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

To the Editors.—In last week's Herald is a letter of the Rev. John Wright, in which he says an Assembly "of congregations may be held for either of two purposes—to inaugurate and maintain schemes for doing religious work, or to form a conference for the expression of opinion and the discussion of principles."

But these objects are not antagonistic, and the Assembly will never accomplish what it ought until it includes both. The mistake which has been made, and which has chiefly caused the unpleasantness of the last few years, has been the attempt to exclude one of these objects. The Assembly, as the most important annual gathering of the congregations in the province, should represent the opinions and activities of the denomination. Each smaller society does the work of its own particular locality, but at the great annual gathering we want to learn what is being thought and done in all the localities. The Assembly, as by far our most influential meeting, should exert all its power to stimulate free religious thought, and encourage and support benevolent and religious activity. The separation of these two elements of thought and activity would be unfair either to one portion of the Assembly or the other; and it would not be wise to separate them, for one counteracts the extremes and supplements the deficiencies of the other. And, even if desirable, what hope is there of separating these two objects, with an increasing consciousness on the part of many of our laymen that we are not doing what the age demands of us. It is said that the Assembly should become deliberative. But there is a difference between a deliberative and a debating assembly. Real deliberation implies an executive, and the results of deliberation are embodied either in law or work. Whatever stops short of this is the mere talk of a debating society.

May I be allowed to say that I think the suggestions of Mr. Harry Rawson are of a practical nature and just the kind required, and would, if adopted, introduce new and improved features into the working of the Assembly, that would secure the approval of a large majority of the members.—I am, &c.,

MISTAKES IN HIGH PLACES.

To the Editors.—It is not well that palpable errors in matters of fact, however highly endorsed, should go about unchallenged and uncorrected. The facts of living history are the hand-writing of God, and should be guardedly, sacredly kept from perversion. Their correction will not involve a Lord Bishop or a Lord Marshal in having gone wilfully wrong. To err is human. Whether or no the Church of Christ can sustain itself now, as in its first days, by the voluntary co-operation of its friends, unaided by Government gold and by the secular arm, is the great question of this country and of this generation. Much as English dissent has done in the past to demonstrate the ability and wealth of the voluntary principle, to vitalise and sustain Christian worship, multitudes dare not trust it. Thousands still sincerely think that public worship must burden the public purse, and would perish without State provision. They are still unconvinced, either by the green growth of Nonconformity in Great Britain, or by the flourishing condition of unaided Episcopacy in the United States for a century past, or by the indisputable fact that among a people as essentially English as the Americans, and quite as numerous, the refusal of Government to make for religion any public provision whatsoever, has resulted in an excess of accommodation for Church-goers, which, on an average, is nearly double the actual seating required. The error, in fact, which we would correct, arose in the recent debate in the Lords, concerning the Irish Church. In that discussion (on the 18th inst.) the Bishop of Lichfield sought to strengthen his plea for a State Church by quoting the Iron Duke. In addressing, unfortunately, if correctly, the testimony of Wellington, to prove the existence of what never existed, the Lord Bishop said: "In my memory his words live and burn. In addressing this house that great man said: 'It has been my fortune to live among people of many different religions. I have lived among Hindoos and Mahomedans, but whatever the religion might be, I never found a country that did not make public provision for religious worship.'" (Cheers.) The bishop went on to say—"My Lords, I believe this bill to be the beginning of a war against the establishments of both England and Ireland." (Renewed cheers.) "I believe it tends entirely to the destruction of God's truth, and therefore a painful necessity is laid on me of voting against its second reading." The argument presented is, that as even Hindoos and Mahomedans make a State provision for religious worship, Christians should do it a fortiori. Not surely by offering to all nations the alternative of "the sword or the Koran" "death or the Bible." This is not making public provision for religious worship. Neither can we so regard the building of a Mosque or an Embarbarah here or there by some man of wealth or ruler, or emperor, and endowing it with the erection, round about, of a range of shops or dokauns as the principal mosque of the old Mogul capital, the Jumma Musjeed of Dehlie, is supported. No. There are numbers of both Hindoos and Mahomedans now in England. They know, and it is easy to consult them. In fact, we have just verified our impressions on this point by the word of some of these eminent men from Dehlie and Benares. And we add their voices to the records of the past, in clear and unanswerable confirmation of the facts that neither Hindoos nor Mahomedans can be fairly or truly quoted against the voluntary principle. They and we can only smile at the idea that the withdrawal of State provision from the Church "tends to the destruction of God's truth."—Yours, &c.,

C. H. A. DALL.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL GOVERNMENT.

To the Editors.—All that H. R. has stated is undoubtedly correct, and the thanks of all connected with our Sunday-schools are due to him. The more a subject of this importance is discussed the better for all Sunday-schools, as it can scarcely fail of drawing attention to the weak parts in our systems, thus rendering our schools much more efficient.

All that feel interested should surely be prepared to second any attempt for bettering the government of these schools, and should any valuable hints that may be given be carried out in only one or two schools, the gain will be well worth any little trouble that may be incurred in their promotion.

Perhaps the idea of a governing committee is the best that could be submitted for general consideration. Its members would, I suppose, be elected by ballot at a special teachers' meeting, and should be in office for a stipulated time; at the expiration of which they might be re-elected, or new members found in the place of those who no longer belong to it. It would perhaps be considered advisable to include among its members, the superintendent, treasurer, and secretary of the school; and also, that this committee meet, say every week, or month (as may be determined), for deliberation on school affairs.

There is, as far as I can see, no ground for objection to such a scheme that would long hold water. But should there be any, let it be brought forward at once, while general attention is still occupied with this subject. And should there be none, let steps be at once taken to introduce this to the consideration of all schools that are not already so governed. But, till quite exhausted, do not let it drop, but continue to think (and act) on it till some practical result is produced.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE IRISH CHURCH BILL.
At an influential MEETING of PROTESTANT NONCON-FORMISTS of various denominations held at the Cannon-street Hotel, London, July 2nd, CHARLES REED, Esq., M.P., in the chair, it was Moved by the Rev. HENRY ALLON (Independent), seconded by the Rev. WILLIAM BROCK, D.D. (Baptist), and resolved—

1. "That believing that the bill for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, now before Parliament, is substantially in harmony with the resolutions of the House of Commons last session, and with the wishes of the country, as emphatically expressed at the general election, and that it has resolved the sanction of the great majority of the nation;
this meeting regards with great concern the attempts now being made in the Upper House of Parliament to make such changes in the measure as will frustrate, in the most important respects, the purpose of its framers, and will subvert the principles which have been deliberately adopted by the committees as the only basis on which a settlement of the question can be satisfactorily effected."

Moved by W. W. POCOCK, Esq. (Wesleyan), seconded by the Rev. JOHN EDMOND, D.D. (United Presbyterian), supported by the Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN (Unitarian), and resolved—

2. "That the meeting strongly deprecates all proposals which have in view, not the equitable satisfaction of existing personal interests, but the re-endowment of the disestablished Church. That it objects to them the more strongly because they necessitate corresponding concessions to the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian bodies—concessions which aim at establishing equality by means, not of impartial disendowment, but of the pernicious policy of indiscriminate endowment. That the adoption of such suggestions by the Legislature would, in the judgment of this meeting, have the effect of prolonging the controversy which the bill was intended to close, and would inevitably lead to results fraught with evil, not to Ireland alone, but to the interests of the entire kingdom."

Moved by JOSEPH COOPER, Esq. (member of the Society of Friends), seconded by the Rev. JOHN HOPKINS, LL.D., F.R.S. (Independent), supported by the Rev. T.
W. PENROSE (Primitive Methodist), and resolved—

3. "That having regard, not merely to the proposed amendments, but to the opinions expressed by influential Peers in favour of the principle of concurrent endowment, this meeting deems it to be of the utmost importance that Her Majesty's Ministers and the Liberal party in the House of Commons should be assured of the earnest desire of those who have hitherto supported the bill, that it should not pass in a form which would disappoint their just expectations, and that Nonconformists should adopt immediate measures for giving expression to their sentiments, and of bringing them to bear with effect upon the Legislature."

HANDY NOTES FOR PROTESTANTS, on the Rise, Progress, and Principles of the Church of Rome. By H. J. PRESTON.

London: Trubner & Co., 60, Paternoster-row.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A Synod has been sitting in Leipsic, consisting of about eighty rabbis, professors, and other lay representatives of various Jewish communities, the chief purpose of which is to induce the authorities to found either special departments or "faculties" for Jewish theology at the German universities, or to endow special chairs for that purpose. The Synod was opened by Professor Lazarus, of Berlin, on the 30th of June, the anniversary, as he pointed out, of Reuchlin's death, who first proposed to the Emperor Maximilian, instead of burning the Talmud, to found Talmudical chairs at different universities. The first resolution pronounced "Judaism to be in fullest accordance with the principles of modern state and society, the absolute equality of all men, the equality of all before the law, their equality of duties and rights in relation to the State, and the fullest liberty of the individual in his religious convictions, being the fundamental principles of Judaism." It is presumed that the Berlin University will open the first "Faculty for Jewish theology." It is needless to add that the new foundation is not intended by the promoters for Jews, but for students of Jewish science, theologians, and philologists of all shades.

It is reported in Paris that the French Ambassador at Rome has been asking questions concerning the manner in which his Government is to be represented at the approaching Council. Other Governments also, it is said, are beginning to express dissatisfaction at being kept entirely in the dark respecting matters which concern the religious interests of themselves and their subjects. Even Bishops appear to be no better informed than the secular authorities as to the future proceedings and intentions of the approaching assembly, which are kept a close secret by the Roman Commissions intrusted with their direction. There is a report also of a joint interpellation about to be addressed to the Papal authorities on the above subject by the Catholic Powers.

Repairs are being made in the church of St. Lambert, at Munster, which necessitate the demolition of the old tower at the top of which John of Leyden, the Anabaptist fanatic of the 16th century, immortalised by Meyerbeer in his opera of "The Prophet," was exposed in an iron cage till he died, and which is preserved to the present day.

A letter in the Bourse Gazette of St. Petersburg states a project is entertained of establishing an orthodox Russian Episcopal see at Pekin, the capital of the Chinese Empire. Thus would be realised the idea formerly conceived by Peter the Great, but which it has been found impossible hitherto to execute.

On Sunday last, the Rev. Thomas Binney, the well-known Independent minister, the author of "How to make the best of both worlds," and other works, formally retired from the charge of the King's Weigh House congregation, to which he has so ably ministered for forty years. He still, however, retains a nominal and honorary connection with it, and will preach occasionally.

The University Tests' Bill has passed the Commons, and now awaits the mercies of the Lords. We fear there is too much reason to suppose that it will be sacrificed to the dislike which they entertain to all liberal measures, especially now when they have just been compelled to submit to a constitutional defeat.

Dr. Manning has just opened a new Roman Catholic Chapel in Kensington, which "is to be the temporary cathedral church of the diocese."

It is understood that the Irish Church Bill will be sent down to the Commons on the 16th or 17th inst.

It is not often that we have had occasion to commend the doings of Convocation—indeed, we are not aware that we ever did it before—but we can freely give a word of praise to the Report just issued by the "Committee on Intemperance of the Lower House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury." It is, perhaps, the most valuable contribution which has been made to the solution of what Archdeacon Sandford, the chairman of the committee, justly terms "the great and momentous question before the country, and which, more than any other, affects the welfare of our people." In pursuing their inquiry, the committee communicated, not merely with the Parochial Clergy of the Province of Canterbury, and through them with medical and other authorities of their parishes, but with the governors and chaplains of prisons, and heads of the constabulary throughout Great Britain, with the superintendents of lunatic asylums in England and Wales, with the judges, recorders, coroners, and masters of workhouses throughout England; and they have thus obtained a most important mass of information, bearing on the extent of the evil which is working such fearful ruin in the midst of us, on the direct and indirect causes of it, and on the remedies for it. It is impossible for us here to do more than just mention the nature of the volume, but all who are interested in the welfare of their fellow-countrymen, more especially those in the humbler ranks, will do well to study it, and will find in it much that is deserving of their most serious consideration.

The Rev. Dr. Vaughan, vicar of Doncaster, has been appointed to the Mastership of the Temple.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In noticing a letter of Dr. Davidson, the well-known Biblical critical, objecting to the prosecution of Mr. Voysey, the Pall Mall observes:

"We do not know specifically what Mr. Voysey may have said, but if he has in substance denied or thrown doubt upon any doctrine stated in the three creeds or Thirty-nine Articles, he has done an illegal act, and if he has, he must take the consequences. It does, no doubt, so happen that the Church of England has no doctrine to speak of about the inspiration of the Bible, but it is of the most rigid and unbending orthodoxy upon such points, for instance, as the Trinity and the Incarnation, and the man who denied anything affirmed, say, in the Athanasian creed would most assuredly suffer for it. Upon the whole, there is not much room for doubt that the ordinary action of the courts of law would be quite sufficient to maintain a degree of uniformity of doctrine which would satisfy the great body of the quiet lay people of England, but the quiet lay mass, powerful as it is, is by no means the only body to be consulted. We have in the clergy at least three parties pulling in opposite directions, and utterly, and not altogether unnaturally, opposed to the sort of compromises and the sort of uniformity which lay courts would enforce. This is the true danger of the Church of England. It has a creed—not, to be sure, very complete or definite, but satisfactory enough to steady-going lay people—but this creed, such as it is, satisfies few of the more eager members of the clergy. It is at once too tight and too loose. It allows a man to criticise the Bible with the utmost freedom, but it forbids him to throw the slightest doubt upon propositions which have no authority at all except as inferences from the Bible, and this is only one illustration of the general character of the system. Such a state of things, may, no doubt, last a long time by the mere vis inertia of an established institution which every one likes, but sooner or later it will be found wanting, later, we hope, rather than sooner."

The same paper says:

"It may be as well to call attention to one rather important consideration which has been too much forgotten in our discussions of 'concurrent endowment.' Briefly it is this: We are Protestants for political reasons as well as for reasons of religion. The authority of the Church of Rome is rejected by us because we believe it not only to teach spiritual error, but to be an engine of political mischief—pernicious in its influence over the family, baneful to science and letters, crippling alike to individual freedom and the general liberties of a well-ordered State. In fact, there can be no doubt of this—that as a nation we are Protestants far more for political than for religious reasons; and that thousands of Englishmen are at this hour Protestants in a political sense only. From which it follows that when peers and bishops advocated the Duke of Cleveland's scheme of concurrent endowment lately, they spoke as very liberal religionists, but also as men forgetful of the most positive, deeply-rooted, and unquestionable meanings of their own creed. Thus the Bishop of Gloucester said the other night, 'What we have to decide is which we shall adopt of two very anxious courses, to use no harder expression—we shall have to decide whether it is best to allocate a portion of what must be a residuum fund for religious purposes, as indicated in the amendment, or for purposes of an alien kind.' And then he went on to say: 'Let us deal fairly with the religion whose claims it is proposed to consider. Is there any one in this House who can come forward and say that the Church of Rome does not acknowledge the three creeds which we believe to be necessary to our salvation? Does she not believe that which is the dearest doctrine with some of us, and that in defence of which we would shed our best life's blood—the divinity of our Lord and Master? It may be that she has added to her system much that we consider deplorable, much even that we consider dangerous, but the belief in our Lord, in the four great Councils, and the three great creeds she shares in common with ourselves.' And that is the one-sided way in which the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church has been generally discussed. Now, no doubt the Duke of Cleveland's proposal was not very considerable in its scope, and it was in accordance with what we have been doing for Roman Catholics in Ireland for a long time. But the views of the advocates of 'concurrent endowment' take a much wider range; and if they were carried out fairly, not one million, but several millions, would have to be given for the succour and maintenance of the Roman Catholic Church in this empire. And what we say is that more goes to that matter than 'acknowledgment of the three creeds.' To succour and maintain the Roman Church is to fortify a system which for political reasons alone is rejected as intolerable. Of course we know that we do not now state the whole case, any more than the Bishop of Gloucester did; but since many very bold and generous advocates of concurrent endowment are abroad, it may be as well to remind them that the question does not altogether turn on differences or agreements of Christian teaching."

The preacher at the Chapel Royal, Savoy, on Sunday week alluded to the dissensions of the present day, and told a story on the authority of John Henry Newman. A naval chaplain, he said, who had long been out of the reach of English theological discussion, was eagerly asked on his return home by a partisan, whether his floating chapel was High Church or Low Church. "That," said the chaplain, "entirely depends on the tide."

In Committee on the Irish Church Bill, there was a curious collision between the Bishop of Lichfield and Samuel of Oxford. The former, led away by Mr. Disraeli's ingenious paradox that the Roman Catholic religion is already "established" in Ireland, because it leans upon a foreign potentate, argued for the omission of Clause 2, which disestablishes the Church in Ireland, on the ground that when disestablished it cannot be on an equality with the Roman Catholic Church, which will still be established in the sense of leaning on Rome. As the Spectator says, "for some reason or other, this paradox,—no doubt in itself flimsy enough,—excited great wrath in the breast of the Bishop of Oxford. He came down upon his right reverend brother with astonishing warmth. If Dr. Selwyn had meant it for a protest, he might have chosen, said Dr. Wilberforce, a better form of protesting; if intended for an argument, it was an entirely fallacious one. He was 'lost in astonishment' at hearing that the Roman Catholic Church is at present the Established Church of England, Ireland, and Scotland alike. To say that the disestablishment of the Protestant Church would leave the Roman Catholic Church the only established church in Ireland, was 'nothing more than a play upon words, and trifling with their lordships.' No doubt; but why this specially holy zeal against it? It was Mr. Disraeli's pet argument, and only modestly endorsed by Dr. Selwyn. If Mr. Disraeli had remained Prime Minister, would it have seemed quite so contemptible to Dr. Wilberforce? Might it not have then seemed to Dr. Wilberforce 'trifling with their lordships' to assert anything else?"

The Rev. J. Baldwin Brown, having, in the Daily News, expressed his suspicions that the outbreak of almost fierce antagonism to the Voluntary Principle exhibited by the Lords may be due to something of the same feeling which made St. Paul "exceedingly mad" against the Christians just before his conversion,—i. e., to that last rebellion of the whole nature against a disagreeable conviction which is slowly mastering you in spite of yourself,—the Spectator, animadverting on his letter, concedes thus much to him:

"There has been undoubtedly gained, and quite recently, a wonderful success for the Voluntary principle, just at the very moment when the English world in general thought that the voluntary principle itself, like the society which most adequately represented the voluntary principle, was, if not dead, at least reduced to suspended animation. And certainly it is quite open to Voluntarists to argue that you cannot have better evidence of the vitality of any principle than that when the animation of its supporters seems to have died away, and its cause seems, as it were, to have been lost, it suddenly forces itself into the councils of statesmen as their only door of escape from difficulties otherwise insuperable, their only chance of solving a problem on which the peace and good-will of nations depend. It is quite one sort of victory for a principle to be carried by the vehemence and earnestness of its adherents,—quite another, and a much greater testimony to its intrinsic reasonableness, that it should force itself on the attention of statesmen, even when that vehemence and that earnestness seem to have subsided into comparative indifference."

At the same time, our contemporary, of course, cannot admit that this gain is really due to the positive merits of the voluntary system, but labours to show that it is almost wholly due to its negative merits—that it cuts a knot which it would be difficult and perplexing to untie.

In the same paper we have the following comparative estimate, in some respects by no means a fair one, of the working of Established and Voluntary churches:

"We do not deny some merits to the voluntary principle, especially as contrasted with the principle of episcopally governed Churches with which it is usual, but by no means most instructive, to contrast it. There is, we think, greater danger that the leaven of worldliness, as worldliness is usually understood, will creep into an Episcopal church with great nominal dignities and considerable wealth, than into Voluntary churches. The Bishop of Oxford is not a phenomenon of the precise kind that we should expect from the Independent Church, for instance—but then, neither is the Bishop of St. David's. Against the evil, which is very real and very imminent, of a worldly Church, a Church which thinks more of principalities and powers than of Truth, and which contracts the insincerity natural to that tone of mind,—we must set the evil, which seems to us very much more common in the Voluntary Churches than in the Established Churches, of the intellectual dependence of the religious teacher on the sympathy of a number of people who cannot but be less really alive than he is to the difficulty of the intellectual problems to be solved,—and of the insincerities which spring inevitably out of that tone of mind. Let any honest-minded, wise man read, as we had lately occasion to do, the discussions of the two popular religious assemblies in Scotland,—that of the Established Church and that of the Free Church,—and he will be wonderfully struck by the vast difference of tone in favour of the former. He will see in the discussion of the latter a constant preference for the more exciting, the ruder, the more savage doctrines, as compared with the milder, the more enlightened, the more truly charitable. He will see the influence of the galleries,—of the external congregations appealed to, and on the appeal to whom depends the prosperity of the minister,—very strongly in the one, very slightly in the other. Nay, compare the Roman Catholicism of Ireland itself, with the Roman Catholicism of the country with which, as containing a Celtic people, it is most fair to compare it,—that of France,—and again unquestionably the advantage is greatly in favour of the latter in doctrinal tone and spiritual elevation. Compare, again, the teaching of our Established Church—which is, for the present day, quite needlessly fettered in its doctrine, as the universal movement against the Athanasian Creed shows—with the teaching, excellent as it often is, of the Wesleyan Methodists, and is not the same contrast observable? Is not the former infinitely more independent of ignorant clamour, infinitely more free to speak its calm and deliberate convictions on the highest of all questions, than the eager but dependent priesthood of the latter? We do not deny—we admit—the tendency of this dispassionateness to indifference, of this intellectual independence to apathy, and we see the danger of this tendency. But is it not the less danger of the two, after all? Should we hesitate to prefer the moral influence of the ministry of the Established Church of Scotland to the ministry of the Free Church, taken as a whole. Even admitting, what is very possible, and we think true, that the Dissenting Free Churches of England and Scotland leaven the Established Churches, and save them from decay, is it not also most true that the independence of thought and liberality of mind of the Established Churches of England and Scotland leaven the various Free Churches, and keep them from narrow intolerance, and a servile dogmatism still more dangerous to the national life?"

The English Independent considers the attitude of the Bishops in regard to the Irish Bill to be most humiliating. With a marvellous ingenuity of greediness they have framed every possible amendment by which a large amount of money may be retained for the Church, and they will not object to any gift or concession to the Roman Catholic priests which may cover this purpose.

The Morning Post says:

"The act of spoliation with which the Anglican Church in Ireland was threatened has, by the careful manipulation of the Peers, become one which certainly no longer merits so strong a designation. The axe which the House of Commons proposed to strike at the roots of the tree has been exchanged for the pruning hook, which is applied with the utmost tenderness to the most slender branches. Disendowment has been exchanged for partial endowment—the partiality of which, in the fullest sense of the term, none will feel inclined to question. Not only will the new Church not be thrust forth on the world absolutely naked, but it will be clothed with a solicitude that ought to banish all fears respecting the success with which it will sustain every chilling blast to which it may be exposed."

The Record, with reference to the Bishop of Oxford's conduct on the Irish Church Bill, says:

"His lordship's subtle ingenuity blinds him to the damage done to his Christian profession and Episcopal influence, as well as to his weight in the House, by the lubricity with which he so easily shifts his ground. He denounced Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions when Mr. Disraeli was Premier, and at that time strove to uphold Mr. Disraeli's mistaken policy in resisting a worthless and unworking Suspensory Bill. Now that Mr. Gladstone is Premier, he adopts, with marvellous alacrity, the present Premier's bill disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church."

In a letter to the same paper, the Rev. J. C. Ryle, a leader among the Evangelical party, writes that if the new policy of "levelling up," or "concurrent endowment" is carried out, he can only say, "Quos Deus vult perdere prius dementat;" and adds:

"If English statesmen are going deliberately to endow Roman Catholic priests; if the Church which burned our Reformers, kept back the Bible from our forefathers, and held this country for centuries in superstition and irreligion, is to be paid, encouraged, and supported by Act of Parliament, there is an end of our Protestant Constitution. If this does not offend God, and provoke His judgments, I know not what will."

Some Presbyterian convicts in the prison of Spike Island objected, so their chaplain reports, to the use of hymns in the lieu of David's Psalms, because these were "inspired," and the hymns not, On which the Telegraph observes:

"In these days of Colenso and other critics, it is gratifying to find such superior testimony upon a disputed point; and if the incarcerated gentlemen would go further, and give us their unbiassed opinion on other parts of the Old Testament, we should all profit. For instance, in the twentieth chapter of Exodus there is a text still occasionally quoted, 'Thou shalt not steal.' Might we ask our Christian brethren whether that passage ever came under their notice, and whether the fact was never borne in upon them, that it also was 'inspired?' We are, perhaps, ungrateful, when we wish that they had noticed it; for, if they had, we might have been deprived of the inestimable value of their convictions—in every sense of the word. Some people, no doubt, will be gratified to find that even convicts have scruples; others will see in the incident a curious proof that men may cling to dogma long after they have lost the spirit of all creeds."

The Pall Mall is of opinion that the Lords have handsomely repaid themselves for their self-denial in reading the Irish Church Bill a second time. They have so changed the measure that when it gets back to the Commons its own parents will hardly know it. From first to last the alterations have been strictly homogeneous. Their single object has been to secure as much public money as possible for the Irish Church. It is quite impossible that the Government should accept amendments avowedly framed on this principle. To make the Church Body a present of the glebe houses and to allow it to retain the royal grants in Ulster, as well as the special income-tax hitherto paid by Irish incumbents to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, is to re-endow it to the extent out of the public purse. Those persons who do not admit that the property of an Established Church belongs to the nation, or who see no injustice in appropriating this property to the use of a religious society comprising a small minority of the people, will see nothing to find fault with in this result. But they may, perhaps, see that to those who take the opposite view of these matters acquiescence in such amendments is a thing not to be thought of. It would be better to withdraw the bill altogether than to build what is designed to be the final settlement of this great question on a foundation of sand. If the bill retains its present shape, the Anglican Church will still, though to a less extent than formerly, be subsidised from State funds, and in so far as this is the case the substance of an Establishment will remain.

SOUTHAMPTON.—On Sunday morning, a funeral sermon was preached at the Church of the Saviour, for the Rev. R. B. Aspland, by his attached friend and fellow-student, the Rev. Edmund Kell.

CRENCHESTER.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached on the 27th ult. by the Rev. H. Austin, when satisfactory collections were made; and on Thursday, the 1st inst., the scholars had their annual treat at Chesterton, and had ample amusements.

AMERICAN NOTES.

Mr. Theodore Tilton has been making some remarks on the decline of culture among our American brethren which, while overstated, the Liberal Christian thinks have some truth in them, which should stimulate every Unitarian minister to such intellectual exertions as shall rob all such statements of even the shadow of a foundation. Speaking of Boston he says:

"It will scarcely be claimed by any one that the Unitarian clergy have kept up their traditions of culture. They no longer lead the literature of the country, nor even of New England, as they once claimed to do. They have become more evangelical, more hard-working, more practically efficient, but far less cultured. They have become assimilated to the Methodists or to the Universalists, whom they were formerly wont to satirise. The most prominent among their younger men, Mr. Hepworth, is called the Spurgeon of his denomination; but Spurgeonism does not commonly stand for culture. Even their more scholarly men, as Clarke and Hale, are not now students so much as workers—all which, of course, is to their praise. Their leading periodical is confessedly breaking down—killed in the house of its friends at the last convention. The Unitarian body, as such, is ceasing to have any very prominent influence on the thought or literature of the country; while its practical activity was perhaps never greater."

During a discussion upon extempore preaching, a minister, whose salary was small and usually in arrears, remarked that he had often preached without notes, but had never spoken with so much ease and satisfaction to himself as when he had a few greenback notes in his pocket.

Mentioning that the Rev. Dr. Ryder has returned from Europe in improved health, but with all the lower part of his face hid beneath a thick, heavy beard, the Liberal Christian observes, "bare-faced ministers are fast going out of fashion."

The Rev. Olympia Brown has been preaching in various Unitarian churches in the State of New York, and is said to have been cordially received and favourably listened to everywhere.

In a notice, too, of the services of the "Rev. Mrs. Hanaford," who has been the settled minister of the Universalist church in Hingham, Massachusetts, for nearly three years, it is stated that "the people are united under her ministry, and active in every good work, as they never have been under any man minister." A lady who went to hear her says, "The house was crowded, there being a plentiful sprinkling of snowy-haired men and women in the congregation, and the people hung on the utterances of the pulpit with deep interest. I really was unable to see where this clergywoman failed to come up to the full measure of a clergyman." "She has deliberately chosen the ministry for her profession, is regularly ordained and settled, baptises, attends funerals, assists at ordinations, solemnises marriages, and in fact performs any and every duty that devolves on a man minister."

Dr. Bushnell's "Woman's Suffrage: The Reform against Nature," has made its appearance, and is an interesting, as well as curious, contribution to the literature of the Women's Rights question. He admits that the weaker sex have wrongs, the result in a large degree of that tendency to oppression which marks all power. Among these wrongs he places the inequality of legislation as regards woman's property; her exclusion from modes of employment that are as appropriate, or even more so, to women as to men; and the separation of the sexes in education. If the sexes were educated together, he thinks that women would gradually escape the disabilities under which they at present labour; and he would have all legal restrictions to their entrance on trades and professions removed. They would then naturally assume a large proportion of the work of educating the young; they would practise medicine in all branches except surgery; they would probably practise that portion of the law which consists "in silent, indoor office-work—the investigation of authorities and citation of precedents," and the drawing of "deeds, contracts, and pleadings," and the exercise of the functions of notaries and clerks of courts of record. In the church, they would properly become deaconesses, as they did in the primitive days; and Paul's objection to their speaking in assemblies for worship—"the shame" of it—being no longer operative, they would also act as ministers or exhorters. In literature, of course, they would shine as they do now. They would, too—their business faculties being sharpened—become clerks, book-keepers, and the like; and, ere long, managers of hotels, bank-tellers, brokers, actuaries of insurance companies, private bankers, type-setters, and overseers of printing. In such positions Dr. Bucknell expects and desires to see them. Then proceeding to show that all claims to the suffrage based on the assumption of the existence of "natural rights" are simply a delusion, he gives his reasons, not always very logically, why women should not possess political power. The chief of these, in which he somewhat begs the question, is, that they were not "created or called to govern." This he proves, first, by their physical conformation; secondly, by the assumptions that "masculinity carries in the distribution of sex the governmental function;" that women were born with a sense of man's superiority, and enjoy it; that there is nothing degrading in woman's subordination; that "force, by its own nature, always and of course subordinates beauty;" that women agitating for the right of suffrage are "in fact voting to be weighed in the gross weight-scales of force, making nothing of that higher, finer nature by which God expects it of them to flavour the world;" and that "the male and female natures together constitute the proper man, and are therefore both represented in the vote of the man." Among the probable consequences of female suffrage the Doctor thinks will be, first, that woman will grow, perhaps, "taller, brawnier," and more certainly "thinner, sharp-featured, lank, and dry;" secondly, she will grow coarse and violent and excitable; thirdly, she will take part in political corruptions "with prone-minded human frailty;" fourth, her presence will increase the disorder and indecency attendant on the working of the electoral machinery; fifth, her presence in political assemblies, and especially legislative assemblies, will introduce into them a moral disorder, the nature of which he indicates by citing "the Bourbon courts" in illustration; and, lastly, that her participation in politics will increase the tendency to treat marriage as a temporary partnership, dissoluble at the pleasure or convenience of the parties. These certainly are formidable objections. As a remedy for the difficulty which women find in getting married, the Doctor proposes that they should make advances with this view towards men, or, as he expresses it, "so far mitigate the present ironclad modesty as to let feeling feel its way and carry on its own courtship;" and he even suggests the formation of an organisation of some kind, apparently in connection with churches, in the nature of a matrimonial brokerage, to make matches, "working only for names that are given, or by friends suggested, and presuming only under strictest bonds of secrecy to suggest, commend, and prepare acquaintance in the ways of proper delicacy." On this the Nation, as it seems to us truly, remarks, "it is curious that a writer who thinks woman's exclusion from a large number of the most important fields of labour is purely conventional, and that her exclusion from the franchise is natural, should nevertheless doubt whether the basis of the custom which dooms marriageable women to wait for men to woo them is not largely artificial. There is probably no incident of woman's condition which is more clearly natural than her passivity in all that relates to marriage. In waiting to be wooed, she not only complies with one of the conventional proprieties, but obeys what appears to be a law of sex not amongst human beings only, but among all animals. There is no peculiarity in her circumstances with regard to which sentiment and physiology are in such complete concord. So that there is, in our opinion, not the least hope that her facilities for getting married can be increased by any special exertions on her part towards that end. She must look in other directions for improvement in her lot; and if there be growing reluctance on the part of men to marry, there must be growing exertions on the part of women to become independent of marriage. Nay, we think it not at all unlikely that nothing will do so much towards solving the marriage problem as the increasing ability of women to dispense with it as a means of support. For the same reason that women with fortunes now find it easier to get husbands than women without them, women with trades and professions will find it easier to marry than women who can only fold their hands and wait, and will raise the position of the whole sex in men's eyes by diminishing the pressure at the matrimonial gate."

At a recent meeting, speaking of Christianity as natural and universal, Mr. Emerson said:

"It is the praise of our New Testament that its teachings go to the honour and benefit of humanity—that no better lesson has been taught or incarnated. Let it stand, beautiful and wholesome, with whatever is most like it in the teaching and practice of men; but do not attempt to elevate it out of humanity by saying 'this was not a man;' for then you confound it with the fables of every popular religion; and my distrust of the story makes me distrust the doctrine as soon as it differs from my own belief. Whoever thinks a story gains by the prodigious—doing something out of nature—robs it more than he adds. It is no longer an example—a kindly, heart-stirring hero; it is removed out of the range of influence with thoughtful men. I submit that in sound frame of mind we read or remember the religious sayings and oracles of other men, whether Jew or Indian, or Greek or Persian—that we read and remember them only for friendship, only for joy in the social identity which they open to us, and that these words would have no weight with us if we had not the same conviction already. I find something stingy in the unwilling and disparaging admission of these foreign opinions—opinions from all parts of the world, by our churchmen, as if only to enhance by their dimness the superior light of Christianity. You cannot bring me too good a word, too dazzling a hope, too penetrating an insight from the Jews. I hail every one with delight as showing me the riches of my brother, my fellow soul, who would thus think and thus greatly feel. Zealots eagerly fasten their eyes on the differences between their creed and yours, but the charm of the study is in finding the agreements, the idealities in all the religions of men. I am glad to hear each sect complain that they do not now hold the opinions they are charged with. The earth moves and the mind opens. I am glad to believe society contains a class of humble souls who enjoy the luxury of a religion that does not degrade; who think it the highest worship to expect of heaven the most and the best; who do not wonder that there was a Christ, but that there were not a thousand; who have conceived an infinite hope for mankind, and believe that the history of Jesus is the history of every man, written great and large."

DR. THIRLWALL ON SACRILEGE.

In a letter to the Spectator, the Bishop of St. David's, who was twitted by his brother of Oxford for not believing in such a sin as "sacrilege," thus explains more fully the remarks which he made in the House of Lords on the subject, as applied to the diversion of Church property:

"I believe that if I say sacrilege is the diverting of things set apart for pious uses to purposes of an essentially different kind, I shall be giving a definition which perfectly coincides with the popular notion, while it includes every kind of sin which really falls under the same head. But I mean the word things to be taken in the largest sense, so as to comprehend all that belongs to persons not only outwardly, as their property, but inwardly, as the faculties of their nature. I assume that the elevation of the human spirit to a conformity of mind and will with the Father of Spirits is the highest purpose to which any instrument or agency can be devoted. Whatever is designed to minister, directly or indirectly, to this end is set apart for a pious or sacred use; and the diverting of it to one entirely different, as the satisfaction of a brutal appetite, is sacrilege. In this sense the phrase 'robbery of God,' does not grate upon my ear or shock my understanding. I also assume that public worship is one and a peculiarly efficacious means of promoting that elevation. And then all its accessories and material appliances, however in themselves utterly insignificant and incapable of producing such an effect, may yet in their measure contribute to the general result, and by association acquire a kind of reflected and relative sanctity which may be the subject of a sacrilegious desecration. In the eyes of the idolater, the iconoclast who demolishes his idols is guilty of most atrocious sacrilege; but he may be animated by the most fervent piety and the purest charity. The ritualist believes that the splendour of a gorgeous ceremonial is highly conducive to the end of public worship. To the puritan it appears to have a directly opposite tendency. According to my definition, the guilt of sacrilege is incurred by all the acts to which the name is popularly attached. But it is contracted in a far higher degree by others to which the name is never applied. The offence of the robber who plunders a church is light and venial in comparison with that of the clergyman or the schoolmaster who makes a sinecure of his office, that he may enjoy its emoluments without fulfilling any of its duties. But there are cases much more difficult and complicated, in which a question may arise as to the application of the word 'sacrilege.' We know that uses which were once pious, as those of the monastic endowments, may, partly through an error in the original design, partly through change of circumstances, lose their character, and become injurious to the interests which they were intended to promote. Is it, then, sacrilege to divert the funds set apart for those uses to others, by which the object is attained in a different way, as was done, though unhappily only in a very few instances, at the Reformation with the property of the monasteries? According to my definition, the real sacrilege would have consisted in retaining the old abuses, which robbed God of all the benefit that a better employment of the funds would have yielded to man. But a case still more difficult and complicated arises when a disposition of Church property not liable to this objection, but productive of much good, is nevertheless found to be at variance with the welfare of the community, and to endanger its safety. Whenever such circumstances arise, it seems clear that, on the principle of my definition, all private and particular interests, though in their several spheres each of the highest order, must give way to that which is the common ground in which they all take root and find their sustenance. Whether such circumstances have actually arisen in the case of the Established Church in Ireland is a totally distinct question; and even if the fact be admitted, the right or best mode of dealing with them becomes a most perplexing problem, on which wise and good men may take different views; but which cannot be brought nearer to a solution by denunciations of sacrilege, or by a repetition of texts which—to say nothing of a leap in the dark out of the old dispensation into the new—are utterly irrelevant, unless they are supposed to contradict some of the clearest passages in the Bible."

THE LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

A NEW and keen interest has been aroused about the Irish Church Bill since its transmission to the House of Lords. Majorities of a hundred or so are apt to become monotonous when they recur night after night with unerring certainty, but no one can complain of monotony in the more recent aspects of the struggle. Nor will it do to take the tone of indifference to the proceedings of the Lords, which some of our contemporaries have affected. It is not a merely nominal power which is wielded by the Upper House, and it will not do to reckon it as nil, however inevitably it must succumb to the will of the people if things came to an absolute and final conflict. It is seldom in political history that such absolute and final conflicts occur, and at any less critical stage the Lords possess a substantial and effective power. Their power, however, is a power of modification rather than of veto, and, therefore, though we rejoiced that the second reading was passed by so large a majority as 33, we have felt that that vote was but the very beginning of the real difficulties through which the measure had to pass. There is a well-known character in one of DICKENS'S stories, who, whenever he has been dissuaded from some piece of egregious extravagance, reckons the amount which he thus fails to spend as so much gained—an imaginary balance in hand upon which he may draw freely. We were afraid that the Peers might thus account the discretion with which they abstained from coming to absolute rupture by throwing out the bill, as a stock of accumulated merits, on the strength of which they might do anything else they liked. Certainly this appears to have been very much their feeling, and by the time the bill has passed through a few more stages of emendation, it seems likely to be pretty much in the condition of the Irishman who complained that he had been a very handsome child once, but had been changed at nurse.

As we have always confined our comments to the religious aspects of the question, we shall not discuss the amendments in detail. When a body of men have begun by taking the high ground that to give up the Irish Establishment on any terms whatever would be to act the part of JUDAS, it is not a very edifying spectacle to find them by and by discussing whether the terms shall be thirty pieces of silver, or thirty-one. It raises uncomfortable doubts as to the sincerity of their previous protestations, and the whole question passes out of the realm of religious interest. We must profess our own indifference as to the precise period when the bill shall take effect, or the exact compensation which this or that class of persons affected by it shall receive.

One amendment, indeed, appeared fraught with serious religious mischief, we mean that for concurrent endowment. The Duke of CLEVELAND, wishing to secure to the disestablished clergy their parsonages and glebes, had proposed, as a counterpoise, to give parsonages and glebes to the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians, and if the Lords had agreed to this, it would have greatly complicated the prospects of the measure. For, alike in Parliament and in the country, there are a considerable number of those who have accepted Mr. GLADSTONE'S measure, whose original preference was for levelling up, and who still have some lingering fondness for such a scheme. The Peers however have, as it seems to us, overreached themselves. The Duke of CLEVELAND was persuaded to divide his proposition into two parts, and then, when he had himself voted with the rest for the first part, to leave the parsonages to the clergy, the majority threw him overboard on his second part, and refused to allow the equivalent concession to the other churches. In so doing, however, they have been too clever—exactly by half—and have themselves deprived their amendment of any danger by cutting away the proviso which alone could have given it a moment's chance of acceptance. Concurrent endowment has been used to carry a little advantage to the clergy, and then has been summarily despatched by its temporary allies. We are perfectly content. The advantage to the clergy will certainly not be allowed, and concurrent endowment will be heard of no more. We are sure that those who sincerely looked to such a scheme as a solution of the difficulties of Episcopalian ascendancy must have had their eyes a little opened to the value of the alliance which Irish Churchmen have of late been cultivating with the Ulster Presbyterians.

We deeply rejoice that this insidious danger has been thus averted. We have all along sincerely believed that Protestantism will never put forth its real strength—will never do justice to its own latent religious vitality—until it is loosed from all these enfeebling trammels of State endowment and cast upon its own resources. Our own congregations in Ireland are fair examples both of the advantages and disadvantages of being bolstered up by the State. To some few of them the deprivation of Regium Donum may be well-nigh extinction; but to all of them it has been like a millstone round their necks, and we are convinced that the very effort which its loss must necessitate (and for which we rejoice to see they are already manfully preparing) will stimulate their whole life into new activity and larger beneficence. They may make rather less show as an Ecclesiastical corporation (though we do not believe they will), but they will be stronger and freer than ever before for the great religious work which lies around them.

THREATENED EJECTMENT OF A MINISTER.

A CASE has just occurred which illustrates the danger of churches, built by the munificence of individuals, being left in private hands and not put in trust. Some forty years ago Mr. William Grant (the original of one of Charles Dickens's Brothers Cheeryble) built a chapel for the Scotch Presbyterians at Ramsbottom, near Bury, in memory, we believe, of his mother. Since that time the Rev. D. McLean has been the minister. At the meeting of the Lancashire Presbytery on Tuesday last, the Rev. J. C. Paterson brought forward the fact that a notice had been sent to the Rev. D. McLean in the following terms:

"To the Rev. Andrew McLean, Bolton-street, Ramsbottom.

"I, the undersigned, John Domett, as agent for and acting on behalf of William Grant, Esq., the owner of St. Andrew's Church, Ramsbottom, hereby give you notice that it is the intention of the said William Grant to terminate your employment by him as pastor of the said church at the expiration of three calendar months from the service on you of this notice; and that from and after the expiration of the said period of three calendar months the stipend of £200 per annum, heretofore paid you by the said William Grant, will cease to become payable or to be paid.—Dated this 29th day of June, 1869.

"JOHN DOMETT."

Mr. Paterson said that so far from Dr. McLean having been employed by Mr. Grant as pastor of the congregation, the Doctor received a call from the congregation on the 23rd March, 1830; that call was signed by 143 members of the congregation, the descendants of whom were still under Dr. McLean's charge. Further, they knew that the church was built by the late Mr. W. Grant, as a token of gratitude to Almighty God for the great measure of prosperity which he had had vouchsafed to him in England, and that it had been used without let or hindrance ever since the congregation removed out of the old chapel. It was a very strange thing, after 40 years of possession such as he had described, that an individual should claim the chapel as his property. The ownership of the church would, of course, be determined by a court of law, but to his mind it was most unwarrantable to state that it was the intention of Mr. William Grant to terminate Dr. McLean's employment by him as pastor of the church. It was decided the other day that Congregational ministers held their livings at the will of the congregation; that a majority of the congregation, with reason or without reason, from any cause or no cause, could dismiss a minister from his pastorate. He had no doubt that the Presbytery would resist such conduct, and that they would support Dr. McLean in any controversy that might hereafter arise.

After a brief discussion, a committee was appointed to advise with the minister and session of congregation in reference to the steps that it might be necessary to take to sustain the rights of Dr. McLean and his congregation, and to vindicate the spiritual independence of the Presbyterian Church.

THE CHURCH OF A MINORITY.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

By rather a singular coincidence, just at the time when the disestablishment of the Irish branch of the Anglican Church is under consideration the very same question is raised in a distant quarter of the British Empire. It appears that in Jamaica the "Clergy Act" on which the Church Establishment rests, will expire at the end of the current year; and as the island is now under Crown government, it falls in the last resort on the Colonial Office to determine whether that Establishment shall have a new lease of existence or not. Such, at least, we understand to be the view of those gentlemen who waited on the Colonial Secretary the other day, to advocate the cause of "voluntaryism."

The history of the Church of England in Jamaica (and other parts of the West Indies also) is curious and instructive, because it really illustrates the principles which lie at the root of this great matter elsewhere. If in any case the policy of establishment was justifiable, and might have been expected to be beneficial, it was in that of the West Indies. They were inhabited by a small number of whites for the most part attached to that Church, and a multitude of slaves scarcely rescued from paganism. Among these the ministrations of appointed and authorised teachers might be expected to counteract, as far as any religious ministrations could counteract, the evils of barbarism and of slavery. With this view parishes were constituted, a regular clergy created, episcopal supervision provided, partly at the expense of the colonial community, but not without assistance from the mother country. The experiment commenced under circumstances widely different from that which has just come to an end in Ireland. In this last country a large majority of the people, claiming equality of treatment, were postponed in religious matters to a mere minority. In the West Indies the mass of the people belonged to an inferior race, whether made so by nature or through slavery. They were new and very imperfect converts from paganism, and the system of tutelage under an established faith was that which seemed a priori best adapted for their condition. Everything, in short, promised as well for the attempt there as it promised ill in Ireland. But the result, after two centuries' experience, has been almost identical in the two cases. Here are the religious statistics of Jamaica, as propounded in the memorial presented to the Colonial Office by the gentlemen in question:

"The population of Jamaica, according to the census of 1861, was 441,264. In 1865, when the Jamaica Establishment was in what may be considered as its normal state, the number of Episcopalian places of worship was, according to the Jamaica Blue-book, 87, the number of sittings 46,434, and the reported attendance, 39,710. . . . At the same period there were reported to be 261 Nonconformist places of worship, capable of containing 127,660 persons, with an average attendance of 87,115 persons. Thus the provision for religious worship made by Nonconformists was three times as large as that made by Establishment; and for every Episcopalian there were more than two Nonconformist worshippers. The Baptists alone had as many places of worship as the Episcopalians, and the Wesleyans nearly the same number. The Nonconformist places of worship have all been built by means of voluntary contributions—partly raised in this country, but for the most part the gift of the native population. The ministers of the Baptist body are wholly maintained by their congregations, and other Nonconformist ministers are partly supported by the missionary societies of this country, but probably to the extent of one-half by those to whom they minister. In the matter of education also the Nonconformists of Jamaica have equally outstripped the Episcopalians; the number of day schools provided by the province being 288, as against 104 provided by the latter; notwithstanding that all but eight of the Episcopalian schools receive State aid, while nearly half the Nonconformist schools have hitherto been unaided by the Government. It is important to add that the Nonconformists of Jamaica who maintain these religious and educational agencies belong, for the most part, to a race which has but lately been freed from the degrading influences of slavery, and that they still occupy a humble social position. On the other hand, the members of the Church of England comprise most of the owners of property, the employers, and the official class in the island. Yet, while the comparatively poor majority of the population of Jamaica cheerfully provide for the maintenance of religious institutions at their own cost, the Church of the wealthy majority is supported partly from Imperial funds, but chiefly out of the island revenues, and is placed in a position of legal superiority. Altogether the stipends and allowances of the Jamaica Establishment amounted to £37,378 a year, of which £30,278 was furnished from the taxation of the island, and £7,100 was paid from the English Consolidated Fund. The total ecclesiastical expenditure was still larger, inasmuch as the church repairs and other church expenses were also paid out of the island revenues; these additional charges amounting to from £8,000 to £9,000 a year."

The Bishop of Kingston has written to a newspaper, in which this memorial appeared, to correct some of these numerical details. But his corrections, if well founded, are so slight as to leave the substantial case unimpaired. All the rhetoric expended at meetings of the Propagation of the Gospel Society cannot alter it. We have it on no less an authority than that of the Archbishop of Canterbury that "the true criterion of a Church is whether it fulfils its functions." Here is a Church which obviously does not fulfil them. It is the chosen Church of a class, not of the people. Its ministers belong to a class, and minister to a class. They had not one word of commiseration, that we remember to have seen recorded, for the sufferings of the four hundred Jamaicans who were put to death lately in vindication of colonial justice. In all this they sided with their class, and in accordance with strong class opinion; but that class comprised only a section of the population.

Of course it may be alleged, as it often has been alleged, that it is the fault of the coloured people themselves if they will not avail themselves of the sober ministrations of the clergy who are set over them by authority and paid for by themselves; that it is their fault, and still more the fault of zealous missionary bodies in England, if the rant of ignorant enthusiasts commands their approval and interests their imagination more than the Liturgy and sermons of orthodox pastors; just as we are told it is the fault of the Irish that they will be Romanists. And there may be some truth, for aught we know, in Anthony Trollope's jest, that "the negroes love best that class of religion which allows them to hear the most of their own voices; they are, therefore, fond of Baptists, and fonder of the Wesleys than of the Church of England." And, for our own parts, we have on various occasions fully admitted the truth that a Church may do much good by its example, and by the influence of its ministers, among those who persist in refusing their adherence to it. But no considerations of this kind can long justify, in the eyes of modern statesmanship or in those of abstract justice, the maintenance of the religion of a clear minority at the expense of the rest. In Protestant countries, some establishments have their roots in the choice of the people, as in Scotland, Holland, Switzerland. Others were imposed on the people by the State in a compulsory fashion, but have gradually earned not only the acquiescence but the adherence of the people, or a large majority of them, as in England and in the kingdoms of northern Europe. But a Protestant Church, endowed and planted amidst a people who do not embrace it, cannot subsist as a reality. What particular measures Government may be able or willing to take in the particular case of Jamaica we are unable to say. We cite it only as an instance illustrating a general truth, and it is a very pregnant one.

UNITY CHURCH, CHICAGO.

THE Chicago Republican, of June 21st, reports in full the proceedings at the dedication of Unity Church, of which the Rev. Robert Collyer is the esteemed and honoured pastor. Speaking of him it says, "he began his labours among our poor, as City Missionary of the First Unitarian Church, then worshipping in Washington-street. This was fifteen years ago, and we love to recall it in the light of the event of yesterday, and note how the earnest, active, strong, but unformed man and indefatigable missionary among the Lord's poor has ripened into a power in the American pulpit, commanding by his utterances the admiration of all his audiences, and constantly widening his hold upon his field by a growth that is strong and healthy, because from within, from the wealth and strong native soil of heart and brain." Referring then to the costliness of the edifice which he and his people had raised, the Republican proceeds: "All recollect the story of the two lads boasting of the splendour of their paternal mansions, when one of them triumphantly closed the controversy by exclaiming, 'My father's house has got a bigger mortgage than yours.' So, yesterday morning, among other things, in the superlative to be said of Mr. Collyer's church, that was true which is not true to-day. It had a larger debt than ever rested upon any Chicago church building enterprise. One hundred and thirteen odd thousand dollars of debt is not a pleasant object of contemplation for a church building committee. With the completed church and the monumental debt, they sat down to the work of the dedication yesterday. There was this difficulty about the situation; the debt threatened to hamper the entire policy and aim of the church enterprise. It seemed impossible to adopt any other way out of the difficulty than the stereotype sale of pews, which would be to repeat the stereotype evil of proprietary rights and boundaries in the church accommodations that is fatal to the free church plan. Every man's pew is his castle. The Church must own the pews. They say that Robert Collyer's cheerful view of things well nigh forsook him in the penumbra of this cloud of debt. His building committee could not see the light he saw above and beyond. It was decided that on the issue of the appeals of yesterday must depend whether there should be a sale of pews this week. The morning weather-aspect added to the gloom. The rain fell throughout the forenoon, and threatened to diminish the attendance, but the great audience room was full, and the audience looked delightedly upon the completed labours of the past few days. Everything was in place. On all sides, embowering the pulpit and communion table, dependent from the gas-burners, decking the organ front, the zealous offices of the ladies had given a lavish wealth of flowers, whose beauty and perfume charmed the senses. The house was full to overflowing, and on this occasion tested its great and admirable seating capacity, for never before were an equal number of persons gathered in a church audience-room west of the lakes. There are but two larger church audience-rooms in the country." The various parts of the service were taken by the Rev. C. A. Staples, Rev. Mr. Sampson, Dr. Hosmer, and the Rev. Robert Collyer, and the sermon, an admirable one we need hardly say, was preached by Dr. Bellows. What followed let the Republican tell:

"At the close of the sermon Rev. Dr. Collyer took his place at the desk for what was to be the most characteristic feature of the day. It is said to be a trait of the American mind to measure all values by 'what did it cost?' 'How much will you give?' So now the question to be put to the congregation of Unity and those worshipping with them, in view of the great church, its superb appointments, and its overshadowing debt, was 'How much will you give?' to secure to the church the coveted feature of a free sanctuary. Following the magnificent and eloquent appeal of Dr. Bellows, the first words of the pastor dropped full of feeling. It was now past noon, and the congregation began to be swelled by those dropping in from sister churches just out. A few words stated the case. 'Brethren and sisters, we must have this money.' And then began the rainfall of Christian liberality. First came the solid patter of five thousand dollar subscriptions—five or six of these; then three thousand, twenty-five hundred, one thousand—several of these; and next began a sharp shower among the hundreds, and a rejoicing deluge of fifties, twenty-fives, and tens. It was in this latter portion of these bountiful droppings of this new sanctuary, that the eyes of on-lookers began to glisten at the genuine touches of nature. Some were literal widow's mites; many were scholar's offerings—fathers for their children, donations that may prove their best legacies; husbands for wives, wives for themselves, were among the offerings announced from the desk. And amid the dispensation stood Robert Collyer, as we have seen an orchard tree rejoicing to drink in summer rain. At times this comparison was made all the better; for it was with tears as well as smiles that he held his place for over one hour, the centre of a most extraordinary display of Christian liberality and thank-offerings. Good Dr. Bellows, and his clerical brethren on the platform, from abroad, sat evincing all shades of feeling and delight, and when the boxes were sent round, and the last small donation in currency collected, the whole grand donation reached the sum of nearly SEVENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS, the largest church collection of the kind ever made in the United States."

THE OLYMPIAN RELIGION.

IN his new work, "Juventus Mundi," which may be regarded as supplementary to his "Studies on Homer," Mr. Gladstone thus summarises the Olympian system in its results:—"The history of the race of Adam before the Advent is the history of a long and varied, but incessant, preparation for the Advent. It is commonly perceived that Greece contributed a language and an intellectual discipline, Rome a political organisation to the apparatus which was put in readiness to assist the propagation of the Gospel; and that each of these in its kind was the most perfect that the world had produced. I have endeavoured elsewhere to show with some fulness what was the place of Greece in the providential order of the world; and likewise what was the relation of Homer to the Greeks, and to their part of the divine plan as compared with the relation of the sacred Scriptures to the chosen people of God. I cannot now enter on that field at large; yet neither can I part without a word for the subject of the Olympian religion. In the works of Homer this design is projected with such extraordinary grandeur that the representation of it, altogether apart from the general merits of the poems, deserves to be considered as one of the topmost achievements of the human mind. Yet its character, as it was the first and best set forth in its entirety from the brain of the finisher and maker, is not more wonderful than its subsequent influence and duration in actual life. For during twelve or fourteen hundred years it was the religion of the most thoughtful, the most fruitful, the most energetic portions of the human family. It yielded to Christianity alone, and to the Church it yielded with reluctance, summoning up strength in its extreme old age, and only giving way after an intellectual as well as a civil battle, obstinately fought and lasting for generations. For the greater part of a century after the fall of Constantinople, in the chief centres of a Christian civilisation in many respects degenerated, and an ecclesiastical power too little faithful to its trust, Greek letters and Greek thought once again asserted their strength over the most cultivated minds of Italy in a manner which testified to the force and to the magic charm with which they were imperishably endowed. Even within what may be called our own time the Olympian religion has exercised a fascination altogether extraordinary over the mind of Goethe, who must be regarded as standing in the very first rank of the great minds of the last centuries. The Olympian religion, however, owes perhaps as large a share of its triumphs to its depraved accommodations as to its excellencies. Yet an instrument so durable, potent, and elastic must certainly have had a purpose to serve. Let us consider for a moment what it may have been. We have seen how closely and in how many ways it bound humanity and deity together. As regarded matters of duty and virtue, not to speak of that highest form of virtue which is called holiness, this union was effected mainly by lowering the divine element. But as regarded all other functions of our nature outside the domain of the life to God-ward, all those functions which are summed up in what St. Paul calls the flesh and the mind, the psychic and the bodily life, the tendency of the system was to exalt the human element by proposing a model of beauty, strength, and wisdom in all their combinations so elevated that the effort to attain them required a continual outward strain. It made divinity attainable; and thus it effectually directed the thought and aim of man "along the line of limitless desires." Such a scheme of religion, though failing grossly in the government of the passions and in upholding the standard of moral duties, tended powerfully to produce a lofty self-respect, and a large, free, and varied conception of humanity. It incorporated itself in schemes of notable discipline for mind and body, indeed, of a life-long education; and these habits of mind and action had their marked results (to omit many other greatnesses) in a philosophy, literature, and art which remain to this day unrivalled and unsurpassed. The sacred fire, indeed, that was to touch the mind and heart of man from above was in preparation elsewhere. Within the shelter of the hills that stand about Jerusalem the great Archetype of the spiritual excellence and purification of man was to be produced and matured. But a body, as it were, was to be made ready for this angelic soul. And as, when some splendid edifice is to be reared, its diversified materials are brought from this quarter and from that, according as nature and man favour their production, so did the wisdom of God, with slow but ever sure device, cause to ripen amidst the several races best adapted to the work the several component parts of the noble fabric of a Christian manhood and a Christian constitution. 'The kings of Tharsis and of the isles shall give presents; the kings of Arabia and Saba shall bring gifts.' Every worker was with or without his knowledge and his will to contribute to the work. And among them an appropriate part was thus assigned both to the Greek people and to what I have termed the Olympian religion."

THE CHESTNUTS IN THE RAIN.

BENEATH my chestnut boughs I walk
Amid the plashing rain;
And to myself of those I talk
Who ne'er shall come again.
Who ne'er shall come again on earth,
Howe'er his bowers be green;
Their voice, in sorrow or in mirth,
Unheard, their form unseen.
My sloping roof the rain receives
With branches feathering low;
I hear the murmur of the leaves,
And that is all I know.
The chestnuts are a pleasant place,
In sunshine and in shower;
And O! my God, Thy spreading grace
Is like this chestnut bower.
Let sorrow's rain be fast and fierce,
Yet will I feel no dread;
The sheltering roof it cannot pierce
Which arches overhead.
My leafy covert fails at last,
I feel the dropping rain;
And, thankful for its shelter past,
I seek my house again.
And Thou, O Lord! perchance doth let
Some sorrows pierce, to show
Thy promised joys more perfect yet
Than all Thy grace below.
Thy sheltered walks are safe and sure,
But room is kindly given
For drops that bid us rest secure
Beneath no roof but heaven.

JEWS IN JERUSALEM.

THE Jews at Jerusalem number about 8,000, and are divided into (1) the Sephardim or Spanish Jews, who are said to be descendants of exiles from Spain who arrived in the days of Ferdinand and Isabella; (2) the Askenazim, or Jews of Polish and German origin, subdivided into various sects, such as Perushim or Pharisees, Rhasidim or Pious, who are very enthusiastic and fanatical. They are almost all settlers from Europe. They live on the alms of European Societies, who sometimes in mistaken zeal send poor Jews to their ancient land and support them by subscriptions. Some came of their own accord from a desire to be buried in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, now almost paved over with Hebrew tombstones, where Jewish tradition says the Resurrection and Judgment will take place. The consequence of this artificial colonisation is that the Jewish inhabitants of the Holy City are a degraded set of idle paupers. The funds sent from Europe are much abused by the rabbis, who keep the lion's share for themselves, and the poorer people are content to live on a miserable dole rather than labour for their bread. Schemes have been tried to encourage them to cultivate the soil by obtaining grants of land for them, but the idleness of the Jews themselves has hitherto frustrated this praiseworthy attempt. Sir Moses Montefiore was instrumental in building for them schools, and houses, and a mill outside the City near Birket-es-Sultan, or Lower Pool of Shion, but his charitable efforts have been apparently wasted on so ungrateful and lazy a people. Their outward appearance is not prepossessing; they are generally pale, haggard, and thin. Most of them have fair hair, which they wear in two long twisted curls hanging down over their ears. The poorer people are dressed in long garments of striped stuff with black felt hats on their heads. The rabbis wear loose black robes and a large cap of fur. A very striking sight is the wailing of the Jews at the Temple wall, which any traveller may witness on a Friday afternoon about four or five o'clock. There is a narrow passage along the west side of the Temple area between what are known as Robinson's and Wilson's arches. The wall rises to a considerable height, and the lower part is formed of very large stones, which are supposed to be remains of the Temple. They are much ruined, and the grass and herbage grow in the shattered crevices of the once neatly joined masonry. In these crevices the Jews place little scrolls of parchment on which are written prayers to the Messiah to come and deliver them. Before this wall are gathered a throng of Jews; most of them are women, who wear long mourning veils of linen over their heads. Some are close to the wall kissing the sacred stones and watering them with their tears. Others are seated on the ground reading passages of Scripture to one another, from the Lamentations of Jeremiah and penitential Psalms. All seem to be absorbed in deep and genuine grief. At one end may be seen a party of rabbis rocking themselves backwards and forwards in almost frantic grief, reciting in a wild chant Psalms and passages of Holy Scripture, which are responded to by several boys in a sort of chorus.

VARIETIES OF THE TOURISTS.

As the season has set in when the great London tree drops its abundant crop of tourists over the earth, the Echo describes a few of its more marked varieties:

First, there is the tourist with the Inquiring Mind, who buys all the guide-books in every town he stops at, and astonishes stolid old peasants by asking if the ruins he beholds belong to the 14th or 15th century, and insists on knowing what land lets for an acre, and what is the price of labour, and who lives in that white house on the hill, and how many children he has, and what may be the name of that nobleman who possesses the park over the way? When he visits a ducal mansion, one of these has been known to ask the house-keeper "whether the Duke and Duchess generally sit on sofas or on chairs?" Should he go to the seaside, he will sharply cross-question the old shrimp-woman as to how many shrimps she catches, on an average every hour? While he stops in England this tourist will collect a vast hoard of heterogeneous, wholly useless, but yet sufficiently veracious information. But let him prolong his excursion to Ireland, and betray—as he infallibly will—his thirst for useless knowledge to the first car-man he employs, and by whom he will be handed on to all other car-men in the island, and we shall then have in him another of those well-instructed visitors, crammed to the very eyes with fables, all authoritatively "learned on the spot," and over whose ready concoction and instant reception by the victim, Paddy is at this moment laughing and entertaining his "stand."

Next to the Tourist with the Inquiring Mind, comes the Supercilious Tourist, who views all things as it were from the dome of St. Paul's. Standing on the commanding eminence of metropolitan civilisation, he views "provincial" glories with a benign complacency—not deigning to ask questions, but now and then enlightening the natives by a few words, showing how much better such things are done in London. Entertained by honest, simple people wholly without pretensions, he talks big of his town acquaintances; or, admitted by some chance to a gentleman's house of a class above his own, he shows his appreciation of the labour by asking whether he "can be spared" from a dinner-party?

Next comes the Rash Tourist, who insists on bathing in dangerous rivers, and going out in a boat by himself to sea, and riding horses he cannot manage, and finding his own way across mountains without a guide, and blustering about his prowess on every occasion. And to correspond with him comes the Timid Tourist, a lady, we will assume—though we have known many of the sterner sex—who is for ever haunted by fears of brigands and railway accidents, and hotels on fire, and storms and wrecks, and disasters of every kind. This Tourist is commonly supposed to be identical with the "Unprotected Female," but, in truth, poor old maids have mostly had occasion, ere they came to be old, to learn pretty well how to take care of themselves, or, at least, to be aware that their cries will not always bring the world to their feet. It is the widows, who go about for the first time after their bereavement, generally running, we must say, much as clocks do when the weights are taken off, who are the true Timid Tourists. "Oh, porter, do pray help me. I've got my ticket for Blunderdown, and is this the right platform?—and am I to change at Confaundham? I am sure I shall miss the train, and my canary is so frightened in its cage,—and Fido will be smothered in that horrid dog box,—and my trunks, I'm sure, are in the wrong van, and they have no name on them, and I left my dressing-case, with all my trinkets, in a carriage. I think it was the train which has just gone off; and, oh! hadn't you a dreadful accident on this line a few weeks ago?"

Besides these well-marked types there are many more worthy of study. There is the German traveller, with his spectacles and his anxiety to get at the philosophy of all he sees. There is the Italian, who is made ill by our peppery soups and heavy dishes, and who pleadingly asks for "lesso" and "insalata." There is the English lady abroad, who constantly, in defiance of all experience, persists in asking at every hotel for tea and "any cold meat you have in the house," no foreign cuisine of course ever containing any cold meat at all. Lastly, there is the American Tourist, who looks on England as a very remarkable little island, chiefly to be noticed in history as the place whence his ancestors sailed in the Mayflower for New England—and worthy, therefore, of receiving from him some archaeological inspection. This tourist, when he sees the Thames, tells you exactly how much narrower it is than the Mississippi, and observes that Snowdon would cut a bad figure among the Rocky Mountains. One of these gentlemen being shown a very celebrated English hunting establishment coolly said to his cicerone, "Ah, this is all very well, but in my country we do these things much better." "How?—what can be better in its way?" interrogated the astonished guide. "Why, sir, in my country, when we want to hunt, every man brings his own dog!" Of all sorts, the noble army of Tourists is now setting forth, and we take the opportunity of presenting our best wishes.

EAST ANGLIAN CHRISTIAN UNION.

The second anniversary of this Union was held at Norwich, on Wednesday and Thursday, June 30th and July 1st. Friends from Ipswich, Yarmouth, Lynn, Diss, Royston, and Framlingham were present. The devotional service on Wednesday evening was conducted by the Rev. J. D. Hirst Smyth, and the sermon preached by the Rev. P. W. Clayden, of London, from Rev. ii., 29, "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." On Thursday morning Mr. Clayden again officiated, and gave an excellent discourse.

The business meeting was held in the chapel, C. G. ELLOART, Esq., of Ipswich, presiding. The officers and general committee for the ensuing year were then appointed, and reports from the committee and the congregations of Norwich, Yarmouth, Lynn, and Diss were read by the secretaries. The following expressions of sympathy with the families of the late Revs. John James Tayler and Robert Brook Aspland, moved and seconded respectively by Mr. James Freeman, Revs. J. D. Hirst Smyth, R. Shelly, and J. E. Dunne, were then agreed to:

"That the character of the lately deceased Rev. John James Tayler, comprehending as it did all the attributes of exact scholarship, progressive and reverent thought; with holy living and an ever-widening Christian love, exerts such an unconscious and almost divine power upon all who came within the range of his influence, as to make it most fitting that the members of the East Anglian Christian Union, assembled at their annual meeting, should place upon record their affectionate regard for his memory."

"That this meeting has heard with profound regret of the sudden death of the Rev. Robert Brook Aspland, who through many years was the earnest and fearless advocate of truth and liberty; the genial and kindly friend of every movement calculated to advance the welfare of mankind; and respectfully offers to his afflicted family its tribute of sympathy."

After the business proceedings the members, chiefly consisting of those who came from a distance, to the number of 50, adjourned to the boys' school-room, Calvert, where a substantial luncheon was prepared for them. Three sentiments—"The Queen," "Civil and Religious Liberty," and "The Free Institutions of America"—were spoken to by the Revs. J. D. H. Smyth, R. Shelly, and J. E. Bruce, of Lynn. In the evening, tea was provided in the schoolroom, at which 250 persons were present. The bands of the Brothly Society kindly performed select airs during tea and the evening.

After tea, the Rev. J. H. Smyth presided, and addresses were given by the chairman, the Revs. P. W. Clayden, Shelly, Bruce, Dunne, and R. Shaen; and Messrs. C. J. Eiloart, J. W. Dowson, Alfred Kent, and Hunter. Many friends having to depart by the evening trains, the proceedings were closed at an early hour by the band playing the vesper hymn, followed by a dismissal prayer from the Rev. J. Cooper, of Framlingham.

INTELLIGENCE.

CARMARTHEN: PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE.—The annual examination of the students of this institution was conducted on the 29th and 30th of June, and the 1st inst., by a deputation from the Presbyterian Board, consisting of the Rev. Thomas L. Marshall, the secretary, and Walter D. Jeremy, Esq., barrister-at-law, assisted by the Revs. B. Higginson and Thomas Thomas. The curriculum embraces all the usual branches of a collegiate education, in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German languages, mathematics, mental and moral philosophy, ecclesiastical history, with the evidences of Christianity, and the history and interpretation of the Christian Scriptures. All these studies are pursued, in the several classes, by students of widely differing theological opinions in the most complete harmony, all holding and expressing their several views of theological, as of all other truth, without reserve, and without giving or taking offence, the general result being unity, not of opinion but of sympathy and aspiration, and in the midst of differences of opinion, great and enduring, an ever-growing feeling of mutual respect. Of all free Christian unions, the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, makes the best claim to this honourable appellation, being at once distinctively Christian, while all its members possess and exercise the most complete liberty—while the Christian Scriptures, including four gospels, are regarded as the ultimate authority in respect of all things essentially Christian, they are read and interpreted with the most complete freedom. At the late examination, the prizes, which are not given for excellence in any particular subject, but for diligence and proficiency in the general business of each class, were awarded as follows:—In the senior class, the first to Rees Levi, and the second to John Davies Roberts; in the second class, the only prize to Thos. G. Jones; in the third class, the first to David Evans, the second to John Davies, and the third divided equally between Samuel Griffiths, Walter Jenkins, Evan Thomas, Lewis Williams, and Wm. James; and in the fourth class, the first to Edwd. Hughes, and the second divided equally between Thomas Edwards and David M. Jones.

DUDLEY.—The annual examinations of Parsons' boys' and girls' day schools, connected with the Unitarian Chapel, were held on Wednesday and Thursday last week, and were conducted by the Rev. M. Gibson. The result was exceedingly satisfactory; 43 prizes were distributed to both schools at the close of the girls' examination on Thursday, when about 70 visitors were present, and 155 boys and girls. These schools are very popular in the town, and at the present time 308 children are on the list of applicants for admission. The congregation meet now for the Sunday services in the girls' schoolroom, while the chapel is being altered and improved; and it is fortunate they have a room so well suited in every respect for the purpose. From £700 to £800 will be spent before they re-assemble within the old chapel walls, the whole of the interior being completely altered. It is expected that about four months will be required before the chapel will be ready for the congregation.

LIVERPOOL.—On Wednesday, the 23rd ult., the pupils of the Beaufort-street day schools, numbering about 230, had, on the kind invitation of C. P. Melly, Esq., a treat in his grounds at Riversley, Mosley Hill. They were provided with an abundant tea, and the afternoon, being delightfully fine, was spent in out-door games and sports. On Sunday evening, the 27th ult., a service was conducted in the chapel, by the Rev. J. Shannon, in which the first and second classes of the Sunday-school took part. They joined the congregation in singing the hymns in which they had been previously practised. The Scripture lesson was not read from the pulpit, but by the children. They repeated distinctly and impressively Dr. Channing's catechism, and afterwards several pieces of moral and religious poetry. The sermon was addressed especially to parents (many of whom were present), teachers, and children. This is the first service of the kind that has been attempted in Beaufort-street; and, being successful, it will most likely be repeated either yearly or half-yearly.

OLDHAM.—Last week a farewell tea party was given to Mr. C. W. Robberds, on the occasion of his removing from this neighbourhood. About 160 persons were present. After tea, Mr. John Taylor occupied the chair, and expressed the deep regret with which they parted with Mr. Robberds. As a token of their respect, they had deputed him to present the rev. gentleman with a handsome drawing-room clock, on which was the following inscription: "Presented to the Rev. C. W. Robberds, by the congregation of the Unitarian Chapel, Lord-street, as a token of gratitude for his services as a minister during a period of 16 years. June 30th, 1869." Mr. Taylor also said that, though he had not mentioned it to Mrs. Robberds, the young women of her Sunday-school class wished to present her with an album containing their portraits. - Mr. Robberds said it cost him great pain to leave them; but, believing it to be the will of Providence, he was compelled to submit. Had the climate of the town been as warm and genial as the hearts of the people within it, they would have been content to pass the remainder of their lives among them, but as the life of one, whose life was as dear to him as his own, would be endangered by a protraction of his stay among them, he could see no other path open but to leave. He believed that since he had been in the town he had done some small amount of good. He thanked them kindly for their present. He did not think that they (his wife and himself) would ever root themselves again so firmly in the hearts of so great a number as they had done in this town. He concluded by wishing them God speed and a continuance of the steady progression he had witnessed while he had been among them. Messrs. Brierley Wild, Wrigley, Ashton, James Taylor, J. McFarlan, and Samuel Ogden also added their testimony to the good services of Mr. Robberds. - On Sunday evening, June 27th, the Rev. C. W. Robberds said a few farewell words to his congregation, and took as his text, "That you may all be one in spirit." He exhorted them to continue by their unity and zeal to carry out the true principles of Unitarianism, which it had been the joy and pleasure of his ministry to try and expound to them. The chapel was filled, nearly all present being regular attendants at the chapel. The unanimous call of the congregation for a successor to Mr. Robberds has fallen upon Mr. Arthur Peaton, of the Home Missionary Board, who has accepted the call, and will commence his ministry at the close of the present academical year.

SOUTH WALES.—The annual meetings of the Unitarian ministers of South Wales were held on Wednesday and Thursday, the 23rd and 24th ult., at Capel-y-Groes, near Lampeter. The religious services began on Wednesday evening, the devotional part being taken by the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare. Sermons were preached by the Rev. E. W. Lloyd, Cwmbach, and Professor Evans, Carmarthen. On Thursday the meetings were held in a field near to the chapel, a platform being erected for the ministers. Long before the time for commencing the service the people began to arrive from all parts of the county, within a radius of ten miles, and many were present from greater distances. The devotional service was conducted by the Rev. W. Thomas, M.A., Llandysul, in the morning; the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. T. Williams, (Cyfnewydd-cymmer, from 1 Cor. ii. 2. At the conclusion of the service a discussion was held on "Providence," in which several ministers and laymen took part. Dinner was provided for the ministers in a barn, there being no inn near large enough to entertain them and the friends that joined them. In the afternoon, sermons were preached by the Revs. J. Evans, Gellynion, and R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare. At this service about 1,000 persons were present; there was also a large attendance of ministers. It is worthy of remark that the hay-harvesting throughout the district was largely suspended on account of these services, a considerable number of those present being farmers, who showed their earnestness and sincerity of faith by leaving their pressing work, and many in allowing their servants to leave, in order to attend the annual services.

SYDNEY UNITARIAN CHURCH.—On Thursday, April 8th, the annual business meeting of this congregation was held in the church in Macquarie-street, Mr. A. M. A'Becket, president of the congregation, occupying the chair. Before calling on the secretary and treasurer for their respective statements as to the general and financial condition of the church, the chairman congratulated his hearers on the fact that they had maintained their ground as a congregation for a period of 15 years; for although it could not be denied that the more prominent characteristics of their faith were spreading far and wide, their numbers had always been comparatively few, and their resources comparatively scanty. He urged them to keep in view the high end of their work; to support their minister; to show their approval of his zeal and earnestness by being in their pews as often as possible; to have faith in the truth as well as the ultimate spread of their principles. The report of the treasurer, Mr. Henry Turner, showed an income for the year of £472, and a balance in hand of £5. The report of the secretary, Mr. D. Gilchrist, was unanimously adopted. It expressed the satisfaction of the committee at the condition and prospects of the church, and expressed their conviction that in no previous year of the church's existence had its work been more effectually done. Allusion was made to the new edifice, which the committee thought they would soon be in a position to dedicate to the cause of free religious inquiry in Sydney; to the continued success of the Sunday-school, and other organisations carried on in connection with the church. Their minister was devoting himself to his work with unflinching zeal and self-denying conscientiousness, and it was their duty to give him all the encouragement it was in their power to bestow. The Rev. James Illars returned thanks for the confidence the members of the church were disposed to place in him, and would do his utmost for the cause they all had at heart, and for which he believed there was a bright future in store. The election of officers was then proceeded with.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A TRUTHSEEKER.—No letter can be admitted without the writer's name appearing.

"SUNDAY-SCHOOL GOVERNMENT."

To the Editors,—In your issue of 25th June, an article concerning the misgovernment of Unitarian Sunday-schools appeared. Its tone was one of general condemnation of the present state of our Sunday-school management, as known to the writer; and in your last impression a letter appears endorsing the statements in that article as "undoubtedly correct." Assuming such to be the case, the writer very practically suggests that the question of Sunday-school management should be discussed in your columns. So far as the discussion has gone, certain forms of government have been suggested as being theoretically fitted to meet the difficulties your correspondents have experienced and desire to see removed. A fitting way to give the discussion a useful direction might be, now, to furnish some information respecting the working of a system in many respects similar to the theories advanced by your correspondents.

In the Glasgow Unitarian Church Sunday-school the business of the school is conducted by the office-bearers and a committee of the teachers. The former consists of the superintendent (to which office the minister is appointed), assistant-superintendent, treasurer, and secretary. The office-bearers and committee are elected annually by the teachers at their annual business meeting. The committee consists of twelve members, including the office-bearers, five ladies, the school librarian, and organist. The superintendent is chairman of the committee. By such a combination the various departments of the school are represented on the committee, and their interests taken care of. Business meetings of the teachers are held at the close of each quarter, to which the committee submit a report on the affairs of the school, which embodies reports from the treasurer, librarian, &c. The reports are considered by these meetings, as also the business for the ensuing quarter, when the general character of arrangements are agreed to by the teachers, and the committee are instructed to carry the same into effect. As "H. R.'s" article is pretty exhaustive, so far as difficulties are concerned, I will endeavour to show that what he deprecates is avoided, and what he desires are fairly attained by the system of which the foregoing is an outline. The evil results which follow "the deliberation of questions demanding extreme care, sound judgment, and the tact of experience and skill," "being admitted unreservedly to a miscellaneous body," are avoided by the operations of the school committee, as it is its duty first to consider all important matters, and to be prepared at the teachers' meetings with some practical suggestions. Should any very important business be unexpectedly submitted to one of the teachers' meetings, it would in all likelihood be remitted to the committee to consider, and afterwards report to a meeting of the teachers—all the advantages which "H. R." asserts as resulting from the existence and labours of such a committee as he suggests we have had practical experience of—even the minor evil of unbusiness-like business meetings is got rid of, as those present at meetings such as I have referred to have and always will generally require to choose one of two subjects as a text for their speeches—either the recommendation of the committee, or an amendment or improvement of the same. The latter, when clearly apparent, will be heartily welcomed, and a chairman who knows the duties of his position can always prevent time being spent in "vague, protracted, and tedious discussion" by "talkers." One way of disposing of "talkers" is to assume that their power of speech is the measure of their zeal, and give them a proportionate amount of quiet unostentatious work to do, the rule for them being—as they have laboured so have they a right to talk. From the foregoing it will be seen that from the constitution of our committee the business of all departments has a fair opportunity of being attended to, and from the nature of the reports submitted their condition is regularly made known to the teachers. For the information of the congregation the annual report of the school committee is embodied in the church report, read at the annual business meeting of the church, and printed along with the church report. When any special work presents itself which would require the efforts of more than the members of the committee to thoroughly overtake, the teachers resolve themselves into a committee for that purpose. The "extreme and chronic jealousy" existing between "the governing bodies of the school and of the congregation," referred to by "H. R.," is unknown here. Perhaps this may be due to the superintendent and assistant-superintendent being members of the church committee also; so when any matter affecting the school comes before that body, the course best calculated to promote the interests of both institutions is by this means arrived at. As far as what are termed "results" are concerned, each succeeding school report seems to be more satisfactory than its predecessor; no evil, at any rate, is known to have resulted from our system of management, but possibly much good may be justly attributable to it. As it would be impossible to exhaust this subject in the space at disposal, I have only given a general sketch of our management, which we find very workable, and well fitted to meet our necessities. For the credit of Unitarianism, I would respectfully express the hope that both of your correspondents have unintentionally overdrawn their pictures.—Yours, &c., Glasgow, 7th July, 1869. GEO. JACKSON.

IN REFERENCE

To WINE it is a fact that many persons are pleased if they can say "We import our own." They have an impression that by so doing they not only get it cheaper but purer; and, besides, there is the honour of importing. They overlook altogether that those Foreign Dealers who seek them out are quite aware of this amiable weakness, and do not fail to take advantage of it to add some shillings to the price. To assist the impression they judiciously insinuate that their article is purer than what usually comes to England, and thus they lull that desire for comparison which would soon dispel the delusion.

These remarks apply specially to

GERMAN WINES,

And, in proof of them, we would ask those Gentlemen who buy such Wines to compare our

STILL HOCK AT
20s. with their own importing at 24s.
24s. ditto ditto " 28s.
28s. ditto ditto " 36s.
32s. ditto ditto " 46s. to 48s.
48s. ditto ditto " 54s. to 60s.

SPARKLING HOCK AND MOSELLE.
36s. with their own importing at 42s.
48s. ditto ditto " 54s. to 60s.
60s. and 66s. ditto ditto " 66s. to 80s.

Even supposing the value to be equal there is this advantage in buying here, that any quantity can be got when wanted; whereas, in importing, a quantity of money is locked up, probably for years, in an article not of every day consumption.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Father Gavazzi, the well-known anti-Papal lecturer, in a letter to a friend in the North, says "that a crisis in Italy is approaching," and "that he is preparing for the great crusade."

The Pope has again been venting his holy wrath against the "King of Piedmont." The occasion was his having omitted to present the gold chalice always offered annually to St. Peter by his ancestors; and while he was about it, Il Santo Padre thought he might as well tell him his mind once more about that little usurpation of the Marches, the Romagna, and Umbria.

Some of the Catholic powers are beginning to look with evident suspicion on the forthcoming Ecumenical Council. In a circular despatch issued to all the Bavarian diplomatic agents, Prince Hohenloe, the Minister President, after intimating that there is no question of pure theology requiring the settlement of a Council, says:

"The only dogmatical matter which, as I learn from a certain source, the powers in Rome would like to see decided, and for which the Jesuits in Italy, as well as in Germany and elsewhere, are now agitating, is the question of the infallibility of the Pope. This question, however, far outstrips the boundaries of abstract religion, and belongs to the domain of high politics—inasmuch as coincidentally the power of the Popes over all princes and nations (even heretical) in secular matters would be affirmed and raised to an article of faith."

He then mentions that among the Committees formed is one whose function is to devote itself to State-ecclesiastical subjects, and that the Civiltà Cattolica (the Pope's organ) lately pointed out that one of the duties of the forthcoming Council would be to convert the damnable clauses of the Papal Syllabus of the 8th December into positive canons or conciliar decretals, and proceeds to say:

"Now as these articles of the Syllabus are directed against several fundamental axioms of civil government, as it is defined by modern civilised nations, the serious question arises for the various Governments whether, and in what form, they might find it advisable to warn the bishops on the one hand in their own dominions, and on the other, later, perhaps, the Council itself of the solemn consequences that might follow so calculated and radical a rupture in the relations which have hitherto been established between Church and State. The question further arises whether it would not be wise that the Governments should make a joint protestation through their accredited agents in Rome against such conclusions."

The diplomatic agents are then desired to inquire of the various Governments whether, if an identical note cannot be addressed to the Roman Court, in order not to leave it in uncertainty, a conference of their representatives might not be arranged to undertake the common delivery of a combined counsel. Mr. Stapleton, on Monday, is to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether any information can be given on the course which the German governments will take in this matter.

The case of Dr. Colenso and the Bishop of Capetown has been argued before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but their lordships have reserved their judgment. It will be remembered that Dr. Colenso was obstructed in officiating in St. Peter's Cathedral at Natal. Dr. Gray, as Bishop of Capetown, claimed the land as trustee of the grant; and Bishop Colenso alleged that it vested in him as successor to the see of Natal. The Supreme Court decided in favour of Dr. Colenso, and hence this appeal to Her Majesty in Council.

The carrying of the second reading of Mr. McLaren's Bill, even by the narrow majority of nine, has rendered the friends of the Established Church in Edinburgh at once angry and alarmed. The more extreme members of the party, both in the northern metropolis and throughout Scotland, have been fond of declaiming against the Bill as the thin end of the wedge for disestablishing the Scotch Establishment, in the hope that that would help to defeat it; and they are now chagrined to find that they have been taken at their word in many quarters, and that the general public are beginning to speculate when the turn of the Scotch Church will come next. They are also disappointed at seeing that the Lord Advocate, the principal author of the compromise in 1860 by which the tax was reduced from 10d. per pound to 3d. on the inhabitants in certain parts of the city, voted for the second reading. His statement in the House of Commons that there would be no end of the agitation till something more was done has also galled them.

A case has just occurred which illustrates the deserted state of the Established Church in some parts of the Highlands. At Watnish, in Skye, the parish minister died in May. At the disruption in 1843 the people left the parish church en masse, and at present the congregation consists of an old man, upwards of seventy years of age, and another about sixty years old. The one is nominally clerk of the session, and the other is the church officer. The late incumbent having no congregation, frequently conducted Divine worship on Sabbaths in his manse parlour. Acting on the strength of some expressions of good will towards the Nonconformist Presbyterians by Dr. Macleod and others in the late General Assembly, and of the anti-patronage movement, the parishioners and the two landowners in the district have memorialised the Crown, the patron in this case, to hand over the church to them and their minister, who belongs to the Free Church of Scotland, at a suitable rent, or to sell it to them at a reasonable price. This case, with several of a similar kind, will do much to strengthen the anti-patronage movement.

The Wiltshire County Mirror informs us that the Rev. Mr. Brooke, curate of St. James's, Taunton, before commencing his sermon on Sunday evening, observed that two individuals of the congregation had waited upon him, one counselling him that his sermons were too long, and the other complaining of his rapid utterances. He begged publicly to thank them for the courage they had displayed in boldly coming forward to tell him of his faults, and he would endeavour to profit by their instructions. The rev. gentleman afterwards showed that he had so profited by making his sermon twenty minutes longer than usual.

Last Sunday but one Dr. Ewald baptised at his Hebrew service a young Jewish convert, making, it is said, the thirteenth member of the house of Israel who has been received by him into Christian communion since the commencement of the present year in connection with the Wanderers' Home.

It is announced that a volume of Essays is shortly to be published, written by several eminent Congregational ministers, and designed to represent the theological and ecclesiastical position of the Free Churches. The volume will be edited by the Rev. Dr. Reynolds, President of Cheshunt College. He is to be assisted by Rev. Dr. Stoughton, Rev. R. W. Dale, M.A., Rev. Henry Allon, Rev. J. Baldwin Brown, B.A., Rev. Dr. Mullens, Rev. Dr. Simon, Rev. E. R. Conder, M.A., Rev. J. G. Rogers, B.A., and Rev. R. Thomson.

A bill, introduced by the Primate, has been read a second time in the House of Lords, which provides for the appointment of coadjutor bishops, with a right of succession, to incapacitated prelates. They are to be paid out of the revenues of the Sees which they administer.

Our readers will have learnt from the daily papers the nature of the amendments (?) which the Lords have thought good to introduce into the Irish Church Bill before sending it back to the Commons. It now appears not so much a bill for the disendowment as for the reendowment of that Church. Throughout the debates nothing has been more marked than the eagerness displayed by the Primate and the bishops generally to retain as much of the "filthy lucre" as they possibly could, and they have brought down upon themselves even the Record's rebuke for their readiness to turn round and support the endowment of Popery, of the power of which they have all along professed to be so much afraid, when it came to be a question between this and general disendowment. As regards Lord Stanhope's amendment, conferring glebes upon the Anglican, Roman Catholic, and Presbyterian clergy, which, through a union of Tories and Whigs out of place, was carried by a majority of seven, Mr. Gladstone's answer to the memorial of the Independent Orange Association of Ulster would seem to show clearly what line the Government are prepared to take respecting it. "They will give no countenance to a direct proposal of concurrent endowment," and as a necessary consequence of this resolution they will resist that postponement of the appropriation of the surplus which is "the almost acknowledged road to concurrent endowment at some future time."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In a recent discussion with Mr. Linscott, Mr. Antill, an impugner of Christianity, having asserted that Mr. Spurgeon had declared that "there are infants in hell a span long," Mr. Linscott wrote to him on the subject, and received the following reply:

"I have never at any time in my life said, believed, or imagined that any infant, under any circumstances, would be cast into hell. I have always believed in the salvation of all infants, and I intensely detest the opinions which your opponent dared to attribute to me. I do not believe that on this earth there is a single professing Christian holding the damnation of infants, or if there be he must be insane, or utterly ignorant of Christianity. I am obliged by this opportunity of denying the calumny, although the author of it will probably find no difficulty in inventing some other fiction to be affirmed as unblushingly as the present one. He who doubts God's Word is naturally much at home in slandering the Lord's servants."

In noticing Mr. Edmond Beales' preaching to the East London artisans, the Christian World remarks:

"The religion of the artisan is often of a far more stern and uncompromising type than that which finds favour with many congregations. Our working men are frequently found inquiring of themselves whether the numerous social and political anomalies existing amongst us are in strict accordance with the doctrines preached by the Saviour to his followers; whether the prevailing fierce antagonism of capital and labour, of rich and poor, of rival creeds, of conflicting parties, is not largely due to the absence of that pure and unselfish spirit which animated the Sermon on the Mount. There is a strange warfare going on in their minds. They cannot understand why things that should be are not. Inculcated with a fuller knowledge of the Gospel truth in its simplest and best understood form, they cannot comprehend why so many professing Christians are to be found regarding coldly the various movements having for their object the promotion of temperance, peace, and similar vital principles. A few years since the contrast between the preaching and practice of many claiming to be the recognised servants of Christ gave temporary force to the mischievous and fatal doctrines of scepticism and infidelity. Men could not reconcile the idea of fox-hunting parsons or wine-bibbing bishops with their notions of what the successors of the Apostles should be. But they have grown wiser. The continual and self-denying labours of multitudes of earnest Christian-minded men and women have taught a considerable proportion of the masses to judge the principles of Christianity, not as they are practised by selfish and worldly men, but as they are set forth in the Divine volume, in whose teachings is to be found the true basis of all political, social, and economical legislation. The accession of Edmond Beales to the ranks of our popular preachers is but one of the numerous indications of this new feeling, this ceaseless craving after the real spirit of religion. He has become another of the many interpreters of popular sentiment, not railing at the Bible because its teachings are so often disregarded, but rather seeking to explain how its doctrines and precepts, if properly acted upon, would mitigate, if not wholly remove, much of the terrible physical distress and misery which is at present mercilessly sapping the very foundations of our national prosperity."

A discussion has recently taken place in the Session of the Free Church of Scotland, whether the death of Christ was in some mysterious but unavailable manner an atonement for the sins of the whole world, or whether its reference "potentially" and "actually" must be limited to the elect. Both parties agree that the available reference is to this fraction only of our race, but Dr. Candlish and those who stand up for his view contend that there is a potential reference to humanity at large, though there is not the faintest hope—nay, not the faintest possibility—that those beyond the pale can avail themselves of the offer and reap the fruit of the Redeemer's work. Referring to the dispute, the English Independent says:

"For ourselves we say frankly that we prefer the single reference. It seems to mock God somewhat less, and to do less deep dishonour to His love. This fiction of a potential reference which carries no actual boon is to us a disastrous extrication of the Divine name from the dishonour with which the Calvinistic formularies cover it; and we had rather deal with the narrow school, who frankly deny that Christ's work has any blessing for humanity at large, than with those who utter a 'word of promise to the ear and break it to the heart.' The wonder to us is what these theologians find to cling to, what there is in this miserable fiction either to divide or unite men. It needs perhaps a Scotch capacity at any rate in these days fully to grasp it. The Scotch Church, Established or Free, has advanced but little since the days when they cast out McLeod Campbell and refused A. J. Scott ordination for believing in the real and living universality of the Atonement. They are still stumbling at the same stumbling-block, and are bound with the same bands. Like some of old, they are so narrowing the gate of the kingdom of heaven that few can pass through. The business of the Churches now is not to make light of theology or orthodox beliefs, but to enlarge the creeds intelligently in the light of the new facts about man and the new truth about God and God's Word, which the growing knowledge of our times delivers to us. The Churches which prefer hair-splitting, and make points so fine that it needs an instructed eye to discover in them the grounds of spiritual fellowship or separation, but put themselves in the rear instead of in the van of progress, and will be left stranded on the mud banks, while the Gospel passes on to win new triumphs by new ministries of grace and love."

In his sermon, on Sunday afternoon, bringing to a close the "special services for the people" in St. James's Hall, the Rev. Newman Hall said, with great justice, "there was much Popery in the country, and they should avoid it as much as they could, but the worst Popery of all was to be found in the supposition that the clergy were to do all the work of the Church, and of charitable and benevolent institutions."

Punch gives this as "a Protestant poke:"

"Mohammedans leave their shoes at the doors of their places of worship: Papists their understandings."

Our witty contemporary, under the heading "In their right places," has also the following:

"Ministers at the Mansion House? This does not, but might refer to Dissenting Ministers, of whom some eminent ones have lately been guests at the Mansion House banquets—a very desirable addition to the Lord Mayor's table."

The Saturday Review, in some remarks on Dr. Davidson and Mr. Voysey, admits that old dogmatic prejudices may be dying out, that the world may possibly be growing wiser and more liberal in its belief, and advancing daily, to use Dr. Davidson's language, in the path of "true religion and the promotion of rational liberty." But long before Dr. Davidson's catholic ideal of a creedless or almost creedless faith has been reached, the day of Established Churches will have passed away. It seems doubtful in any case whether it will last much longer. Disestablishment in Ireland has given a blow to the principle, and in a somewhat different way it is weakened by the recurrence of such cases as the St. Albans or Voysey prosecution. The Review quite agrees with Dr. Davidson that there is a great deal to be said for established as opposed to voluntary Churches, and that, up to a certain point, they afford a valuable guarantee for religious freedom. But there is a point beyond which freedom cannot be pushed without merging into anarchy, and disintegrating the whole system. How nearly that point has already been reached in the Church of England the Review will not undertake to say, but that her fabric will not bear many more such rough experiments as we have witnessed of late seems clear enough.

In his speech on the Irish Church, the Lord Chancellor spoke thus well on "finality:"

"The words 'for ever' are very vain and presumptuous words to apply to any construction of man, be it material, moral, or otherwise. They are not words for man's use. They are worse than presumptuous—they are foolish, because they mislead those who can be misled, they entangle those who can be entangled by such cobwebs, and they prevent those reforms by which alone there is the slightest chance of anything in this world approximating to duration. The moment you cease to advance and say, 'Here we stand for ever,' from that moment you begin to decay, and to advance fast toward your ruin. Those who trust in the words 'for ever,' and who forbear, from timid superstition, to march on in the path of improvement which indicates the life of a nation, will find that there are two other words, even more sad—'Too late!'"

A well-informed American, writing on the subject of the Ecumenical Council, for which such preparations are being made in Rome, says:

"The Pope is the person most interested in it, and most confident in its efficacy. He is a man of very moderate ability and no culture, who passed his life till the age of fifty-three in an Italian convent, and possesses absolutely no knowledge of the world or its ways. His opinion of its condition may be learnt from the famous 'Syllabus.' He thinks men are all on the road to damnation; that religion is falling into contempt; that the zeal of the clergy is waxing cold, and their discipline relaxing; and he thinks the only remedy lies in a General Council, and has accordingly summoned it.

His difficulties, however, are great, and his own simplicity and ignorance render his position very perplexing. A French writer, supposed to be officially inspired, has published a pamphlet, showing that the first eight General Councils of the Church were summoned by the Emperor, either on the Pope's request, or in defiance of him, and he denies the competency of the Pope to summon one on his own motion. To which Monsignor Nardi has been ordered to reply, and he accordingly knocks down his enemy at the first charge, and proceeds to strip his body, alleging that the pamphlet was written by an Italian, and printed at Florence in the royal printing-office for General Menabrea, and then shows that the writer is an ignoramus; that the Popes summoned all the Councils that ever met, and that, if they did not, it was their right to do so, and that the only business a layman of any rank has with the Church is to obey its teachings. The Pope's expectations are said not to be shared by anybody of those about him except his chaplain, and the French bishops will, it is feared, give trouble. Their own Government and they are at loggerheads on a variety of questions. The Emperor is opposed to the Council, and unwilling that they should attend it. Should they do so, and make their position in France the subject of complaint, it will lead, it has been more than hinted, to the withdrawal of the garrison, and the abandonment of the assembled ecclesiastics to the tender mercies of the Roman population. Threats of this kind are, however, said not to trouble the Pope seriously. He believes that the temporal power has been ordained by Providence for the preservation and the independence of the Holy See, and that in some way or other care will always be taken that his Holiness does not become the subject of a temporal ruler, and to the Papal territory outside Rome he attaches no special importance."

A working man, in the East-end of London, who has emerged from the "fog of orthodoxy," writes to us expressing his strong conviction that if Christianity is ever to become predominant among his class, it must be by making known to them the truth in the form in which Unitarians hold it. There are hundreds around him, he believes, who would give up the repugnance which they at present have for religion if they could only be made to feel that it was not against, but in harmony with sound reason. In Mile-end-road large groups of men may be seen earnestly discussing religious and political subjects, or listening to orthodox preachers, and he has been greatly struck by the acute and forcible objections which are often made to the teachings of the popular theology. He is anxious, therefore, that something more should be done than is at present to make our views known among the class to which he belongs. From there being no settled minister, and from the uninviting nature of the entrance to the room where a few earnest people now meet, Unitarian Christianity seems to be really unrepresented in the large central working district where all other Churches are labouring to elevate the masses; and he earnestly asks whether a more suitable building could not be procured, and a minister provided to do the work which requires to be done.

CAMBRIDGE CANDOUR.

BISHOP MARSH (Margaret Professor of Divinity) says, in his Letter to the Critical Review, p. 20, "I venerate the learning and admire the honesty displayed by Lardner throughout all his works." And (p. 26) "The Trinity and Atonement are doctrines which unassisted reason never would, and never could, have discovered. They are doctrines which must rest on the sole authority of Scripture."

Professor Hey (Divinity Lectures, ed. 1796) says (I. 4), "No doubt the Scripture is true, but it may be falsely interpreted; and all that any man should really be understood to mean when he speaks of the Word of God, is, human interpretation of it."

On prayer to Christ, he remarks (II. 361), that though Pliny says the Christians sang hymns to Christ as a God—"Pliny says 'I tanquam Deum,'—yet Pliny's idea of a God was not confined to the One Supreme. . . . St. Stephen's address is the ejaculation of a man dying in the Christian cause."

II. 243, "The word person is not to be understood in its usual sense, but as a term borrowed from common language, to express a distinction, of which we have no clear comprehension."

II. 249, "When it is proposed to me to affirm that 'In the unity of this Godhead there be three persons of one substance, power, and eternity; the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost,' [Art. I.] I have difficulty enough! My understanding is involved in perplexity, my conceptions bewildered in the thickest darkness. I pause. I hesitate. I ask what necessity there is for making such a declaration. And my difficulty is increased when I find that making this declaration separates me from Christians whom I must acknowledge to be rational and well-informed; from those who have studied some parts of Scripture with singular success."

II. 251, "Does not this confound all our conceptions and make us use words without meaning? I think it does. I profess and proclaim my confusion in the most unequivocal manner. Did I pretend to understand what I say, I could not both worship the one true God, and acknowledge Jesus Christ to be Lord of all."

II. 253, "It might tend to promote moderation, and in the end agreement, if we were industrious on all occasions to represent our own doctrines as unintelligible."

II. 259, "The term Trinity not being Scriptural, we cannot adhere to Scripture and use that."

II. 363, He admits, when speaking of Dissenters, "The nearness of our doctrines in all points nearly affecting piety and virtue; our not having in many of the disputed points what can properly be called an opinion."

Dr. Ralph Cudworth (Intellectual System, p. 604): "A Trinity of persons, having all one and the same singular existent essence, is a doctrine which seemeth not to have been owned by any public authority in the Christian Church, save that of the Lateran Council only. No such thing was ever entertained by the Nicene fathers."

P. 611, "The ancient orthodox fathers who used the word Homo-ousios against Arius, intended not thereby to assert the Son to have one and the same singular or individual essence with the Father."

CRITIC.

FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

In a long letter to the Christian World on this subject, the Rev. William Miall says:

"Whilst the 'Free Christian Union' disclaims the intention of creating a new sect, and invites the adhesion of persons or congregations whose ecclesiastical relations shall yet remain inviolate, there can be no doubt that its effect would be to break down the hedges which divide the sects, and to render churches impatient of existing conditions of membership. That such results would be in accordance with truth and righteousness, and so with the Great Master's will and the requirements of men, may I think be thus argued:—

"Liberty is every man's natural right, and very high privilege, to be yielded only in consideration of some yet greater good, and to be curtailed by others only when its assertion would impinge on their equal freedom.

"Confederation is an expedient involving the partial sacrifice of liberty.

"That confederation is as to its constitution the worthiest which most respects the individual liberty of its members.

"The Church of Christ, as originally constituted upon the simple basis of desire to become his disciples, is a confederation involving the smallest possible sacrifice of liberty, and so is worthy of highest admiration.

"Individual churches are but portions of the universal church, and their constitution is to be regarded with complacency only when conformed to the pattern which it supplies.

"In the meantime, and whilst looking forward to the Church of the future for an exemplification of unity in liberty, the Free Christian Union invites all who rejoice in hope of its advent to combine for such purposes as may expedite its arrival, and for the fraternal fellowship and common worship for which themselves are already prepared. Two mistakes prevail on the subject. One respects the value which the Union attaches to correct thought—to sound theology. Its members are supposed to affirm that, providing belief be sincere, it is of little consequence whether the thing believed be true or otherwise. So far from this being the case, it assumes diversity of conviction, and therefore that independence of research which is the offspring of love and truth. The other relates to the method by which it seeks the attainment of its end. That method is supposed to be a general compromise.

"The Unitarian and the Unitarian, the Episcopalian and the Congregationalist are regarded as willing to merge their differences for the sake of fellowship. From such a compact I, for one, could augur nothing but self-contempt and failure. Fealty to truth—that is, of course, to our convictions of truth—is among the chief of the qualities which constitute greatness, whether in the individual or the State. But, then, a cardinal truth is that of the responsibility of every man to God only for his religious sentiments. To subject others to any kind of deprivation because of their opinion is of the nature of persecution, and is not more a violation of charity than it is treason against truth.

"The chief objection which others urge against the Union is its inclusion of Unitarians. Believing, as I do, that habitual faith in a living Saviour is the highest development of personal religion and the strongest incentive to all virtue, it were impossible for me to regard without interest any position, even though I should think it a mistaken one, which originated in jealousy for his honour. Can it, however, be intelligently maintained that such association with Unitarians as this Union allows can be dishonouring to Christ? A company of persons, able, educated, and exemplary beyond most others, and of whose conscientiousness the cost they have incurred by fidelity to their convictions supplies abundant evidence, are willing, desirous to fraternise with us in work and worship. Must not such fraternisation tend to secure a calm and candid consideration of the points in dispute between us? And surely it should be those who have the strongest conviction that the truth is with them who should be the least disturbed as to the issue. Suppose the contemplated united worship be conducted by a Unitarian. There may be about it more of the formal, of the æsthetical, than about our services; we may miss some qualities and the recognition of some doctrines to which we are accustomed, and justly, to attach importance. Of direct homage to Christ there may not be any, but there will be an approach to our common Father in the name of our common Saviour and Lord. Must not refusal to join occasionally in such service savour rather of self-ignorance, prejudice, and petty party spirit than of such zeal for Christ and his truth as he would himself approve?

"But suppose Unitarians willing to unite occasionally in our services. As we do not expect that they shall conform to our preferences when we unite with them, neither should we conform to theirs when they unite with us. From such services what could arise but good to the cause alike of charity and of truth.

"There is one object contemplated by the Union which appears to be scarcely sufficiently recognised. Intelligent observers concerned for the interests of Christian truth cannot fail to perceive the ever-widening breach between its advocates and that large and most influential portion of the community who occupy the field of scientific research and discovery. To ignore the fact is impossible, to make light of it were consummate folly or sheer fanaticism. Obviously it is to a great extent the result of what is felt to be the irreconcilableness of the facts of the one party with the doctrines of the other. Now, a society which proclaims that those doctrines are not essential to the integrity of Christian principle removes the ground of disagreement, and, it may be hoped, will arrest the progress of a disaffection which, rightly regarded, is as unnatural as it is painful and ominous of sorest evil. Here, as elsewhere, the judicious Reformer is the true Conservative."

AMERICAN NOTES.

Mr. Huntington on his conversion to orthodoxy was re-ordained at Boston. The Rev. Thomas K. Beecher, inquiring perhaps somewhat too curiously, wishes to know whether, when the assembled bishops laid hands on Mr. Huntington and said "Receive the Holy Ghost," he did receive the Holy Ghost?

From a statement in the National Baptist, the relative positions of the two great parties in the Episcopal Church of America would seem to be pretty much the same as in this country. It says:

"The High Church party is strong, proud, and unyielding—confident that they can have their own way. The Low Church party is evangelically earnest and ecclesiastically timid—satisfied that they are being crowded to the wall, and not yet decided as to what they must do. We know too many good men among them, and have too much at heart the extension of the Gospel, not to watch their course with interest. In our judgment there is no hope for the 'Church.' The Evangelical party will either give up their convictions or abandon their ecclesiastical connections."

The Boston Advertiser, a very reliable authority, tells of a resident of one of the suburban towns who found the services at his church very quieting, and fell asleep. He was finally disturbed by the touch of a contribution box in the hands of one of the deacons, who was taking up a collection; but without opening his eyes, the sleeper ejaculated "Season," and sank back to resume his nap. It is unnecessary to say that he was a season-ticket passenger on a railroad.

A little Boston girl has secured the commencement of a charity, which, if seconded as it should be, may be a means of giving pleasure and happiness to many sad and weary sufferers. In accordance with her suggestion, a chapel belonging to one of the churches will be opened two mornings every week for the reception of gifts of flowers, to be distributed to the sick poor of the city. This distribution is to be made through the regular district visitors of the various benevolent societies, who will carry them, not only to the beds of pain in hospitals, but also to the homes of sorrow and wretchedness about the city, where their delicate fragrance and beauty will prove a rare and joy-giving presence indeed. Such a charity, so beautiful in conception, and so wide in its beneficence, is worthy of all praise, as it is of extensive imitation.

Henry Ward Beecher is said frequently to exhibit a more wonderful power in the prayer meeting than in the pulpit. His perceptions of the necessities of the hour, his knowledge of the human heart and its needs, his skill in guiding the current of prayer and remark, his ready questions to arrest a strain of useless talk, his prompt answers to all queries, his humorous methods of silencing formalists and bores, make him a prince of leaders in devotional meetings. The following story is told in Harper's Editor's Drawer: "I had one man that used to trouble me a great deal. He used"—and here Mr. Beecher impersonated him to the life—"he used to drag his words in the most tediously slow process that you can imagine. One evening he commenced as usual, 'I—hope—that—my—young—friends—will—not—like—me—put—off—their—consideration—of the interests of eternity,' and just then I interrupted him by saying, 'Mr. —, if you go on that way much longer, eternity will be here and half through before you finish.'"

Our American friends like to do things on a large scale. For instance, the Methodist Bishop Kingsley has begun an Episcopal tour round the world. Starting from New York to San Francisco, he holds conferences at Colorado, Denver, Oregon, and California; leaves San Francisco September 6th for China; attends conference at Shanghai, goes up to Peking, and visits missionary stations till December; sails for Calcutta, attends conference at Lucknow, and spends two months in India; goes to Egypt, spends Easter at Jerusalem; visits Bulgaria, Germany, and Scandinavia, attending conferences in these regions; officially visits the Wesleyan conferences of France, England, and Ireland, and returns a year from next August.

The following Hymn of Dedication, written for the occasion by the Rev. Robert Collyer, was sung at the opening of his new church, of which we gave an account last week:

"With thankful hearts, O God, we come,
To a new temple built for Thee!
And pray that this may be our home,
Until we touch eternity.
"The common home of rich and poor,
Of bond and free, and great and small;
Large as Thy love for evermore!
And warm and bright and good to all.
"And dwell Thou with us in this place;
Thou and Thy Christ, to guide and bless.
Here make the wellsprings of Thy grace,
Like fountains in the wilderness.
"May Thy whole truth be welcome here,
Thy gospel light for ever shine!
Thy perfect love cast out our fear;
And human life become divine."

In the Methodist Episcopal Church, one of the most numerous religious bodies in the United States, the subject of "lay representation," which was warmly agitated a few years since, has come up again. At that time a majority, both of the clergy and laity, was decidedly against it; but at present, as far as the voting has gone, the feeling runs the other way, and the principle will most likely be carried that the laity shall send representatives to the "Conferences," which have hitherto been composed exclusively of the clergy.

Of an oration delivered over the graves of the Union soldiers at Chicago, by the Rev. Robert Collyer, the Times of that city says:

"He paid a just and eloquent tribute to their patriotism, and in glowing words described the grandeur of the cause for which they risked and gave their lives. His prose is poetry, and his imaginative and emotional nature, together with his happy facility for illustration, and rare culture, peculiarly qualify him as an orator for such an occasion. The style of the oration was admirable for its chasteness, clearness of expression, depth of feeling, and the charity it expressed for our foes, in the rebellion. No one can read it without feeling that the head and heart of the orator wrought together in its production, and that it is the expression of a Christian and chivalrous gentleman."

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON'S "DIARY." I.

THIS Diary, which has been edited with great care and judgment by our friend Dr. Sadler, from the intimate relations into which Mr. Robinson was brought with an extraordinary number of the most eminent literary characters of his time—such as Schiller, Goethe, Herder, Madame de Stael, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Lamb, Rogers, Mrs. Barbauld, Hazlitt—is full of particulars that are both interesting and valuable to the students of literature.

It abounds also in passages bearing upon religious and denominational matters, some of which, as the work may not be accessible to many of our readers, we propose to transfer to our columns.

In the year 1798, when Mr. Robinson was twenty-three, and an admirer of Godwin's "Political Justice," he wrote to Robert Hall, the famous Baptist preacher, to remonstrate with him for having told a mutual friend that it was disgraceful to him, as a Christian, to admit him (H. C. R.) into his house. This brought back a long and well-written letter from Mr. Hall, in which the following passage occurs:

"How far a regard to speculative opinion ought to regulate the choice of our friendships, is a delicate question never likely to be adjusted harmoniously by two persons who think so differently of the importance of truth and the mischief of error. Principles of irreligion, recommended by brilliant and seductive talents, appear to me more dangerous in the intercourse of private life than licentious manners. Vice is a downcast, self-accusing culprit; error often assumes an appearance which captivates and dazzles. The errors—or rather the atrocious speculations—of Godwin's system are big with incalculable mischief. They confound all the duties and perplex all the relations of human life; they innovate in the very substance of virtue, about which philosophers of all sects have been nearly agreed. They render vice systematic and concerted; and by freeing the conscience from every restraint, and teaching men to mock at futurity, they cut off from the criminal and misguided the very possibility of retreat. Atheism in every form I abhor, but even Atheism has received from Godwin new degrees of deformity, and wears a more wild and savage aspect. I am firmly of opinion the avowal of such a system, accompanied with an attempt to proselyte, ought not to be tolerated in the State, much less be permitted to enter the recesses of private life, to pollute the springs of domestic happiness or taint the purity of confidential intercourse. For the first of these sentiments Mr. Godwin's disciples will doubtless regard me with ineffable contempt; a contempt which I am prepared to encounter, shielded by the authority of all pagan antiquity, as well as by the decided support of Mr. Locke, the first of Christian philosophers and political reasoners."

The following entries relating to Gilbert Wakefield are interesting:

"I find in my journal, Feb. 21st, 1799, 'An interesting and memorable day.' It was the day on which Gilbert Wakefield was convicted of a seditious libel and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. This he suffered in Dorchester gaol, which he left only to die. Originally of the Established Church, he became a Unitarian, and Professor at the Hackney College. By profession he was a scholar. His best known work was an edition of 'Lucretius.' . . . Wakefield was a political fanatic. He had the pale complexion and mild features of a saint, was a most gentle creature in domestic life, and a very amiable man; but when he took part in political or religious controversy his pen was dipped in gall."

"Johnson, the Unitarian publisher in St. Paul's Churchyard, was convicted of a libel for selling Wakefield's pamphlet; he was imprisoned in the King's Bench for a few months."

In a letter to his brother, referring to the same subject, Mr. Robinson writes:

"One of the most interesting circumstances here has been Wakefield's trial. How I wished that you had been here then! My acquaintance with him perhaps heightened the effect; but I think to a mere stranger his delivery of his own defence must have been one of the most gratifying treats which a person of taste or sensibility could enjoy. His simplicity quite apostolic, his courage purely heroic. The energy and dignity with which he conducted himself have certainly no parallel of late years. You saw a report of his speech in the Courier. It certainly was not a good defence, but as Anthony Robinson observed, something better than any defence—a noble testimony. I dined with him on Monday and yesterday. His spirits are not in the least depressed."

It may be mentioned, in passing, that it was during this imprisonment that Mr. Wakefield's interesting correspondence with Charles James Fox, on classical subjects, was carried on.

Of George Dyer, two of whose hymns are in Martineau's collection (Nos. 117 and 142), Mr. Robinson writes under the year 1799:

"I became acquainted about this time with George Dyer. He was one of the best creatures morally that ever breathed. He was the son of a watchman in Wapping, and was put to a charity school by some pious Dissenting ladies. He afterwards went to Christ's Hospital, and from there was sent to Cambridge. He was a scholar, but to the end of his days (and he lived to be 85) was a bookseller's drudge. He led a life of literary labour in poverty. He made indexes, corrected the press, and occasionally gave lessons in Latin and Greek. When an undergraduate at Cambridge, he became a hearer of Robert Robinson, and consequently a Unitarian. This closed the Church against him, and he never had a Fellowship. . . . He wrote one good book—"The Life of Robert Robinson," which I have heard Wordsworth mention as one of the best works of biography in the language, [which was Dr. Parr's opinion too.] Dyer also put his name to several volumes of poetry; but on his poems my friend Reid made an epigram that I fear was thought just:

'The world all say, my gentle Dyer,
Thy odes do very much want fire.
Repair the fault, my gentle Dyer,
And throw thy odes into the fire.'

"Dyer had the kindest heart and simplest manners imaginable. It was literally the case with him that he would give away his last guinea. He was not sensible of impropriety in wearing a dirty shirt or a ragged coat; and numerous are the tales told in illustration of his neglect of little every-day matters of comfort. He has asked a friend to breakfast with him, and given him coarse black tea, stale bread, salt butter, sour milk, and has had to run out and buy sugar. Yet every one loved Dyer. . . . He was blind for a few years before his death. I used occasionally to go on a Sunday morning to read to him. At other times a poor man used to render him that service for sixpence an hour."

A friend of his once gave us an illustration of the mistakes which he made, partly owing to his dimness of sight and partly to his absence of mind. Walking somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Regent's Park, where the road was very muddy, and seeing, as he thought, a clean path on the other side of some palings, he clambered over them, and, leaping down, discovered too late that what he had taken for a path was the Regent's Canal. Fortunately, a carman chanced to be at hand, who managed to help him out, and then, lecturing him on the sin of suicide, was with difficulty prevented from giving him into the hands of the police.

SEVENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS.

WE wonder how many of our readers noticed the account of the opening of ROBERT COLLYER'S church, [Chicago, in our last impression. It is an interesting and suggestive story. Our American friends do everything on a large scale—their wars, their debts, their waterfalls, and their chapel collections. But even America never before saw such an exhibition of enthusiastic liberality as that which took place on this occasion, and which resulted in a collection of seventy thousand dollars—nearly fifteen thousand pounds. For it must be remembered that this was a genuine collection. It was not that the people put off subscribing till the opening; in order then to make a sensation. They had started by subscribing handsomely before the new church was begun. Something like a hundred thousand dollars had been already raised; indeed, so large a sum that the eager congregation resolved to build an edifice worthy of their pastor's growing fame, and adequate to the prospective wants of the constantly increasing city, and found themselves involved as the work approached completion in a debt of $113,000. We can well believe the account of "Mr. COLLYER'S usual cheerful view of things" having "well-nigh forsaken him" in presence of such a state of affairs, for the great desire of his heart had been to rescue this new church from being a mere proprietary worshipping place, as so many of the American churches are, and—if we understand aright—to have it under some modification—an open church. But he did not know how warmly his spirit has come to be appreciated by the whole community amidst which he lives. When the opening day came, such a congregation as the Western States have hardly seen before united in the services of dedication, and crowned them by an offertory which, if it speaks great things for those who contributed it, speaks even greater things for him in love for whose work among them they gave so liberally and so willingly. From his old country we, too, would send our word of congratulation and of hope, to mingle with the greetings which hail the noble completion of a noble work.

And is there not in this a lesson of encouragement both for ministers and congregations?

Who is this man who has thus gradually come to be a religious power in that country where the race of life is more eager, and the roar of worldly voices louder, than even here where the preacher often feels as if he spoke in vain? Who is this man for whom has been done such a thing as has not been done before, even in that land of great things?

Twenty-five years ago ROBERT COLLYER was just a studious youth, working as a journeyman in the little blacksmith's shop at Ilkley, fond of reading, eager for self-improvement, busy in trying to form a little newsroom and library there, in which connection, our good friend, Mr. HENRY J. MORTON, of Garforth, knew and helped him. He was a Methodist at that time, occasionally a local preacher. In the year 1850, he went to America, and there was brought more strongly under the influence of liberal religious ideas, and became a Unitarian, and not having lost the warmth of his old faith, longed by and by to devote himself altogether to the ministry, and began his new career as city missionary of the Unitarian congregation in Chicago. From that time he has gradually risen in esteem and influence, until to-day he is, perhaps, the most popular minister through all the great Western States, and beginning to be known throughout the Union. And how has Mr. COLLYER obtained this influence? Here is another notable thing. There is not in him any element of the startling or eccentric, still less the slightest approach to the pulpit buffoonery, which has won for some of the preachers on the day a wide but dubious popularity. His is the power of genuine fervour and strong common sense, combined with gentle, loving simplicity of character. There is in him little of anything that can be called genius, nothing whatever of straining after effect; but out of a heart aglow with piety and love, and quick to note the nobler aspects of nature and of humanity from which he is never tired of drawing illustrations, he pours forth in racy Saxon speech words that coming from the heart go direct to the heart. Now, we put this man's success as a great encouragement to the preacher. Piety and love are not exceptional gifts. Their inspiring power waits for every minister who will rise to the full height of his calling, and give himself thoroughly to Him whose gospel he preaches. Simplicity and directness, too, are within the reach of any one who will throw himself, heart and soul, into his work so as to forget himself in it.

And surely here is a stimulus also to our churches in the work which ROBERT COLLYER and his people are doing, and in this noble response to his simple appeal. For a church to succeed and grow, minister and people must work together. There must be as fervent and unreserved a throwing of the heart into the common work on their part as on his. And until they do so throw themselves into it, they will never know the joy and lifting-up of soul which there is in it. The more men do and the more they give, the more their work and their gifts become a delight to them—something in which they feel, not self-satisfaction, but deep thankfulness. Will any one of our Chicago friends, who thus raised together an amount which seems almost incredible, feel a whit the poorer for what he has given? Would any one who now measures out his little contribution to his church offertory feel really poorer if now and then his pence were made shillings, and his shillings pounds? Or would any of the subscribers to our mission work who now gives the conventional guinea be the poorer if he made it three or five? Alas! we fear that, ministers and people alike, we have all much to learn yet of the spirit in which the great work that lies about us in the world must be done, if done it is to be.

Rev. Alfred Hardy.

Nor many of our readers, probably, are aware of the existence of a Unitarian Chapel in the small declining town of Prescot; fewer still, perhaps, had any knowledge of the Rev. Alfred Hardy, who, for over twenty years, was its minister. His portrait will not be thought to deserve a place in the upper gallery of Unitarian worthies, yet a man so sound at heart and so true must not be allowed to slip out of our fellowship and our memories without, at least, a passing tribute of respect.

Mr. Hardy was one of the last of his race, the lingering representative of an honourable school of quiet, modest, and obscure divines, whose large scholarly attainments and rare benevolence were unaccompanied by either desire or capacity for pressing to the front and making a noise in the world. Born at Congleton, Cheshire, at a very early age he was deprived of a father's care; he had, however, some rich relatives, one of whom, an uncle, was desirous of educating him for the ministry of the Church of England. But the necessity for subscription to the Articles stopped him on the way to College; and having dared to think for himself he was discarded by his friends, and thrown, an orphan, on the world. Left thus dependent on his own exertions he went to Manchester, and, taking up his abode with a brother who was settled there, he worked for a time at a branch of the cotton manufacture.

In his struggles with fortune he never lost heart, nor ever missed an opportunity of improving his mind and cultivating his natural tastes. Having formed an acquaintance with a French sergeant, who was a prisoner of war at liberty on parole, he obtained from him a knowledge of the French language, teaching him English in return, and the facility with which he both acquired and imparted the instruction encouraged him to persevere in this line. He possessed a very remarkable gift for languages, which he improved to his latest years, till, in addition to his classical acquirements, he could converse in nearly all the Continental languages, and had attained a [good knowledge of most Oriental tongues. We are credibly told that some years ago he was ready to speak ten languages, and could read without difficulty twelve more. In a few years he relinquished his first occupation, and opened a school in Salford, for the education of boys and girls, in which he was successful. At this time he was much in the society of Wesleyan Methodists, and became a lay-preacher amongst them. His nephew, to whose kindness we are indebted for many of these particulars, well remembers hearing him preach with considerable power to a large congregation of this connexion at Stockport, in the year 1814 or 1815. How long he continued in association with that body does not appear; he certainly did not quit them from any quarrel or dispute, but at this time his knowledge of the Holy Scriptures was much enlarged, and he could no longer adopt the conclusions of his Wesleyan friends. He left them to join for a short time the Cowherdites, a primitive people in Salford, whose small society (founded by a curate of the Rev. John Clowes, the well-known Swedenborgian Rector of St. John's, Manchester,) holds a doctrine akin to the Swedenborgian, but chiefly makes abstinence from animal food and intoxicating drinks its condition of church-membership. Mr. Hardy was for a time assistant in the Rev. William Cowherd's school.

However, though he was always an abstemious man, he soon ceased to include in his religion the true Cowherdite abhorrence of beef and beer; and as he advanced in his study of the original languages of Holy Scripture, he was gradually drawn to Unitarian views. The natural instinct of his mind toward freedom helped to land him on our shores; his love of the liberal divines of the last century tended in the same direction, and he became at length an attendant upon the ministry of the Rev. J. R. Beard, at Greengate Chapel, Salford.

Mr. Hardy never married, and at this period of his life his household consisted of four orphan nieces, who had been left without provision, and whom, in spite of his narrow means, he had adopted. To them he acted in every respect as a father; and one of them, a poor afflicted creature who lived in his house till his death, he tended with a quiet self-denial and devotion to which no words can do justice.

About the year 1830 Mr. Hardy began occasionally to occupy Unitarian pulpits, but his school was his means of support. Before long, however, he entered the regular ministry of our body; and for upwards of thirty years he contrived to exist on the slender stipend furnished by one or other of our obscure congregations, eked out by teaching and school-keeping. He was first settled at Thorne, in Yorkshire, but in August, 1837, he accepted the pulpit of Framlingham, in Suffolk. He left Framlingham for a settlement at Canterbury about Michaelmas, 1840; and in the year 1848 he came to Prescot, where he continued to reside till his death, on the 30th of last month. For many years £50 was the extent of his professional income. "But at Canterbury," as he himself once said with much simplicity, "I got a rise of salary; my stipend there was £52 a year." At Canterbury, too, he had access to excellent libraries, and found many friends qualified to assist him in his cherished pursuits; and good Archbishop Howley deemed it no dishonour to pay an occasional visit to his poor Unitarian brother.

The feeling entertained respecting him in the town where he died is sufficiently well described in a few sentences which appeared in the Prescot Reporter of July 3rd, as part of a notice of his decease:—"Mr. Hardy was a gentleman of simple unassuming habits, fond of books, most kind-hearted and charitable, and was most deservedly held in high estimation by the inhabitants of the town. Great numbers of persons who never saw Mr. Hardy in the pulpit will have a good word to say of him now that he is gone. A story of genuine distress would always tempt Mr. Hardy to count his little store of money to see what could be spared. Many a shilling we have known him to give in charity, which we have felt certain he would have to make good by depriving himself of something necessary to a man of his age." His love of young people was as much a part of his character as was his appetite for all sorts of learning. He was followed to his grave by members of orthodox sects, a clergyman of the Church of England among them, who joined with the remnant of his flock in giving utterance to one common note of solemn and respectful regret.

Eddowes Bowman, Esq., M.A.

DEATH has lately made great and grievous inroads on our ranks. To the names of those highly valued and esteemed amongst us, who have within a short period been taken away, we have now, with sincere regret, to add that of EDDOWES BOWMAN, Esq., of Manchester. Belonging to an old Nonconformist family, and fully persuaded after careful inquiry of the truth of Unitarian Christianity, he remained ever faithful to his convictions, and in various ways rendered efficient service to our cause.

In the earlier part of his life, Mr. Bowman was for a short time connected with mining operations in Wales, but feeling that the bent of his mind lay in the direction of teaching, with a view to prepare himself for this he entered the University of Glasgow, and after graduating there pursued his studies with greater assiduity under some of the most distinguished professors in Germany. He thus became qualified, on the resignation of the office by F. W. Newman, Esq., in 1840, to succeed him as Professor of the Greek and Latin Classics, and of Greek and Roman History, in Manchester New College. This appointment he continued to hold till the year 1853, when the Institution was removed to London, and all who were brought into connection with him, either as colleagues or pupils, can testify to the earnestness with which he gave himself to his work, and the exactness and thoroughness with which it was done. These qualities, indeed, were characteristic of him in whatever he undertook. On the relinquishment of his professorship, though not in circumstances to require it, he still gave himself to the higher branches of teaching, in which his love of it could not fail to make him successful. Inheriting scientific tastes from his father, much of his leisure time was devoted to the study of astronomy, for the prosecution of which he built himself an excellent observatory, and likewise of certain branches of optics and acoustics, for the illustration of which he procured apparatus of the most beautiful kind, and on which he delivered several interesting courses of lectures at the Manchester Royal Institution, and other places.

Mr. Bowman's desire to turn his talents to useful account was shown not merely by the active part which for a long series of years he took in the management of the Lower Mosley-street Schools, but by his conducting, down to a very recent period, the highest class in the Sunday-school with the most exemplary regularity week after week, and by his kind concern for their welfare winning the gratitude and respect of the young men who came under his care. Among other institutions there was none in which he showed so deep an interest as the Domestic Mission, which he felt to be in its aims and objects most completely in harmony with the spirit of the Saviour, and to which he was always ready to give a generous support, and to lend help in any ways that he could. His assistance as a member of the College and other committees, from his knowledge and experience, as well as calm judgment, was of great value, and will be much missed. For many years he acted as chapel-warden to the Upper Brook-street congregation, and the way in which his loss will be there felt is the best testimony that could be given to the care with which he looked to its management, and the time and thought which he bestowed on the administration of its affairs. We believe him to have been a truly good man, anxious to do his duty as a disciple of Christ, and we may humbly trust that he has gone to find a place "where all is well with all that well have done."

MR. SPURGEON AND HIS WORK.

(From the Echo.)

MR. SPURGEON is a bishop among the Baptists; the pastor of the most numerous congregation in the world; the founder of we know not how many schools and chapels throughout the kingdom, and the most inexhaustible preacher of the age. To say that he has joked himself into celebrity could not be a kind, nor would it be a correct view of the case, but still it is not altogether and wholly untrue. The man who can hold together for so many years the immense congregation which assembles Sunday after Sunday at the Metropolitan Tabernacle has something more than coarse wit to recommend him. Certainly, Mr. Spurgeon cannot resist a joke, and he is genial to a fault; but his jokes are spontaneous, and they seldom strike the hearer as irreverent until he gets outside the Tabernacle, and tries to repeat them to his friends. The fact is that they are not irreverent in the preacher's mouth, because their intention is obviously good. The Spurgeon atmosphere reduces every one to good humour, and it is impossible to feel unkindly towards the eloquent and burly preacher as long as we are in his presence. Just as we begin to feel a little angry he disarms us by suddenly taking us into his confidence, after the manner of another great preacher, who once commenced a sermon in the following way: "I'm a very old man," said Rowland Hill one night, "and I have got a very bad cold, and I've heard there is nothing so good for it as a regular good pulpit sweat; and I tell you, my friends, I mean to have one to-night."

On one occasion Mr. Spurgeon took up the popular saying, "How's your poor feet," telling his flock to say rather, "how's your poor soul;" and when a "brother" craved an audience of the wearied minister in his home, Mr. Spurgeon instructed his servant thus: "Tell him—I am engaged with his Master." The other day we had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Spurgeon, when he told us that if the "word" was dull that morning—and there was certainly less light than usual—it was because he had a bad headache. On another occasion he said the crowd was too much for him. He was exceedingly hot, and would sit down for a little while, and hear them sing a few verses of a psalm. But as the people seemed very hot too, and did not sing the psalm with the proper enthusiasm, Mr. Spurgeon rose, and waving his arms, cheered them on with great energy, shouting to them, "Louder! louder, my friends, and all together!"—a toast—we mean a call—which was cordially responded to, and which certainly had the effect of lighting up the rest of the sermon. The fact is that Mr. Spurgeon, with a true popular instinct, will do anything rather than lose the attention of his hearers, and should a cat or a sparrow, or any other formidable rival, ever get loose in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, we dare not speculate on the turn which the discourse might take. But though wit may attract, more solid merits are required to retain a congregation. And Mr. Spurgeon possesses almost everything that is delightful and imposing to the lower and middle-class Christians over whom he so ably presides.

He has no new doctrines, and retails the old ones in a very simple form, and in perfect good faith. His shallow infidels are all men of straw, and he seldom fails, once in a Sunday at least, to lead the proverbial sinner by the usual stages to the conventional doom. The Heaven and Hell of his theology are as clearly defined as in the pictures of the old masters, and it never occurs to him that any class can be unfit for one without being fit for the other. He has no doubts on the subject of eternal rewards and punishments. These are little difficulties unprovided for in his theology, and with which he has no concern. Meanwhile he keeps very close to the Scriptures, examines each word by a moral microscope, and when he gets off to the body of his discourse, unfolds, or, as he would say, "opens up" a perfectly simple argument in a perfectly obvious way. His language is always powerful, sometimes highly felicitous. His stories are always good, told with real dramatic power, and there are plenty of them, while his illustrations have the merit of dealing with objects likely to be familiar to the bulk of his audience. He goes on the plan of "levelling down" things sacred to secular uses. In an excellent sermon that now lies before us, called "A Well-ordered Life," and preached the Sunday before last at the great Tabernacle, the Christian soldier is told to "ask the Lord of Hosts for marching orders;" holiness is commended to the artisan as a "wonderful piece of artistic adjustment;" the stationer is told to look for his seasons in the "celestial almanac;" the Christian accountant is bidden to "learn his notation table," and pray that he may be taught "the sacred arithmetic of the Lord;" whilst, in aromatic terms which might well attract and edify a perfumer, "perfection" is described as "a combination of sweet spices yielding up a rare perfume." When we add to these charms of rhetoric a homely and searching method of inquiry, a manly energy, a strong, compelling will, and a voice at once melodious, powerful, and distinct, we have perhaps discovered the main secrets of Mr. Spurgeon's popularity. That his moral influence is great and beneficial we do not doubt. We have known many a poor man travel constantly from the East-end of London on Sunday to hear him, and we have met with not a few who have been reclaimed from habits of intemperance and vice by his ministry. The publicans used to complain that when he preached at the Surrey Gardens he emptied all the public-houses for miles round.

Such is Mr. Spurgeon's strength, and after showing this it may sound strange to say that he is one of the most popular persons in London, at the same time that he is the least influential of equally valuable notoriety. It may be thought that intellectually he is as weak as he is morally and physically strong. Everyone has been to hear Mr. Spurgeon, but there are probably few people beyond the limits of his sect who look to him for light or guidance in the struggles and perplexities of the age. His remarks on politics are few, and essentially commonplace. To say that he is unacquainted with the heights and depths of philosophy and science is no great blame, but his utter want of sympathy with either is sufficiently pronounced to deter many thinking people from giving him the slightest attention. In this he materially differs from Mr. Ward Beecher, the great American Spurgeon, who has succeeded in keeping his mind open to every kind of truth, and has a vivid sympathy with the intellectual portion of society, without losing popular fibre. But although Mr. Spurgeon will never enrich the age with new ideas, we should be grateful to him for diffusing so many old and excellent truths, and if, owing to a certain want of general culture, and an absence of the critical faculty, he fails to see that some of his teaching is obsolete, yet he may reason, ably feel that he has not laboured in vain, whilst ministers of all denominations may well appreciate the great battle he wages with sin, and the great heart he brings to his work.

ROCK AND RILL.

LUCY LARCOM.

"Into the sunshine out of the shade":
The rill has heard the call,
And, bubbling low, her answer made—
A laugh, 'twixt slip and fall.

Out from her cradle roof of trees,
Over the free, rough ground!
The peaceful blue above she sees,
The cheerful green around.

A pleasant world for running streams
To steal unnoticed through,
At play with all the sweet sky-gleams,
And nothing else to do!

A rock has stopped the silent rill,
And taught her how to speak;
He hinders her; she chides him still;
He loves her hispings meek.

And still he will not let her go;
But she may chide and sing,
And o'er him liquid freshness throw,
Amid her murmuring.

The harebell sees herself no more
In waters clear at play;
Yet never she such azure wore,
Till wept on by the spray.

And many a woodland violet
Stays charmed upon the bank;
Her thoughtful blue eye brimming wet,
The rock and rill to thank.

The rill is blessing in her talk
What half she held a wrong—
The happy trouble of the rock
That makes her life a song.

FRANK AND TOM.

"I'll give it to him the very first time I catch him! I'll teach him to call me names; a disagreeable little fellow, not much higher than sixpenn'orth of halfpence. I'll make him remember it; only let me—"

"My dear Frank, what is the matter? Why, your face is as red as if you had been toasting it, and your eyes are flashing as if you were really angry."

"So I am, mamma," began Frank Fairman; and he seemed as if he had a great deal more to say than those few words, only his mother stopped him. "Then, my dear boy, you had better calm yourself the first thing. I never knew any good come of being angry, but I have known plenty of harm. Passion of every kind is an unsafe thing, Frank."

"But, mamma, it is enough to make anybody angry; I am sure even you would be as cross as cross could be if you were in my place."

"I hope not, Frank. But if you will tell me what is really the matter, I shall be the better able to judge, and, perhaps, to help you."

"I don't see how you can help me, mamma, unless he were brought here, and you gave him a good beating."

"I think I should not like to do that, Frank, whoever it may be that has incurred your displeasure."

"It is Tom Robinson, mamma, and he is only a little fellow, but he has the tiresomest tongue in all the school. He calls most of the boys names now and then. But he cannot leave me alone a single day, and I think I have had enough of his insolence."

"Oh! he calls you names, does he, Frank?"

"Yes, mamma, all sorts; sometimes it is 'Frank, the gentleman,' sometimes 'Frank Red-hair,' and sometimes 'Frank Longlegs,' just because I am tall, you know."

"Well, it doesn't matter what he calls you, does it?"

Frank looked at his mother as if he could not have heard her properly.

"Not matter, mamma? Of course it does. No one likes to be called names."

"I think it depends upon what the names really are, and whether there is any truth in them. I think it would be very disagreeable to be called 'Frank the liar,' or 'Frank the cheat,' or 'Frank the dirty.' But there is no harm in these names. Surely you have no objection to being called a gentleman, for that is what I hope you will certainly deserve to be called all your life. Then if Tom chooses to call your hair red, does that matter? It doesn't make it red, you know, and if it did, it would not matter, because there are many uglier things to look at than red hair. I have known several ladies and gentlemen who had plenty of brains and very wise heads, under hair quite brightly coloured. Then as to being called 'longlegs,' that cannot hurt you, because it is true, and because you cannot help it, and because your long legs may be very useful."

"Still, mamma," said Frank, who was only half-convinced, and still felt rather angry, "it is not pleasant to be called names of any kind in the street, and the first time I catch Tom Robinson I shall make him suffer for it!"

"Nonsense, Frank. You would not surely strike a boy who has not really hurt you, and who is not nearly so tall and strong as yourself."

"What shall I do to him, then, mamma?"

"Forgive him and take no notice, to be sure. Names don't hurt."

"They hurt my temper, though," said Frank, candidly.

"That's a pity, Frank. If Tom knew that, he might call you 'Bad-tempered Frank,' and you would not like that."

"He had better not," said Frank.

"But, Frank, are you sure that you never call Tom names?"

"He deserves it, you know, mamma, but I believe I never have."

"But I have heard you, Frank."

"Have you, mamma? When?"

"Only a few minutes ago. I heard you call him a disagreeable little fellow."

"Oh, that is nothing."

"I think it is quite as bad as 'Frank the gentleman.'"

"But he could not hear me."

"Do you think it is much better to have rude things said of you than to you?"

"I don't know, mamma," said Frank, feeling a little uncomfortable, and preparing to go out.

"Take my advice, Frank," said his mother, "and do not get cross, or take any notice even though Tom should call you names."

But, alas! Frank did not always mind what his mother said, as he certainly would have done if he had been wise.

He had scarcely walked a hundred yards before he heard a mocking voice, crying—

"Frank, Frank, a man of rank," and other things about as silly.

Frank lost his temper directly. "Just leave off that, will you?" he cried, angrily.

"What a splendid temper you have, Frank," cried Tom, in a provoking tone.

"I'll show you whether I have or not, if you don't leave off," said Frank.

"Frank the braggart, there's another name for you; Frank the braggart," shouted Tom.

It was very, very wrong of him. Frank might have been and was very foolish to take any notice of him; but Tom was a great deal worse to do what he knew was both wrong and unkind. He was the greater offender, and he had the greater punishment.

He still kept calling Frank all the names he could think of, and though they were harmless enough, in themselves, they irritated Frank so much that, he quite forgot his mother's good advice.

"I will pay you all I owe you," he shouted catching up a stick and running after Tom, who of course, ran away as fast as his legs would carry him.

But he was, as Frank had said, only a little fellow, and could not run very rapidly. Frank gained upon him every minute, and had almost caught him, when Tom, growing perhaps rather frightened, endeavoured to spring over an iron railing into a copple, thinking he could hide among the trees.

Just as he sprang over Frank came up, and seeing one of his hands on the railing he gave it a sharp rap with the stick, a thing that Frank regrets doing to this day.

Instantly Tom screamed with all his might, and, to Frank's surprise, he did not run away.

Then Frank saw what made him feel cold in a moment. Tom's hand had been caught by one of the spikes, and he could not get away, for he was hanging by it.

In a second all Frank's anger died away.

"Oh, stop a minute, Tom," he said, "I will lift you down; I am so sorry; and getting carefully over the railings, he lifted Tom down to the ground. It hurt him very much, though Frank was as tender as could be.

"Come to my mother," he said; "she will bind it up for you."

As Frank's house was nearer than Tom's, he went, and Mrs. Fairman bound up the bad hand very gently.

"I am so sorry, Tom," said Frank, with tears in his eyes. "It was my fault."

"Oh, I don't know about that," said Tom. "I was the worst; but I will not call you names again, Frank; I've learnt better."

"And if you do, I don't think I shall get cross, for I've learnt better too."

Very good. But what a pity they did not know better without such a painful lesson.

BEEN "BAPTISED, MASSA!"

"WELL, Cato, what ground have you for believing yourself a true Christian?" said a minister one day to an old coloured man, whose life was not so much in harmony with his profession as it ought to be.

"Been baptised, Massa," replied Cato, placing marked emphasis on the word "baptised."

The minister vainly tried to convince Cato that mere baptism could not make him a Christian. Cato was stubborn on this point, for he thought that the water in baptism cleansed the heart of its sinfulness. The poor fellow knew nothing of the work of the Holy Spirit on the heart. Just then a happy thought struck the minister's mind. He led Cato into his study, took an empty ink-bottle from a shelf, and holding it up, said—

"Cato, do you suppose I can clean this bottle by washing the outside with water?"

"No, Massa; you must wash de inside too, if you would have him clean," said Cato, with a grin of self-approval.

"Very good, Cato," rejoined the minister; "now, do you suppose that water applied to the outside of the body of a man can cleanse sin from his heart, which is within him?"

"I see it now, Massa, I see it," said Cato, placing his hand on his brow. "My heart be like de inside of dat bottle. Baptism no cleanse de inside. I will seek de power of de Holy Spirit to make my heart clean inside."

Thus, by means of an old ink-bottle, did the minister overthrow Cato's faith in baptismal regeneration, and led him to see the inward washing of which baptism is only the symbol.—Friendly Visitor.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XXI.

A CHILD'S VIEW OF THE PULPIT.

A few Sundays ago a little girl was taken to church in Norfolk, for the first time, with a strict injunction to be silent. For some time she obeyed in the most exemplary manner, till the clergyman was more than half way through morning prayer, when she thus audibly addressed the relative by whose side she was sitting:—"Aunt Elizabeth, you told me not to talk, but that man in the night-shirt has been talking ever since he got into that box." Effect on the congregation and on the man in his night-shirt left to the imagination.

AN INDIAN'S APPEAL TO THE POCKET.

In his "Afar in the Forest," Mr. Trail says that, not long since, at a missionary meeting in Hamilton, Canada West, John Sunday, native preacher, closed his speech thus:—"There is a gentleman who I suppose is now in this house. He is a very fine gentleman, but a very modest one. He does not like to show himself at these meetings. I do not know how long it is since I have seen him; he comes out so little. I am very much afraid he sleeps a great deal of his time when he ought to be out doing good. His name is Gold. Mr. Gold, are you here to-night, or are you sleeping in your iron chest? Come out, Mr. Gold. Come out and help us to do this great work—to preach the Gospel to every creature. Ah! Mr. Gold, you ought to be ashamed of yourself to sleep so much in your iron chest. Look at your white brother, Mr. Silver. He does a great deal of good while you are sleeping. Come out, Mr. Gold. Look, too, at your little brown brother, Mr. Copper. He is everywhere. Your poor little brown brother is running about doing all he can to help us. Why don't you come out, Mr. Gold? Well, if you won't show yourself, send us your shirt—that is, a bank-note."

A SLIGHT MISTAKE.

Notes and Queries vouches for this:—An eminent member of the Irvingite church was deputed to visit a doctor at R., who had expressed a desire for information concerning the tenets of that sect. Unfortunately there were at R. two doctors of the same name, and the divine of course went to the wrong one, who kept a private mad-house. He was shown into the sanctum, and announcing himself as the Angel of the Catholic Apostolic Church, specially sent by the apostle to Dr. T., he proceeded to unfold his mission. Dr. T. accustomed to the various forms of mental delusion, saw, or thought he saw, in the angel a very promising patient, and entered into the conversion scheme with great warmth, drawing out his unfortunate visitor to his heart's content. At length the time came for the angel metaphorically to use his wings, and, professing the greatest anxiety for Dr. T.'s spiritual welfare, he rose to go. Now was the time for the doctor to exert his skill in detaining his patient. He must not think of going yet; he must tarry there that night. The angel pleaded important engagements elsewhere, and even hinted at the possibility of missing his train. After an infinite amount of fencing and coquetry by both, and some flattering and felicitous allusion on the part of the doctor to the honour which would accrue to his humble roof by the entertainment of an angel, and finally to the rarity and infrequency of angelic visits, the patient in despair made a rush at the door; the doctor touched the bell, two warders entered the room, and, in spite of every argument, carried the poor man off to a cell, whence, to cut the story short, he was rescued on the morrow by his friends.

A CLERKLY ALTERATION.

The Pail Mall declares the following to be strictly true. Three Sundays ago, a parish clerk, finding himself embarked upon the enterprise of reading the responses, substituted one that day in honour of the Queen's accession for the "Venite, exultemus." The Prayer-book was an old one; the clerk knew that changes had been made in the sex of the sovereign since it was printed, and being thoroughly penetrated with the spirit of the institution to which he belonged, he read the last verse but one as follows:—"And blessed be the name of her Majesty for ever; and all the earth shall be filled with her Majesty. Amen and amen."

A DELICATE HINT.

Father Maillard, an eminent French preacher of the eighteenth century, preaching during the whole of Lent in a town where he was not once invited to partake of a morsel of dinner, he said, in his farewell sermon, "I have preached against every vice, except that of too much attachment to the pleasures of the table. This vice is by no means prevalent in a single person whom I address, and therefore I need not denounce it."

COST OF WAR.

M. LEROY-BEAULIEU, in his "Recherches sur les Guerres Contemporaines," calculates from various sources that in the wars of the fourteen years from 1853 to 1866 1,750,000 men were killed, and that it cost £1,913,000,000 sterling, or £1,093 a head to kill them. M. Leroy-Beaulieu does not quite put it in this way. The mortality is equal to the whole male population of Holland, or to the total numbers of the commercial and industrial workmen of France, while the treasure expended is nearly one-third of the estimated wealth of France, equals the computed savings of that country during fifty years, and is sixfold more than it cost to make all the French railways. Although almost for "peace at any price," M. Leroy-Beaulieu devotes a considerable portion of his book to well-merited abuse of the field-administration of all modern armies, and quotes some plain statistics on the subject from Dr. Chenu. Out of 95,615 deaths in the French army in the Crimea only 10,240 were killed. In the English army the proportions were 22,182 to 2,755, and it is scarcely credible that in the Sardinian forces only 12 were killed out of 2,194 deaths from all causes. In the American war of secession 180,000 died of disease to 97,000 from wounds; in the Italian campaign the mortality from disease exceeded that of the killed in action; and in the German war disease caused two deaths in the Prussian army to every one due to the enemy's fire.

INTELLIGENCE.

BOLTON.—The annual sermons on behalf of the Sunday and day-schools connected with the Bank-street Chapel were preached to large congregations on the morning and evening of Sunday last, by the Rev. Dr. Sadler, of Hampstead. In the afternoon, an address to the scholars and their parents was delivered by Mr. John Reynolds, of Bury. The day's collections amounted to £118. 6s. 6½d., which sum will be somewhat increased by one or two contributions from absent friends.

DUDLEY: BAYLIES' SCHOOL.—The annual examination of the most advanced scholars at this day-school was conducted on Thursday, the 8th inst., by the master, Mr. Ridgway, in the presence of from 60 to 70 visitors. The answering was considered very good. The Rev. M. Gibson delivered a short address at the close of the examination, and spoke very favourably of the present state of the school, as regards discipline and the progress of the scholars, who now number 226. He mentioned that the average attendance had been very good during the last 12 months, the number absent on the whole year being about five per cent.; but that during part of the year not even three per cent. were absent. He also stated that lately the average cost yearly of the clothing for the 50 boys on the foundation was £115. 13s. 1d., and that 50 had regularly been clothed since the school was established 137 years ago. Mr. Grainger then gave the prizes, 66 in number, to the boys; and after expressing the pleasure with which he had heard the examination and proposing a vote of thanks to the master, the whole school was dismissed for the holidays.

EXETER.—The annual meeting of the Assembly of the West of England Nonconformist Divines was held on Wednesday last at George's Meeting, Exeter. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. T. R. Dobson, of Sidmouth. The Rev. Kentish Bache, of Moretonhampstead, preached from Isaiah 55th chap., 11th verse, maintaining the divine inspiration of the Bible. The ministers and a few lay gentlemen afterwards dined together at the Clarence Hotel under the presidency of the Rev. T. W. Chignell, when a petition to the House of Lords, in support of the Irish Church Bill, was adopted, with one dissentient voice, the Rev. K. Bache expressing his entire disagreement with the petition, and his hostility to Mr. Gladstone's measure.

KINGSWOOD.—On Sunday last the annual sermons in aid of the day and Sunday-schools were preached by the Rev. John Wright, B.A., and collections made amounting to £35. 9s. On the following Monday the congregational meeting was held, Thomas Weston, Esq., in the chair. The Rev. J. Birks, minister, gave a brief report of church work during the past year. The congregation had steadily increased, now numbering 145 members. The day-school has over 60 scholars, and the Sunday-school 109 scholars and 17 teachers. All the connected institutions were in a healthy state. The Rev. J. Wright responded to a cordial vote of thanks for his services, and spoke to the sentiment of "Our colleges; may they send out men abreast of the times, intellectually and religiously in earnest." The Rev. Rees L. Lloyd, of Belper, gave an earnest and practical address on "Our literature; may it be powerful for good." After other addresses, the usual votes of thanks closed the meeting.

MOTTRAM.—On Sunday last the teachers, scholars, and friends, upwards of 500, had their annual procession through the town. By kind invitation they proceeded to the house and gardens of A. K. Sidebottom, Esq., J.P., and, after singing hymns, marched to the "Old Cross," where the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., gave a very effective address to the assembled crowd. In the evening, at the chapel, Messrs. W. Booth and A. Chorlton distributed 94 prizes for good conduct and regular attendance. Twenty-two scholars gained double prizes by attending 160 and 104 times. The collections defrayed expenses.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY: ANNUAL MEETING.—On Friday, the 9th inst., the annual meeting of this association was held in the schoolroom of the Unitarian Chapel, New Bridge-street, Newcastle; Mr. Joseph Clephan in the chair. The Secretary read the report for the past year, which stated that "The necessity for a new chapel at Barnard Castle has long been felt by the Unitarians in that district, and, in consequence of this, they have purchased a site in the centre of the town and in an open thoroughfare, and have also secured a schoolroom, where worship will be temporarily conducted. It is estimated that the cost of the building will be about £1,000. At Crook, the congregation have been able to secure a suitable room for worship and the education of the young. The services of the Rev. W. Brunton have been secured to take charge of the Middlebro' congregation, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of the last missionary. The Mission has also secured the services of the Rev. Thomas Leyland, of Manchester. An additional grant of £100 has been sent to the Mission by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. A large amount of activity has been displayed at the various mission stations, in connection with the Central Association, during the last year. The following is a return of the average attendance at the various stations in the district:—Crook: 31 adults, 30 children, and 5 teachers. Middlebro': Morning service, 25; evening, 40. Sunderland: Morning 26 and evening 50; 32 scholars and 4 teachers. Chopington: Morning 40 and evening 92, in addition to 66 scholars and 9 teachers. Barnard Castle: Morning 60 adults and 20 children. The new established book stalls have sold during the last year £40. 19s. 6d. worth of books. Several letters from missionaries were read, giving the character of the work of the mission. The finances are in a favourable state. The balance in the bank at the beginning of the year was £66. 11s. 11d., and the interest on investments amounted to £10, which with the subscriptions and contributions amounted to £334. 8s. 8d. The expenditure for the past year had been £350. 6s. 10d., leaving a balance in hand of £34. 1s. 10d."

On the motion of the Rev. J. C. Street, it was resolved, that this meeting expresses its deep regret at the death of the Rev. R. B. Aspland, who, for a long time, was the able and devoted secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. A vote of thanks to the chairman brought the proceedings to a close.

POOLE.—A bazaar was held on Tuesday week in the Temperance Hall, in aid of the Sunday-schools. It was opened at ten o'clock and a line of flags from the tower of the Unitarian Church to the top of the Hall, indicated that something more than usual was taking place. At six o'clock there was a public tea-party, after which the sale was resumed and continued during the evening. The attendance throughout the day was very fair, and the pecuniary result has been greater than was anticipated when the effort was first set on foot.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENT.

H. G.—We go to press on Thursday afternoon.

"SUNDAY-SCHOOL GOVERNMENT."

To the Editors,—"I was very much pleased to read Mr. Jackson's sensible letter, proving, as it must to all who will give it a few moments' attention, one of the strongest arguments in our favour that could have been brought forward. At first sight it might appear to destroy all necessity for the arguments hitherto used by H. R. and myself in our correspondence on this topic. But it only requires a little looking into, to put on it the interpretation I have just given.

That the Glasgow Sunday-school should be using the system advocated, and find it successful, and so useful in the working of their school, is, to me, a matter of the most sincere felicitation. But still there is this much to be said about Mr. Jackson's letter; that it should not be allowed for a moment to stop the present movement, if such it can be called, but should be made to furnish the strongest reasons for a continuance of the correspondence.

My own idea is that by a thorough ventilation of the subject in the columns of the Herald, it might be placed, week by week, fairly before our Sunday-schools, so that all the merits or demerits of such a plan might be fully discussed. And when that is done, it must, I suppose, be left for our schools to decide whether they will accept the plan, or at all events give it a trial, or at once thoughtlessly reject a measure which may prove in the end highly conducive to the well-being and well-doing of our schools.

I am happy to be able to say that some friends have already given the matter a little consideration, and I venture to submit a few hints that may be found valuable, and may add to the general usefulness of committees. In the first place, it seems to me, that the superintendent must be a member, and should be chairman, and also, that he should have a casting vote to decide upon any matters that might have an equal number of supporters and opposers. Secondly: In a great measure to preserve the strict concord that should always reign between congregation and chapel, that as many influential members of the congregation, as shall be in fair proportion to the number of non-office-holding teachers who serve on the committee, should be asked to join it.

Some may perhaps say that a committee is useless, and out of place in a small school of 150 or 200 children; but surely, if useful in a large school it would be no less so in a small one. The number of members would be, of course, adapted to the numerical strength of the school it is to govern.

It is (as stated by H. R.) generally found in our teachers' meetings that a great deal of desultory conversation takes place, which interferes with the work to be done. Now, were the work done by a committee, the teachers' meetings would still be held, but this conversation would not interfere so materially with the business of the school.

In conclusion, I, as one of the two correspondents alluded to by Mr. Jackson, have to assure him that, should future events prove it, I shall be only too glad to withdraw any of my statements that may have been unnecessary; but at present I cannot admit (even should "the credit of Unitarianism" be at stake, which I do not believe) that I have "overdrawn" my "picture."—Yours truly, Herne Bay, July 11, 1869. HENRY A. HALL.

IN REFERENCE

TO WINE it is a fact that many persons are pleased if they can say "We import our own." They have an impression that by so doing they not only get it cheaper but purer; and, besides, there is the honour of importing. They overlook altogether that those Foreign Dealers who seek them out are quite aware of this amiable weakness, and do not fail to take advantage of it to add some shillings to the price. To assist the impression they judiciously insinuate that their article is purer than what usually comes to England, and thus they lull that desire for comparison which would soon dispel the delusion.

These remarks apply specially to

GERMAN WINES,

And, in proof of them, we would ask those Gentlemen who buy such Wines to compare our

STILL HOCK AT

24s. ditto ditto " 28s.

32s. ditto ditto " 36s.

42s. ditto ditto " 48s. to 45s.

SPARKLING HOCK and MOSELE.

36s. with their own importing at 42s.

48s. ditto ditto " 54s. to 60s.

60s. and 66s. ditto ditto " 66s. to 80s.

Even supposing the value to be equal there is this advantage in buying here, that any quantity can be got when wanted; whereas, in importing, a quantity of money is locked up, probably for years, in an article not of every day consumption.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The following proclamation, issued by the Government at Pekin, seems to show that they understand the subject of religious freedom at least as well as some much nearer home:

"Be it known to all, that foreigners who propagate religion are not doing so unauthorisedly, but are allowed to do it at every place according to treaty, and may follow their avocation as allowed therein. Recently anonymous placards have been posted up about the streets of the city of Soochow, setting forth that all who enter their religion will be injured. Now intelligent men know that these statements are false; ignorant people may be induced to believe such things, and the people's minds will be stirred up and trouble come. To write anonymous placards is at any time illegal, and circulating such ought not to be. Therefore we, the three Hens, again prohibit the same. The literati and people ought to know that where there are foreigners there are also chapels or churches, and if natives become church members, they do so voluntarily, and are not forced. From this day let every one mind his own business, and not talk about things which are vain and to no purpose, but only cause disturbances. If any one dare to disobey this proclamation, such person will be ferreted out and severely punished."

A Petersburg correspondent of the Daily News informs us of a great ecclesiastical revolution which the Czar, being the head of the Church in Russia, has just effected by a stroke of the pen. Hitherto the ministerial or priestly office in the Russo-Greek Church has been hereditary; it will be so no longer. It became so about the time of Peter the Great; and as marriage is almost as indispensable to a Russian priest as celibacy to a Roman one, it has ever since been increasing in numbers and poverty, until it became the chief business of the bishops to devise means for feeding the inferior clergy; and the Church was simply an institution for providing for the wants of those hereditarily attached to its service. The priesthood was never recruited from the ranks of the rich and the educated, and its degradation was necessarily constant. Now there is to be a new distribution of parishes on the basis of population, each of which will be served only by an incumbent and a "psalmist," the office of deacon being abolished, except in cathedral towns. The vested interests of the dispossessed priests have been carefully considered. Other ecclesiastical reforms are in contemplation; this one is called the "Emancipation of the Clergy."

In a despatch of the 2nd of July, Count Beust defines the basis on which alone a good understanding between the Courts of Vienna and Rome is possible. It declares that the most essential stipulations of the Concordat have become impossible of execution in Austria; that the privileged position which this compact gave to the clergy can no longer be conceded to them, and that it is a mere illusion for the reactionary party to hope to win back any of their old power by a change of ministers. "Rome must, above all things, resolve not to regard Austria as a country which is exclusively destined to be subservient to the views of the Holy See." What has been possible in other countries like France and Belgium "without leading to a rupture with Rome must also be possible in Austria. This is the first fundamental rule, from which the Government as well as the people are determined not to recede." No wonder that "the Holy Father appears anxious," and that he should have told the prelates of his Court the other day that "he needed to pray fervently, for grave dangers threatened the Holy See."

A Cardinal, too, has come from Naples to Rome to ask advice how he is to act in regard to the Anti-Council, proposed by the Deputy Ricciardi. At first it was made light of, but it is said now that it will be attended by a number of authors and savants from Germany and England, and the Holy See has recommended the Cardinal to publish a mandate, commanding his flock to keep aloof from it under pain of excommunication.

It is reported that the subjects to be discussed at the Ecumenical Council are these:—1. Pantheism, Naturalism, and absolute Rationalism. 2. Modified Rationalism. 3. Indifferentism and Tolerance. 4. Socialism, Communism, Secret Societies, Bible Societies, and Clerical Liberal Societies. 5. Errors with respect to the Church and her rights. 6. Errors with respect to civil society in itself, and in its relation to the Church. 7. Errors with respect to Natural and Christian Morals. 8. With respect to Christian Marriage. 9. With respect to the Sovereignty of the Roman Pope. 10. With respect to Modern Liberalism.

The last decree of the Index illustrates well the way in which they do things at Rome. It interdicts a work on moral philosophy published by a bishop of Rio Janeiro 30 years ago, and enjoins the author to make submission though he has been dead six years. Perhaps, however, as the Pope's power extends to Purgatory, he may still have some influence over him.

The North German Correspondence states that the Jewish Theological Society, which consists of some of the most learned rabbis in Germany and Austria, in a late sitting at Breslau, resolved to prepare an Encyclopedia of the Talmud in order to facilitate the study of that work.

A correspondent of the English Independent, who has just returned from a visit to Spain, and thinks that the time is most favourable for evangelistic effort, says there are only five really Protestant pastors among the Spaniards, two in Madrid, and one each in Seville, Malaga, and Cordova. There are three other Spanish Protestant agents or evangelists, and several colporteurs who sell the Scriptures and converse with the people. There are also three English gentlemen in Madrid, and an agent of the Wesleyans in Barcelona, who are doing good service in the cause of truth. One or two chaplains of the English Episcopal Church are also faithful to Protestantism; but others are High Churchmen, and are a greater hindrance than help to true religion. He believes that, as anything now may be printed in Spain, till more Spanish preachers are raised up, a great work might be done by a judicious and energetic use of the press, which at present teems with politics and trifles.

Mr. Cassels, who was arrested at the instigation of the priests of Oporto, and charged with causing several individuals to assemble on various occasions to insult the Roman Catholic religion, has been tried and acquitted; and it is expected that the present Liberal Government will presently bring in a Bill for altering the penal code so far as it relates to religious worship, and thus give Portugal the liberty now enjoyed by almost every other European State.

The Weekly Register (R. C.) learns from an authentic source that "seven or eight Anglican clergymen have determined to proceed to Rome in December next, for the purpose of attending the General Council, and obtaining from the assembled bishops an authoritative opinion respecting the validity or otherwise of their orders. Every endeavour will also be made to form a union between a large number of Anglicans and the Catholic Church. These gentlemen have already put themselves in communication with several of the authorities at Rome, and have met with every encouragement; they have determined to ask one of the English Catholic bishops to be their spokesman before the Council."

The Westminster Gazette (R. C.) learns, on reliable authority, that the Marquis of Bute has promised £2,000 to a Catholic Literary Society which is about to be formed.

The Pall Mall thinks that the Rev. Mr. Purchas, of Frighton, must be a most singular personage. Besides all the other wonderful ceremonies which he has introduced into his church, and for which he is about to be tried before the Court of Archbishops, he is charged with "rubbing black powder on members of the congregation." This certainly is the most incomprehensible development of Ritualism that ever amazed the bewildered Protestant mind. What can the process possibly be? What is the black powder itself? And when is it rubbed on members of the congregation? It is to be supposed that the members are themselves parties to the proceeding; but whereabouts are they rubbed? On their faces, their hands, or on some part of their clothes? But however that may be, there can be no longer any wonder that the Frighton mind should have been seriously discomposed by the introduction of a system of worship which takes such extremely novel forms.

In a letter to the Guardian, the Rev. R. Parker says he attended evensong at St. Peter's, London Dock, when the preacher, Mr. Mackonochie, carried in his hand from the chancel to the pulpit a bouquet of flowers, placed the bouquet on the pulpit during the sermon, and when the sermon was concluded carried the bouquet back again to his seat in the chancel; and the incumbent of St. Peter's also held a bouquet in his hand when he went to place the offerings of the congregation on the communion table. Now, while grateful to those who are seeking to bring home the truths of the gospel to our large town populations, Mr. Parker cannot help asking, "in the name of common sense, what good end can be gained by this bouquet mania? How can it be described better than by the significant term 'young-ladyism'?"

The Rev. Mr. Mackonochie, in a letter addressed to his St. Alban's congregation, informs them that the party with which he is associated do not intend to leave the Church of England, but that they are "going to fight as long as we have breath in us for the full acceptance in the Church of England of the Catholic teaching which she has received through her forefathers in a tradition of eighteen centuries from our Lord himself." We should like to see the proofs.

A pleasing illustration of the good feeling which now prevails on the part of some Church of England clergymen towards their brethren in the Nonconformist ministry appears in a published letter of the Rev. J. H. Iles, rector of St. Peter's Church, Wolverhampton. The Congregational Union of England and Wales is to hold its autumnal meetings in that town next October, when the number of ministers and delegates in attendance will probably be about 700. The rector accordingly expresses his desire to avail himself of that opportunity "to return some of that hospitality which was so readily afforded by Nonconformists" at the Church Congress there. "Should the time of your meeting," he writes to the Rev. T. G. Horton, "not clash with any other engagement, I shall be ready to offer board and lodging to any two guests whom the committee may send to us." This is as it should be between fellow-disciples of the same loving Master.

As we augured would be the case, the University Tests Bill has proved too liberal a measure for the Lords, and, almost without giving it the least consideration, they have rejected it by a majority of 37. Well, we can afford to wait. Time fights for us. Some of the Peers talked of a compromise, but people are getting sick of compromises and half-measures, and we must now insist more strongly on perfect equality for all denominations.

The Rev. Philip Hains, of Wigan, has been punished for his support of Mr. Gladstone and the Irish Church Bill by the withdrawal of the aid hitherto given him for the support of a curate by the Curates' Aid Society. Mr. Hains says of the Society that "supported by hundreds or thousands of the Liberal party, abandoning the holy purpose for which it was distinctively constituted, sinking into the bitter arena of party politics, it is now lending its influence and misusing its income of £40,000 a year, for political purposes, by throwing all its weight on the side of the present Opposition to Her Majesty's Government."

The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London are both taking steps to prevent, if possible, what has been called the "schismatical confirmations" by the Bishop of Carlisle of Episcopalians in Scotland, who, rejecting the Scotch bishops, go to the nearest English bishop for confirmation. We wonder whether this practice has made any difference in the spiritual result.

In the dispute between Dr. Colenso and the Bishop of Capetown relative to the possession of the cathedral of Pietermaritzburg, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has decided in favour of the former. The building is declared to be vested in the Bishop of Natal, and the rival Bishop, Mr. Macrorie, must therefore be provided by his supporters with a new church.—The heretical bishop has refused to recognise Mr. Green any longer as Dean, and has appointed the Rev. R. Gray in his place; and the orthodox bishop has appointed an archdeacon of urban in the person of the Rev. S. Robinson, of St. John's College, Cambridge. We fear there is little prospect at present of the Zulus exclaiming, "See, how these Christians love one another!"

The indications of religious progress, which are now so apparent, must be perplexing to conservative theologians. On Friday evening there was a public discussion in the large Temperance Hall, at Lancaster, the subject of debate being, "The Bible versus Total Abstinence." A clergyman of the Established Church and a Baptist minister were the debaters. It must have appeared strange to the uninitiated, to hear both the Oxford divine and the London University M.A. refuse to take the authorised translation of the Scriptures as correct, appeal to the Greek text, and offer a more exact rendering. Though the charges of admission were high, and the evening intensely hot, before the doors had been long open, there were about 1,000 persons, of all sects and classes, seated in the Hall. As the Committee were convinced there would be a large and excited meeting, they were anxious to have a chairman who could keep order, and they at once agreed to ask the Rev. J. C. Lunn, our respected minister, to preside, believing in his competency and impartiality. Here was another mark of progress, seeing that the argument was to be Scriptural. By a few well-chosen sentences he gave a high tone to the meeting, so that it was the quietest that has been held in Lancaster for a long time; and, at the close, a vote of thanks was accorded to him, which showed appreciation of the judgment which he had displayed in restraining excited feelings.

A large majority of the Lords (78), among whom were the Archbishops of Canterbury, York, and Dublin, and nine other prelates have set themselves in direct opposition to a still larger majority of the Commons, respecting the preamble of the Irish Church Bill, involving its very principle, which declared that no part of the surplus left, after providing for ecclesiastical interests, should be applied to any religious purposes. What course Mr. Gladstone, who has had to bear no little insolence from some of the Lords, will think it right to take under the circumstances, our readers will have learnt before the Herald comes into their hands.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In noticing the prospects of the Œcumenical Council, the Spectator says:

"If Romanism really wins by invading thus boldly the sphere of progress, which science and freedom have conquered painfully from the Church during near four centuries of conflict, the genuine Catholic and the genuine Protestant alike will regard it as a miracle,—the former in his behalf, the latter for his confusion. If Romanism loses,—loses disastrously, as we all confidently expect,—by this attempt to strain an already cracking cord,—it is certain that all the hesitating Roman Catholics and many of the more candid of the unhesitating Roman Catholics will recognise their grave error in thus kicking against the pricks of a Providence far more conspicuous and sure than any grounds on which they can possibly base a fallible belief in infallibility. It is only the tremblers on either side who have anything to fear,—who have not very much indeed to hope."

We have on several occasions given specimens of the kind courtesies which are exchanged between the two great parties in the Established Church, but we scarcely remember any that comes up to the following, which occurs in a notice in the Union Review of a sermon on "The ceremonies of the Church," by one of the other school:

"The Rev. Thomas Jackson, rector of St. Mary's, Stoke Newington, and father of the writer, started a donkey-show in his neighbourhood some time ago. This sermon suggests that he was moved thereto by the selfish but reasonable hope of winning the first prize with an animal of his own breeding."

Two passages in the debates on the Irish Church Bill, last Friday night, which were loudly cheered, are worth transcribing as showing the direction in which the current of thought is setting as regards religious establishments. Referring to the scheme of "concurrent endowment," Mr. Bright said:

"I am not saying that it might not be politically just to make some such change as some members here would wish, and as the House of Lords would wish; but I say, without fear of contradiction, that the opposition to the endowment of any church is growing rapidly and steadily in this country; and I beg to say that it is quite a mistake to argue that that opinion is only found among the Nonconformist body." Within the limits of the Established Church itself the opinion against the extended endowments, and the opinion against the endowment of the Catholic Church, is growing and strengthening every day."

And Mr. Gladstone, defending himself and his supporters from the charge of being enemies of the Church, thus concluded one of his speeches:

"In my deep conviction, if mischief has been done to the vital spirit of the Church; nay, if mischief has been done to the cause of establishment in these discussions, it has been done chiefly by those who have described to us, in language which I believe to be unfounded, and all must admit to be exaggerated, the grievous and enervating effect, which, as they state, the establishment has on the faith, the zeal, and the love of the members of a religious communion. So that when we point to this or that religious community, be it Roman Catholic, be it Protestant Episcopalian, be it Wesleyan Methodist, Independent, or Presbyterian, in this or that country of the world, we are always answered by some appeal stating that these were voluntary societies which had not undergone the enfeebling and almost emasculating influence to which, as a religious body, the Protestant Church in Ireland was subject. A distinguished prelate, speaking of the provision of the laity for spiritual ministrations from their own resources, said before the day of dissolution had come, before this proposition was made, 'the Irish lay Churchmen were less prepared for this, less informed of their duty, less willing to do it, than the laymen of any other Church or religious denomination in the world.' Well, if matters have reached that pass, it may hereafter prove that we, after all, if it be our duty and destiny to strip the establishment of its trappings, are not the worst friends of its inner essence. As to the professions of its incapacity to cope with the proud organisation of the Roman Church I repel them with all my heart and soul; and if I did not repel them I would say, for myself, that if such be the Church to which we belong, so destitute of inherent life and vigour, the sooner we quit it the better, and seek refuge for heart and mind in some other communion possessed of a more true vitality. Sir, I confess, for my own part, and I wish to state it without offence—I do not in the least degree resent those demonstrations of incredulity which I see on the countenances of some—but I cannot help placing on record against those demonstrations and those disheartening predictions my solemn protest—the expression of my humble, yet not altogether otherwise than confident expectation that, although I admit there will be a crisis to pass through, though I admit there will be difficulties to encounter, and efforts to be made, and trials to be undergone; yet, before many years have rolled over our heads, the time may come when the members of the disestablished Church of Ireland may point to the day of the passing of this Act, and declare that that day, and none other, was the day of their religious regeneration."

Dean Ramsey, who is Secretary to the Scottish Episcopal Church, writes to the Guardian to protest against that Church being held up in terrorem, as it has been in recent debates by the bishops, to prove the failure of the voluntary principle. "The Scottish Church," he says, "has now struggled on since her disestablishment upon the voluntary system, and, although she has had her difficulties and shortcomings in financial resources, still it would be both unfair and ungenerous to represent what has been done here as a failure and as a beacon for a warning." It has seven bishops and 173 clergy, and by the voluntary principle the bishops are now secured an income of £500 a year, and in some instances with suitable episcopal residences. The incomes of many of the incumbents are above £400 a year, and half have good parsonages. They hope soon to make up the minimum income of the poorer chapels to £150 a year. Within the last 25 years several substantial and handsome episcopal churches have been erected in different parts of the country, some of them at a cost of not less than £5,000, £6,000, or £7,000. Trinity College has been erected during that period, at a large cost; and since 1863 a sum of nearly £60,000 has been raised for episcopal and parochial endowments. The Church Society, besides an annual income of about £3,000, has a capital stock of above £20,000. The Dean evidently thinks, and not without reason, that the voluntary principle has not worked so badly in Scotland.

It is a pity that when he went to school the parents of the editor of the John Bull did not pay the extra twopence for him. This is a specimen, out of several recent ones, of his manners:

"The Bishop of St. David's and Dr. Davidson are at the two opposite poles of the social world. The Bishop sits in the House of Lords, is endowed with a large income, enjoys a very considerable share of worldly honour. The Nonconformist is out in the cold, and has been turned out of some infinitesimal by small professorship, which he once held in some Dissenting college, by the cheese-mongers and butter-dealers who probably formed its governing body."

The Month (R. C.), in a review of Dr. Pusey's "Second Part of the Eirenicon," after many charges against him, comes to this conclusion:

"Neither by this, nor by twenty more similar portions of an Eirenicon, will Dr. Pusey really promo'e the cause of union, as long as he avoids the great essential points of controversy between Rome and England, takes his own position for granted, and expects his opponents to take it for granted also."

The Evangelicals who made the Bishops their trust are thrown into a state of mingled wrath and sadness by their behaviour in regard to the "Irish Church Robbery Bill," and seem half inclined to help in driving them from the House of Lords. In the Rock, for instance, we read:—"It will now become a question, and a most grave and solemn question, for the Protestant people of Eng'nd and to consider the propriety of maintaining bishops in the House of Lords." And it asks, "Do our bishops sit there to maintain the rights of their order? If so, they have betrayed them. Do they sit there to maintain the cause of the established religion which they profess? This too they have betrayed with the spirit of a craven, and with a baseness that has no parallel in the annals of Paganism. Do they sit there as the guardians of the Protestant interests of a Protestant empire? These too they have betrayed, and not only betrayed, but have thrown the full weight of their position and power into the opposing scale of Popery." But the Rock has one poor source of consolation left. A short time since Mr. Gladstone was a Judas; now, the said Judas is to be found on the Episcopal bench. "Let us remember that the traitor who betrayed our Lord was even one of the Twelve Apostles; and certainly we have lived to see a curious illustration of the doctrine of Apostolic succession, even in our House of Peers."

The Examiner had recently an excellent article, in which it supposed the case of an unsophisticated person, having studied Christianity in the New Testament only and for the first time, who is anxious to discover a system under which the religion of Christ is taught in accordance with the honest, untwisted drift and meaning of the gospel. Where could he find such an ideal church? If he went to the Church of Rome, "he would probably say that if Christianity was really there, it must be hidden under the arts of the tailor and the pyrotechnist." To such an inquirer "Roman Catholicism would not represent the Christianity of the New Testament, which gives freedom by releasing the mind from the impositions of all authority, except the authority of the enlightened conscience, the voice of God in the soul." If he went to the Church of England, "he could not blink the fact that the English system was at best a poor adaptation of Romanism, from which it sprung, with nearly all the old assumption of authority and pretence of infallibility, though with less of the sensuous splendour and pantomimic fee-fo-fummery of ceremonialism." Though Christ is not here hustled aside by his mother and a host of dubious saints, yet "manifestly the mere physical machine of the English Church overtops, if it does not overshadow, the tender personality of the Redeemer. Christianity is all very well, good enough, indeed, for Lissenters, but for the devotees of Episcopal Orthodoxy the Church is everything—the Church with her creeds, articles, and growing ritual, all floating, in spite of the Reformation, in a thin mist of tradition, which is sufficiently thick to mislead the simple and disgust the strong—the simple going often to the Roman fold for protection; the strong into the unvalled, star-roofed church of the wilderness." His inquirer, our contemporary thinks, would fare little better in Scotland, the churches of which are "exclusive"—where people "have the amplest freedom to agree, but not the slightest freedom to differ." Were he to try Congregationalism, he would find "a nearer approximation to a fairer, freer, and wider idea of a true church." "Congregationalism does not shut the Bible against the better understanding of the divine oracles, and it does not gag the mouth of the critic and the inquirer with any unalterable preconception of the Divine mind. It is exceedingly popular in its system of government, and appears to be as near an approach, as one can conceive, to a church of the people, by the people, and for the people." Still, "it just falls short of what the poor wanderer is in search of." "It does not mean to be exclusive; but, in spite of the best intentions, it is exclusive. It is not content with simple human goodness and purity of life in those who wish to become members; they must hold certain definite opinions on a few points before admission can be achieved." We need hardly say that if this "unsophisticated inquirer" were to extend his visit to us, he would be subjected to no inquisition respecting his creed, and be allowed, by us "the amplest freedom to differ, as well as to agree."

To Mr. Hinton's letter, which will be found in another part of our paper, the Spectator makes only this brief reply:

"We never doubted that the clergy of the Establishment are both more open to charges of personal bigotry and to charges of personal latitudinarianism than the clergy of the Dissenters,—indeed, that follows from what we did maintain, that they are more personally independent of their congregations, more personally free to follow the bent of their own convictions. Amongst Dissenters, men of power and genius can carry their congregations with them, and keep them loyal in times of ecclesiastical suspicion, but the average men are in the hands of their people."

If, by being "in the hands of the people," he means that they dare not think freely on theological subjects for fear of their congregations, we venture to set our knowledge against his, and assert the charge to be unfounded. For one branch of Dissenters, at least, we can distinctly affirm that they are never so well pleased as when their ministers speak out fully and fearlessly the truths, whether moral or religious, which they have to declare. The Spectator wisely omits all reference to the primary object of Mr. Hinton's letter, which was to draw attention to the "great, constant, pervading social injustice and injury which have hitherto proved themselves inseparable from Church Establishments." This, we imagine, the Spectator found to be an accompaniment of them too patent to deny.

In regard to the sub-section dealing with politico-religious questions to be submitted to the Ecumenical, which is justly exciting the suspicion of several of the German States, the Pall Mall says:

"One thing is positive, that this sub-section is under the presidency of Cardinal Reisach, than whom there is no more ardent fanatic and devotee to the Civiltà Cattolica. But will the bishops then tamely acquiesce in what will be asked of them? Voices will, it is hoped, be raised in protest in the assembly and then these voices will be sure to awaken others, for liberty of debate cannot be withheld. No doubt liberty of speech is an indispensable prerogative of any council not a sham; but to those who reckon on the warrant of sacred right to secure them against despotic encroachments by a Holy Father, we would recount a little fact that happened in 1854. There was then also a question of promulgating a dogma dear to the heart of its promoters, and the bishops had been worked assiduously as now, until they were all as soft as butter. There was then also a so-called deliberative assembly professing gravely and conscientiously to discuss pros and cons, the conclusion being all the while foregone. And moreover, there was then in Rome one Abbé Laborde who was innocent enough to believe words were meant to be taken at their sense, and accordingly begged to be allowed to state, not at all his dissent from, but merely the grounds on which he desired further argument in behalf of, the proposed dogma. Abbé Laborde received the following reply: He was then and there taken neck and crop and forcibly expelled from Rome."

AMERICAN NOTES.

Dr. Bushnell has some good remarks on trying to communicate more religion to children, and trying less to teach them about it. He says:

"It appears to me that we hold this Sunday-school work in a very light way, such as demands a kind of re-institution to put it on a right footing. The unfortunate word 'school' appears to let up, a good deal, the pressure of Christian ideas. Who teaches, in what manner, with how much or little responsibility, is not so much considered, save by a specially conscientious few. And the work is a good deal secularised to the children; as if the making up of a good time for them were a considerable part of the plan. The jolly, no-religion songs, the amusing stories and droll illustrations that illustrate nothing, the uncaring manner of the memorising, school-training recitations—all these produce, when taken together, an atmosphere of general unchristianity. As it was and still is the manner of parents to bring up their children for a future conversion, so the vice creeps in here of teaching only for some future benefit, and letting everything stop short, by consent, of touching the main thing. Palestine is taught, the mountains round about Jerusalem, Jerusalem about the temple and the cross, and all that is about God, but not God Himself. It is not expected that the children will know God Himself, but something about Him. And there is, in fact, a secret assumption that no such thing is possible. The true knowledge of God, as in friendship, is possible to adults, but not to children; whereas, the real fact is, that children are a great deal more capable of it. The boy-child, Samuel, could hear the call when old Eli could not. Children may not think the Gospel experiences as well, but they can have them a great deal more easily. Tell the child how present God is, how loving He is, how close by He is in all good thoughts, and he will take the sense a great deal better than the adult soul, that is gone a-doubting so far, and has speculated his mind half away in the false intellectualities mis-called reason. Ah! my friends, 'Of these, of such is the kingdom of heaven;' so Christ says, and we make almost nothing of it. These children can make room for more Gospel than we, and take in all most precious thoughts of God more easily. The very highest and most spiritual things are a great deal closer to them than to us. Let us not wonder and not be offended if they break out in hosannas on just looking in the face of Jesus, when the great multitude of priests and apostles are dumb, along the road, as the ass on which he rides."

The Broad Churchmen in the States have started an organ called the Living Church, which, judging from the two numbers that have appeared, promises well. Some of the ablest ministers of the school are among its contributors. According to an article in the second number, one of its main objects is to bring the Church into closer practical relations with the reformatory movements of the day, and make it more of a social power than it has hitherto been in America.

The Chicago Tribune thinks that amongst the good results of the completion of the Pacific Railroad will be the settlement of the question of Polygamy in Utah, from meddling with which Congress has so long shrunk. It says the miners, who have up to the present time been kept out of the territory by Brigham Young's prohibitions, will now pour in in such numbers as to make his prohibitions useless. While, doubting whether, as the Tribune imagines, a mining population is likely to be particularly disgusted by Brigham Young's "sensuality," we can easily see how they may object to the unfairness of giving many wives to the few, and leaving the many wifeless. It appears, too, that Young's discontented subjects are, in considerable numbers, availing themselves of the railroad to escape from under his power.

A Western paper, announcing the illness of its editor, adds, "All good regular paying subscribers are requested to mention him in their prayers; others need not, as the prayers of the wicked avail nothing."

Referring to the practice of suspending the services in many of the churches during the heat of summer, the Liberal Christian says:—"The church is usually quite as cool a place as there is in the city or town, and people can keep as comfortable there as anywhere if they will dress in a comfortable way. We have very little patience with the religion which exists at the mercy of the thermometer, and has to ask the weather for permission to be. It sometimes seems as though the temperature had become the worst enemy of the Church, and that the climate would finally extirpate the last vestige of organised Christianity. The fathers could go to church through heat and cold and snow and blast, and sit in upright and uncushioned pews where their feet barely touched the floor, without fire in the Winter or blinds to keep out the Summer sun, listening to sermons often an hour and a half in length, and prayers of half an hour, counting it a duty and a luxury both in one. But we cannot attend one of our beautiful and splendidly furnished churches, made attractive with every convenience and comfort which art can devise and money procure, if the mercury sinks below twenty or rises above eighty, or if it snows a little, or threatens to rain, or the wind blows a trifle too strong. We are not complaining of the people, but stating the fact that most ministers hold their congregations at the mercy of the elements, and write their sermons with the inspiring knowledge that should Sunday happen to be a little too hot, or too cool, or too wet, or too dry, for their sensitive and finely fastidious congregations, they will have nobody in particular to hear them."

To the account we gave a fortnight ago of the Seventy Thousand dollars collection at Chicago, we may add the following extract from a letter to the Liberal Christian:—"There was a certain readiness in subscriptions promised conditionally, or without condition, by generous men; but the thing most precious was the way in which the congregation responded after that, sending up its contributions from ten dollars to five hundred, sending them up with tears and prayers, sending all they could spare on their own account, and then finding somehow that they could not be content until they had given for their children too, and so giving, and giving again, until all danger of having to sell a pew, or to be troubled more than we ought to be by the debt, was lifted clean away, and we sang the Doxology with a glorious gladness that seemed like the joy unspeakable. Since then there has been a dropping fire, the heaviest of five hundred, and the lightest, though the weightiest still before God, of twenty dollars, from a poor woman in Scotland that Unity Church befriended, and who could not rest until she had spared this out of her poverty, and sent it on with her grateful love. One gift was a hundred and twenty acres of land. If anybody wants to buy a farm that must prosper, they had better buy this. And when all was done, there came a letter from great-hearted Alfred Putnam, of Brooklyn, to the minister, saying, 'If you find that your debt is going to be more than you can manage, come right down here and tell us what you want, and what to do, and we will help to pull you through.'"

The Widow Van Cott, the celebrated Methodist preacher, has caused quite a sensation in New York. The World thus describes her appearance in the pulpit:

"The widow looked her very best. Her hair was fixed and frizzled in the most becoming fashion. Her face glowed with a modest but conscious splendour as she stood before the congregation in her rich but tasteful black dress of bombazine. She wore a neat black jet ornament at her throat, and a handsome gold chain peeped from the black belt around her waist. Her large blue eyes were filled with a holy light, and her massive and finely formed head was lifted as she read the Gospel of Matthew with self-satisfaction and oratorical effect. Every word that she uttered was delivered with unction and telling force. There is considerable power and attraction in the manner in which the widow lifts her smooth white hand and nicely-rounded fingers to the ceiling, and then brings them down with energy on the wooden shelf of the pulpit. When warmed to her subject her face seems lighted up and full of stirring animation. Her face in happy moments contracts and expands, and her handsomely shaped body sways to and fro with the excitement. Her elocution is natural and florid, and her sentences uttered in a bass tone voice. Her illustrations of the Scriptures last night were remarkable for their force, and sharply to the point in discussion. The widow is about twenty-six years of age, and bears her age well."

"THE PEOPLE AND THE PULPIT."

THERE is always a freshness and vigour in the utterances of our leading American Unitarians which leads us to read with interest what they have to say on the great religious topics of the time. And accordingly we have welcomed a recent number of the Boston Christian Register which contained the address of the Rev. J. F. W. WARE, of Baltimore, to the alumni of the Cambridge Divinity School, the American equivalent of our M. N. C. Our friends across the water, in place of having addresses from a few permanent Visitors in rotation, invite from year to year various of their leading men—sometimes laymen, sometimes ministers—to give them. The subject of Mr. WARE's address was "The People and the Pulpit."

We have often remarked on the essential similarity of the religious problems which are troubling our American brethren and those with which we have to grapple in this country, and among them is the question of the ministry. There, as here, the ministry, in this age of transition, holds a doubtful place. It is not a priesthood, yet what is it? Its worthiest representatives shrink from regarding it as a profession, yet the number of men in it who are mere professionals seems to make the higher word vocation inappropriate. Between the higher grade of life which retains the old traditional regard for the institutions of religion, and the lowest which has lost all care even for religion itself, Mr. WARE finds a middle element—the ordinary masculine mind, which he thinks is a “distinctively religious mind,” but which is to-day “in revolt against the institutions of religion,” and his address is devoted to considering what it is which is needed in the ministry, in order that it may do its true work among this class.

He puts first of all a manly character, not merely, however, as at the back of, and as the foundation of, the ministerial character, but as distinguished from it. Men are tired he says of the ministerial character “as they are of the clerical garb.” The men of this generation think that professionalism has dispossessed and eaten out the man. Whatever any other man may wear or do or be, the minister should wear and do and be.

In the second place, he thinks that great changes are required in regard to preaching. He quotes with strong relish F. W. ROBERTSON'S word to working-men :

“Count yourselves happy that your life-calling is to do, and not to chatter. The talker is to my mind, by necessity, the smallest of human souls. His soul must ever dwindle, dwindle, dwindle, for he utters great feelings in words instead of deeds, and so satiates his need of utterance, the need of all.”

The day for the elaborate scholarly sermon planned by square and rule, and written with laborious precision, is past. “The sermon for to-day must have just that vigour in it which study and polish are sure to kill.” Mr. WARE, however, is very much more emphatic as to what preaching is not to be than as to what it is to be. The sermon is not to be a theological essay. Men do not want discussions even of “the great questions up.” But, when we seek anxiously for the positive element in very nearly a column devoted to the amplification of these negatives, all we can find is some strong but vague rhetoric about men wanting something “that shall be helpful to the building up in themselves of the divine life.” On one point, however, though it is not a large one, he gives no uncertain sound. The pulpit, as an article of church furniture, must go with all other clerical properties.

“The preacher must come out from it and be separate from the unclean thing. Why has it not long ago utterly killed both the truth and us? The enemy must have devised it with that hope. To it more than all else we owe tone and drone. Fancy a lawyer pleading for the life of a client cooped up in such a thing; fancy a politician trying to carry his party, the orator or lecturer to hold an assembly, standing behind a pulpit. It were death to them. Fancy Paul preaching at Athens, or Christ at Jerusalem, behind this clerical barricade. It is all the difference between the dungeon and liberty. The sermon must be got upon the platform, and in that one word, perhaps, you have best my idea of what it must become—absolutely, unequivocally popular—a word of life untrammelled, that shall go bounding and crashing as the words of the orator do.”

Mr. WARE'S last point is that while the minister is to be less and less a talker, he must be more and more a worker, and not only a worker himself but the cause of work in others. He expresses a hope that sometime the “theological school may have a professorship of work—that young men may graduate with some executive faculty, and be prepared to help their people to go at something.” It is only fair to add that Mr. WARE strongly deprecates the idea that he would lower the standard of ministerial education :

“Life, which has taught me to despise much to which men limit the idea and province of education, has taught me that no man can be too thoroughly equipped for the stress and emergency of this calling. I believe in scholarship, and that we have not enough of it. I took with me into the world the Cambridge idea of our intellectual superiority, to find my mistake. If we had it once we have not got it now. Our superiority is not in intellectual things, but in the liberty of inquiry—I cannot quite say the liberty of opinion. No scholar myself, and working another vein, I more and more feel that we need scholars and culture in our ranks; but I believe, as never before, that everything scholarly, except as it illustrates some great truth of life, is worse than lost in the pulpit. Much that well may interest the minister should never go there. Culture we cannot away with; but in the pulpit it must be culture subsidiary to the inmost want of the hearer. Culture that emasculates or overlays a truth is the Gospel's foe.”

There is much in all this that is interesting and suggestive, and so far as Mr. WARE deals with the positive side of his subject no one will find much to differ from. The great want of the age in the ministry is, as he says, men, but whether the real manly character is incompatible with the ministerial character is a much more difficult question, and one on which we cannot quite agree with him. We are inclined to think that altogether too much importance is ascribed in America, as by many people here, to the supposed hindrances to religious influence of the various conventionalities which have become associated with ministerial life and speech. This week, however, we have desired to give the pith of Mr. WARE'S thought—next week we will give our own fuller comments.

UPPER BROOK-STREET CHAPEL, MANCHESTER.

At a meeting of the congregation, held in the chapel, on Sunday, July 18th, 1869, the Rev. W. H. Herford, B.A., in the chair, the following resolution was passed unanimously :

“That the congregation of Protestant Dissenters meeting for worship in Upper Brook-street Chapel, Manchester, desire to present to Miss Tayler the assurance of their most heartfelt sympathy in her late bereavement; while they deplore the death of the late Rev. J. J. Tayler, B.A., so long the pastor of their church, and the beloved friend of many of them, as an irreparable loss, not only to themselves personally, but to the whole denomination, and to the cause of pure religion and enlightened theology in this country.”

The following resolution was also passed unanimously :

“That we, the congregation of Protestant Dissenters assembling in Upper Brook-street Chapel, desire to convey to Henry Bowman, Esq., and the rest of the family of the late Eddowes Bowman, Esq., M.A., the expression of our sincere sympathy in their loss; and at the same time to acknowledge the debt of gratitude which we owe to him for having, during 14 years, conducted the affairs of the congregation as its Chapel-warden with such unwearied zeal and fidelity, and with such unflinching generosity and kindness.

“And they would also gratefully record their very high appreciation of the further proof of his great sympathy and kindness by his munificent legacy of one thousand pounds, free of duty, ‘to be applied for the benefit of the congregation or minister of the said chapel in such manner as the Trustees for the time being of such chapel may deem expedient, and for which legacy or sum the receipt of such treasurer for the time being shall be a sufficient discharge.’”

A CHANCELLOR ON ESTABLISHMENTS.

In his diary Mr. Crabb Robinson says, Dr. Rees, “Encyclopedic Rees” told this story with great glee:—“In 1788, when Baufey made his famous attempt to obtain the repeal of the Corporation and Test Act, a deputation waited on the Lord Chancellor Thurlow, to obtain his support. The deputies were Drs. Kippis, Palmer (of Hackney), and Rees. The Chancellor heard them very civilly, and then said, ‘Gentlemen, I’m against you, by G—! I am for the Established Church, d—mme! Not that I have any more regard for the Established Church than for any other Church, but because it is established; and if you get your d—d religion established I’ll be for that too!’”

THE LATE REV. JOHN JAMES TAYLER.

THE following communication has been received by the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, expressing the sentiments of our Hungarian brethren on receiving the tidings of the death of Mr. Tayler:—

“From the High Consistory of the Hungarian Unitarians, held at Klausenburg, on the 28th June, 1869. To the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, 178, Strand, London.

“Dear Christian Brethren,—The High Consistory of the Hungarian Unitarians, assembled to-day at Klausenburg, took knowledge with the deepest sorrow of the death of our dear brother the Rev. J. J. Tayler, Principal of Manchester New College, on the 28th of May. You, with whom he spent his useful and active life, will most nearly feel the great loss caused by this death. But we, too, most deeply share in this feeling, for we learned fully to appreciate, during the few days he passed in our company last year, on the occasion of our tercentenary festival, the beneficial influence of his high mental faculties and his truly Christian heart. We cherish with reverent piety the memory of the venerable man who, following the love of his ever youthful heart, undertook, like the apostles of old, so far a journey to see us, a congregation of God, removed from you by great distance, but united with you in Jesus Christ. We assure you this visit will always be memorable among the Hungarian Unitarians, and its effects extend to distant times. Accept the most sincere expression of our deepest sorrow, and of our truly Christian sympathy, and we pray you to communicate it to Miss Tayler, the only daughter of the deceased.—Yours most respectfully, “YOUR BRETHREN IN THE LORD.”

This document was signed by all the members of the Consistory.

THE CHURCH IN JAMAICA.

In a letter to the Pall Mall Gazette, Mr. Roundell, who was a candidate for the representation of Clitheroe at the last election, makes some statements regarding the Church question in Jamaica, which, from his having been Secretary to the Jamaica Commission, are entitled to special attention. As our readers have been made aware, the existing ecclesiastical arrangements come to an end next December, and under an Act passed by the late Government, the Consolidated Fund is relieved from all ecclesiastical charges in the West Indies, subject to existing life interests. “Thus,” as Mr. Roundell observes, “the Church in Jamaica was virtually disestablished and disendowed by the very same Ministers who clamoured against a similar measure in Ireland as an act of spoliation and sacrilege.”

In order to determine whether the Established Church fulfils its functions, or whether the voluntary system would be preferable, he sets before us these facts :

“Taking the year 1865, and speaking in round numbers, out of a population of about 450,000 some 13,500 only were whites, the rest being blacks or half-castes. The whites represent the dominant European settlers, the official and proprietary class. The members of the Church of England are not more than 1 in 11 of the population. Of Nonconformists, the Baptists alone had as many places of worship as the Church of England; the Wesleyans nearly as many. The Established Church maintains upon its staff a coadjutor bishop (the bishop of the diocese having been for many years resident in England), three archdeacons, and a considerable number of rectors and stipendiary and island curates. For the maintenance of this staff a sum of upwards of £37,000 a year was required, of which £7,100 a year was paid out of the Consolidated Fund, the rest coming out of the island exchequer. The sum payable for this purpose out of the colonial exchequer was one-eleventh of the total expenditure of the island. Reducing these figures to their English equivalents, it would be the same as if the public ecclesiastical expenditure of the United Kingdom amounted, in part, to some six millions a year; which, being capitalised, would represent a sum of 150,000,000 of money.”

Admitting that the white population is a necessary element in the civilisation of the negro, Mr. Roundell points out that the Established Church does not bring the two classes together. The clergy, with some exceptions, do not visit the people; “the white man represents to the negro the idea of mastership; his Church represents a department of the Government; and his form of religion is alien to the negro temperament.”

It appears to Mr. Roundell that, at emancipation, we made two great mistakes. We did not provide for education, nor for the training of a native ministry. “Hence religion, being unaccompanied by education, and being taught by ministers of another race, laid no hold upon the negro. His religious impressions were as letters traced on the sand.”

“Equally great,” Mr. Roundell thinks, “was the mistake of expecting the sober ritual, the full-blown paraphernalia of the English Establishment, to be suited to the needs of a negro colony. It must be remembered that we have to do with a race which time out of mind has been embroiled by slavery. It is a Southern race, eminently mercurial, impulsive, demonstrative. It is, moreover, a race given to revivals and religious orgies. . . . For meeting the spiritual needs of such a people a voluntary Church would seem to be best fitted. On the other hand, a voluntary Church under such circumstances, placed in juxtaposition with an Establishment, is at a disadvantage. If the Baptist clergy (the most political of the denominations) of Jamaica have exposed themselves to the charge of aggressiveness and bitterness, it is not too much to say that this is distinctly attributable to the ascendancy, the legal superiority, of the official Church. And this note of ascendancy of itself disposes of any claim of the Established Church to be an instrument of civilisation, a medium of conciliation between whites and blacks. No Englishman, who has not had personal experience, in a country where ascendancy prevails, of what ascendancy means, can form an adequate idea of its fundamental wickedness—how it stifles justice and saps the very foundations of social order and progress."

From these considerations Mr. Roundell deduces the following propositions:

"That the dedication of the eleventh part of the total taxation of the colony to the religious services of one-eleventh (and that the wealthiest) part of the population, is a flagrant injustice.

"That a costly Church Establishment is out of harmony with a poverty-stricken colony.

"That highly-paid bishops, archdeacons, and rectors are too good, and (as not being fitted) not good enough, for the work which they have to do in Jamaica.

"That the ideal Church organisation for a colony circumstanced like Jamaica is a staff of native ministers and teachers superintended by a few European superiors.

"That public money (of the colony) will be best bestowed upon education, including, if need be, aid towards the training of ministers of religion.

"That, consequently, the Church in Jamaica should, with due regard to vested interests, be disestablished and disendowed; and that the Legislative Council should concurrently make effective provision for popular education."

VOLUNTARIISM AND STATE CHURCHISM.

THE comparison made by the Spectator, which we referred to a fortnight ago, between the results of Voluntary and Established Churches, has called forth the following excellent letter from Mr. James Hinton:

"I am unable to see that liberality of religious sentiment has the connection you ascribe to it with Establishment, because I perceive two facts—first, that among ministers of unestablished churches there are to be found men whose liberality and width of view is unsurpassed. I need not in your columns give instances of this. And secondly, that in the ranks of the English Establishment are to be found perhaps the extreme specimens of the opposite of these qualities that the world has ever seen—certainly the extreme at present existing in England. I think no one who has mixed largely with both Churchmen and Dissenters could fail to admit that no Dissenting bigotry and narrowness equals that which is to be found—exceptionally doubtless—in the ranks of the clergy.

"What is perhaps true, on the other hand, is that the prevailing tone in the Establishment is more liberal than that of Dissent. I do not at any rate wish to controvert this opinion; if it be not true at present one would be glad to see it, by a movement in the right direction, become so. But I think that the question of Establishment or non-Establishment is indifferent in the matter, and that it finds ample explanation in other circumstances, such as the fact that the most influential members of the Church are drawn from a more cultured class than the corresponding portion of the Dissenting bodies. If the intolerant Dissenters were 'established' they would—if facts are to guide us—be certainly no less intolerant. Surely no one believes that the liberal Churchmen would be made, by disestablishment, illiberal.

"Though I recognise certain superficial reasons for expecting that voluntarism would induce a pandering to vulgar passions, I believe that the truth lies in the opposite direction; that the result we see in the English Church is not an accidental but a natural one; that an Establishment tends almost, if not quite inevitably, to foster an intolerant class within its ranks—a class whose bitter feelings would be rendered only more intense by any enlargement of the basis of the Church—in short, that disestablishment is the only remedy for intolerance. I should not, however, have taken up my pen merely to urge this view, the more since it is one which could hardly fail to present itself, sooner or later, to any persons who candidly studied the question. But I should be glad if I could bring home to the feelings of your readers what seems to me one of the chief, although most overlooked, elements in the discussion—the great, constant, pervading, social injustice and injury which have hitherto proved themselves inseparable from Church Establishments. To my mind, this evil alone, if there were no others, outweighs all the advantages the Spectator ever claimed on their behalf; for surely it is a vast evil that society should be riven, as it is in England, through all its length and breadth by a line of demarcation based on no moral, educational, or personal qualities, but on a question of ecclesiastical preference, due most frequently, on both sides alike, to accident. It is a serious evil that the lives of earnest and cultivated men, in no respect below those who practically treat them with despatch, should be made hard and rendered comparatively fruitless, because they conscientiously, or from accident of birth, are attached to a certain way of worshipping God. But I believe that no one who has not lived among Dissenters, knows to how great an extent, nay, how universally, except in parts of London, such wrong is inflicted, how mischievous it is, how deeply it is felt. By artificial advantages (wholly unconnected with religion) the Establishment naturally draws within its pale all who have not strong motives to remain without; it attracts especially the cultured; and hitherto its members (not of course without exceptions) have treated practically with scorn and with exclusion those who belong to other religious bodies—with a scorn and exclusion so intense as often to be unconscious. In some circles in London, it is true, the evil scarcely exists; it is because I do not personally feel it that I have felt it my duty to speak; for I hold that my fellow-Dissenters have in this respect a great and legitimate grievance. If they say little about it, that is because they are unwilling to degrade a great question of religious principle by the admixture of personal feelings. But they feel it; and they ought to feel it, because it cuts them off so largely from that which (and they are not ignorant of it) is one of their chief needs; opportunities of refinement and cultivation. I believe the remedy to be in religious equality, which I therefore desire on their behalf; but I desire it much more on behalf of the Church itself, which if it inflicts evils unwillingly, through its false position, suffers from the same cause many greater ones."

MAHOMEDAN REVOLT IN CHINA.

THE New York Tribune gives some intelligence of a movement in the interior of China, which in conjunction with the increased vehemence of Mahomedanism of late in many parts of the East, is not without significance:

Soon after the suppression of the Taiping rebellion, the first accounts were received of insurrectionary movements among the Mahomedan subjects of the Empire. The Mahomedans referred to were not the Turks in Western Turkistan, who, favoured by the wide Mongolian steppes, have always been turbulent, and involved in wars among themselves and against the neighbouring countries of Khokand and Bokhara. The difficulties of these Mahomedans, with the troops kept by the Chinese Governments in their country, have thus far not been of a serious nature. The rebels who have of late given so much trouble live in China Proper, partly in the province of Kan-su, which to the north borders upon the Amoor, and partly in Yun-nan, a province adjoining Burmah. The Mahomedans of both these provinces are the descendants of soldiers belonging to the vast crowds which under Mahomet of Ghazni, under the Ghorisultans of Hindostan, and under Djengis K'an, overflooded Persia, India, and parts of China. Chinese historians say, in particular, of the Mahometans of Yun-nan, that they are the descendants of an auxiliary corps, which was obtained in the tenth century from a neighbouring prince, for the suppression of a rebellion in the north-west, and which, after the close of the war, received grants of land in Yun-nan. They were until the outbreak of the present disturbances, regarded by the Chinese as a peaceful and industrious people. About ten years ago, the oppressions which the Mahomedans in Yun-nan suffered from the Chinese Mandarins led, for the first time, to acts of hostility. The Mahomedans, though at first compelled to seek refuge in the forests and mountains of Burmah, soon received reinforcements from the warlike people of Northern Burmah. Having possessed themselves of several strong places, they perfected their organizations and placed a King at their head. The efforts of the Chinese to restore the imperial authority have been unsuccessful; their armies have been several times defeated, and the last ones that have been sent against the rebels are reported not to have even crossed the frontier of Yun-nan. The rebels divided their territory into four districts, and their King, who assumed the name of Soliman (his Chinese name being Tawintsen) has chosen the yellow colour for his garments, as a symbol of his independence. In 1866, ambassadors were sent to Soliman, offering to him the undisturbed possession of the territory which was then held by him, in case he would pledge himself to cease his inroads into adjoining districts, especially into the Province of Su-tchuen. The promise was not given, and the state of war between Soliman and the Chinese Government still continues. Soliman is making great efforts to revive the commerce between his territory and the Burmans, and thus to consolidate his new state.

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON'S "DIARY."

II.

WRITING of a high-spirited Spanish lady, a good Catholic, who, in 1810, left her own country, on account of the presence of the French, and came to England, Mr. Robinson says:

"The only occasion on which she showed any bigoted or ungenerous feeling was on my showing her at the Tower of London the axe with which Anne Boleyn was beheaded. 'Ah! que j'adore cet instrument!' she exclaimed. On my remonstrating with her, she told me she had been brought up to consider Anne Boleyn as one possessed by a devil; that naughty children were frightened by the threat of being sent to her; and that she was held to be the great cause of the Reformation, as the seducer of the King, &c., &c. No wonder that Romanists should so think, when Protestants have extensively circulated that very foolish line ascribed to Gray—

'When Gospel truth first beam'd from Anna's eyes.'"

The following passage from a letter of Coleridge's to H. C. R., in 1811, is worth transcribing:

"Virtue itself, though joined with outward competence, cannot give that happiness which contents the human heart, without love; but love is impossible without virtue,—love, true human love,—i.e., two hearts, like two correspondent concave mirrors having a common focus, while each reflects and magnifies the other, and in the other itself is an endless reduplication by sweet thoughts and sympathies."

An entry, under May 26th, 1812, illustrates the folly of punishing for opinion. The individual referred to, who underwent not less than eight prosecutions by Government for his publications, and for one of them suffered eighteen months' imprisonment, must not be confounded with David Eaton, a bookseller, and the friend of Theophilus Lindsey:

"Walked to the Old Bailey to see D. I. Eaton in the pillory. As I expected, his punishment of shame was his glory. The mob was not numerous, but decidedly friendly to him. His having published Paine's 'Age of Reason' was not an intelligible offence to them. I heard such exclamations as the following: 'Pillory a man for publishing a book—shame!'—'I wish old Sir Vicary [sic Vicary Gibbs, Attorney-general] was there, my pockets should not be empty.'—'Religious liberty!'—'Liberty of conscience!' Some avowed their willingness to stand in the pillory for a dollar. 'This a punishment? This is no disgrace!' As his position changed, and fresh partisans were blessed by a sight of his round grinning face, shouts of 'bravo!' arose from a new quarter. His trial was sold on the spot. The whole affair was an additional proof of the folly of the Ministers, who ought to have known that such an exhibition would be a triumph to the cause they meant to render infamous."

August 12th, 1812.—"Coleridge said of Job, this incomparable poem has been most absurdly interpreted. Far from being the most patient of men, Job was the most impatient. And he was rewarded for his impatience. His integrity and sincerity had their recompense because he was superior to the hypocrisy of his friends."

On October 22nd, of the same year, Mr. Robinson heard W. Huntington preach, the one who put S.S. after his name. The reason he gave for the adoption of these mysterious letters was, "M.A. is out of my reach for want of learning, D.D. I cannot attain for want of cash, but S.S. I adopt, by which I mean Sinner Saved." He commenced his own epitaph thus: "Here lies the coal-heaver beloved of God, but abhorred of men." H. C. R. says respecting him:

"He has an admirable exterior; his voice is clear and melodious; his manner singularly easy, and even graceful. There was no violence, no bluster, yet there was no want of earnestness or strength. His language was very figurative, the images being taken from the ordinary business of life, and especially from the army and navy. He is very colloquial, and has a wonderful biblical memory; indeed, he is said to know the whole Bible by heart. I noticed that, though he was frequent in his citations, and always added chapter and verse, he never opened the little book he had in his hand. He is said to resemble Robert Robinson of Cambridge. There was nothing shrewd or original in the sermon to-day, but there was hardly any impropriety. I detected but a single one: Huntington said, 'I take my word for it, my friends, they who act in this way will not be beloved by God, or by anybody else.'"

1812. Dec. 20th, Sunday.—"A large family party at the Bischoffs, of which not the least agreeable circumstance was, that there was a family religious service. There is something most interesting and amiable in family devotional exercise, when, as in this instance, there is nothing austere or ostentatious. Indeed everything almost that is done by a family, as such, is good. Religion assumes a forbidding aspect only when it is mingled with impure feelings, as party animosity, malignant intolerance, and contempt."

The following entries respecting Mr. Justice Talfourd are interesting:

1813. February 23rd.—"This day a Mr. Talfourd called with a letter from Mr. Rutt [the editor of Dr. Priestley's works]. He is going to study the law, and wants information from me concerning economical arrangements; he has been for some time Dr. Valpy's head boy, and wishes for a few years, to occupy himself by giving instruction or otherwise, so as to be no incumbrance to his father, who has a large family. He is a very promising young man indeed, has great powers of conversation and public speaking, not without the faults of his age, but with so much apparent vigour of mind, that I am greatly mistaken if he do not become a distinguished man."

February 24th.—"Attended a conference in the vestry of the Gravel Pit Meeting, Mr. Aspland presiding. The subject was 'Infant Baptism.' Young Talfourd spoke, but in too oratorical a tone. We walked from Hackney together; his youthful animation and eagerness excited my envy."

Mr. Robinson afterwards procured employment for him as a law reporter for the Times, and he was thus enabled to marry Mr. Rutt's eldest daughter, to whom he had been for some time attached. He became intimate with Lamb, who introduced him to Wordsworth in these words: "Mr. Wordsworth, I introduce you to Mr. Talfourd, my only admirer." In after life, as is well known, he became his executor and biographer.

1814. December 27th.—"Amused myself by reading Middleton's 'Letter from Rome.' His proof that a great many of the rites and ceremonies of the Romish Church are derived from the Pagan religion is very complete and satisfactory. And he urges his arguments against the abuses of the Roman Church with no feelings unfavourable to Christianity. That the earliest Christians voluntarily assimilated the new faith and its rites to the ancient superstition, in order to win souls, and with that accommodating spirit which St. Paul seems to have sanctioned, cannot be doubted. It admits of a doubt how far such a practice is so entirely bad as rigid believers now assert. Certainly these peculiarities are not the most mischievous excrescences which have gradually formed themselves on the surface of the noble and sublimely simple system of Jesus Christ. The worst of these accretitious appendages may be looked upon as bad poetry; but the ineradicable and intolerable vice of Romanism is the infallibility of the Church, and the consequent intolerance of its priests. It is a religion of slavery."

THE VEDAS.

We now and then hear some of our younger theologians making off-hand references to the Veds and the Shasters in a way which convinces us that they have no knowledge whatever of their real contents. Mr. Max Müller has just published a translation of the "Rig-Veda-Sanhita," the Sacred Hymns of the Brahmans; and a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette, who shows how uncertain the date of their composition is, makes some remarks upon them which may be instructive to those whom we have referred to, and not uninteresting to others.

These hymns, unless we much mistake, will be judged as a learned German judged the Soma, or sacred liquor of the Brahmans. "It is," says Dr. Haug, "a very nasty drink: I tasted it several times, but it was impossible for me to swallow more than some teaspoonfuls." For, as Southey has observed, of all religions that of India is the most monstrous in its fables, the most hideous in its mythological persons and ideas. Neither the Semitic nor Aryan spiritual fancy has matched the folly and filth of Rama's invasion of the Dekkan at the head of an army of apes; of Vishnu's incarnations, as a fish, a tortoise, a lion, or a boar; of Krishna's flirtations with the 16,000 milkmaids in the wilderness; of the fall of the Linga of Iva from heaven, when Brahma suborned a cow and a tree to swear that he had seen its utter end. But idiocy and indecency have their degrees. The faith of the Puranas and the Code of Menu is not the faith of the ancient scriptures of India. The Vedas are, it is true, bristling with gibberish, pedantry, and pollution; but they contain traces of a better order of things. If their chronology were a little more certain, we might say that they flatly contradict V. Con's doctrine (already amply disproved in other ways), that human faith begins with many gods and ends with one or none.

The Sastras of the Hindus are arranged in eighteen books, which form an encyclopedia of knowledge religious and profane. Of these books eight are Vedas, of which again four are the inner or specific Vedas. When European scholars say "the Veda," they speak κατ' ἐξοχήν, of the first, or Rig Veda, which is said to be the most ancient. Its greater age and authenticity is a hobby with philologists and mythologists of the conjectural-emotional school, who squeeze from parts of the Rig Veda evidence in support of those peculiar doctrines of theirs which the other Vedas refute. The Vedas, as a whole, may be described as prayers, litanies, invocations, hymns, liturgical rules, religious precepts, moral laws, philosophical reflections, myths, fables, metamorphoses, stories, monotheistic, idolatrous, magical, and human, cosmologies, lists of gods, scraps of popular poetry, amorous dialogues, parodies, and last, not least, obscene phallic details. Each Veda is traditionally divided into—(1) the Mantras, or prayers, which form the so-called Sanhita; (2) the Brahmana, or ritualistic ceremonial part; (3) the Upanishad, or philosophical part. In regard to their use, we may roughly state that the Rig Veda is the Bible, the other Vedas being prayer-books, hymn-books, Talmuds, Targums, in which the religious chapters are diluted, as it were, with the words or opinions of the Chaucers, Hookers, Kants, Cuviers, Comtes, Voltaires, Louvets, Swinburnes, of ancient Hindustan. The language of these works is so grammatically and lexicologically hard, their style is so obscure and spasmodic, that they have from the earliest times puzzled the deepest Pundits, having, indeed, never been thoroughly understood except by the modern Germans. According to orthodox Hindu doctrine, the three chief Vedas have existed from eternity. In the Institutes of Menu their essential evolution is as follows:—The Divine Being deposited himself in an egg, where he lay 1,555,200,000,000 years, after which he hatched himself in the form of Brahma. His next step was to "milk out" the three chief Vedas, Rich, Yajush, and Samad, from fire, air, and the sun. Tradition adds that the genesis of these books was now complete, but that they afterwards were carried by a devil to the bottom of the sea, whence they were hauled up by Vishnu, being afterwards, as it seems, rearranged by one Vyasa. This operation occurred some hundreds or thousands of years before the birth of Christ. In the age of Mahomet, however, the Vedas appear as objective realities, although even this knowledge comes from the obscure testimony of a Chinese pilgrim. The Vedas are written on palm leaves, held together by strings, no copy being more than 400 or 500 years old. Unlike the Pentateuch and the Eddas, they seem to have suffered wholesale textual alterations, the Sama Veda, in particular, being said to have existed in a thousand different editions, each of which was adopted by a separate religious school. Nevertheless, it is probable that the Vedas now known are the Vedas of ancient Hindu belief.

POPULAR HISTORICAL ERRORS.

VERY inaccurate impressions of historic events sometimes obtain wide-spread and permanent diffusion through the medium of authors, whose works are written in a lively and pleasing style, whilst deficient in faithful impartiality or scholar-like research. For example, the fair fame of William Penn, the illustrious founder of Pennsylvania, was grossly maligned in Lord Macaulay's "History" by charges which are still believed to be true by many persons, in spite of their complete refutation by Hepworth Dixon, Mr. Paget, Right Hon. W. E. Forster, and other able writers. More recently, Mr. Kinglake's work on the Crimean War has been the means of widely diffusing a curious misrepresentation of the London Peace Society. That work conveyed an impression that the Emperor Nicholas declared war with Turkey and the Western Powers, in consequence of a deputation from the Peace Society leading him to infer that England would not fight in defence of the Ottoman Empire. The idea thus conveyed is more than a common mistake; it is an egregious blunder. The Deputation in question (with which, by the way, the Peace Society had nothing to do, inasmuch as it was a Deputation of the Society of Friends, acting as a religious body), waited on the Emperor on February 10th, 1854; but, as Mr. Kinglake says, in his history, three months previously, "on the 23rd of October, 1853, the Sultan was placed in a state of war with the Emperor of Russia;" and more than two months before the Friends' Deputation arrived at St. Petersburg, active hostilities occurred by the destruction of the Turkish fleet at Sinope, November 30th, 1853. Hence the Deputation could not possibly have occasioned warfare with Turkey. Neither did it lead Russia to declare war against England; for the latter country took the initiative. The British Government declared war on March 28th, 1854, and the Emperor Nicholas, in return, reluctantly issued his declaration a fortnight later, on April 11th. So much for the historic foundation of this strange popular delusion, which many superficial readers still entertain.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

TRUST IN GOD, AND LABOUR.

Trust in God, and labour; strew thy path with flowers,
Roses fresh and fragrant, plucked from sweetest bowers;
These shall soften sorrow, and shall bring relief
To the wan and way-worn sufferer, burdened with his grief.

Trust in God, and labour; if a work appear,
Earnestly essay it,—tremble not, nor fear;
To the honest worker, to the trusting one,
Everything in faith attempted shall be surely done.

Trust in God, and labour; saddened hearts shall bless
E'en thy faint endeavour for their happiness:

Wouldst thou still be idle, with a field so wide,
Whilst mankind for truth are weeping, dying at thy side?

Trust in God, and labour; what hast thou to fear
With a Friend so mighty, and a cause so dear?
Gird thy sword about thee, boldly meet the foe,
Shrink not in the holy conflict thou must undergo.

Trust in God, and labour; harvest-time is near,
When with sheaves abundant or few thou shalt appear;

Rightly use the seed-time, do thy duty now,
And thou shalt meet a welcome, with laurels on thy brow.

Trust in God, and labour with a willing hand;
I though a host oppose thee, firm, undaunted stand;
Then how sweet at evening, when the toil is o'er,
A day well-spent to think on, if thou spend no more.

Trust in God, and labour; bless thy fellow-men;
They have erred and fallen,—win them back again!
There's not a task or trial to do or bear is given,
But if thou wisely use it shall bring thee nearer — Heaven. DARLEY TERRY.

THE AMBITIOUS POND.

THERE was once a pond, a pretty, clear, delightful thing, with overshadowing trees and placid reflections from the blue sky, freckled by snowy clouds.

It was a small pond, but it had a deep, rich heart, and did its little mill service excellently well, never dreaming of anything except contentment, unless a cat's-paw of a breeze ruffled its surface for a moment, and broke and distorted the sweet images with which it was habitually filled.

One day a great wild goose came, flapping its wings across the country. When it reached the pond, it poised itself upon its wide pinions, making quite a dark shadow among the network of willow-boughs and flowering banks that used the pond for their mirror.

"Never mind," said the wild goose, "if I do darken you with reflections deeper than any you have heretofore indulged in; I bear a message for you from the great lakes, your older sisters. They are engaged in the earnest work of life. Ships and steamers sail over their bosoms, and the commerce of the world could not be carried on without their aid. They wish to know why you do not strive to broaden out into something larger than a mere pond, that spends its days in turning a mill-wheel and nourishing the small weeds and grasses that grow upon its border."

Mr. Wild Goose, having delivered his message, swept away across the land, and left our little pond in a very ruffled and agitated state.

To tell the truth, she was a good deal flattered by the notice of those mighty sisters of hers, the great lakes. Their condescension threw her into a flutter. Trees, flowers and sailing clouds had never brought such ideas to her placid mind as Mr. Wild Goose had dropped into it; and she began to feel ashamed of her former contentment.

So she formed an image, in her little pondish way, of vast, tumultuous bodies of water, with crowded harbours and multitudes of ships. The more she thought of it, the more evident it seemed that she, too, ought to expand into a large lake, and all that seemed necessary was to overflow her borders and stretch out upon the peaceful fields around her.

To be sure she would have to sacrifice her old friends and companions, the humble weeds and grasses; but such thoughts could not check the ambitious pond any more than they can check ambitious men and women.

So, in the night, she swelled herself up and made a mighty effort, rising high enough to overflow her banks and do a great deal of mischief to the farmers' fields. Her rich, deep heart was almost drained of water, and seemed nothing but a bed of black mud. Yet, by her utmost exertions, she was able only to cover a few acres with a thin sheet of water, that left all the old stumps and roots sticking out, looking ugly enough. But, strange to say, the pond imagined she had done a very commendable thing, and tried to sparkle and look very important when, in the morning, the astounded miller appeared.

But he, being a blunt, straightforward man, told her the plain truth. "Don't you know," said he, "that the great lakes you would emulate are fed by innumerable rivers and streams that drain half a continent; while you, poor, foolish creature, have but just one woodland brook poured into your lap? You have only just water enough to make a respectable pond, and your vain ambition has caused you to stretch out into a ridiculous shallow, neither lake, nor pond, nor anything else, and of no earthly use to anybody. Besides, you have encroached unlawfully on your neighbours' fields, spoiled the crops, and drowned the pretty grass and flowers. I advise you to make haste and get back into your proper boundaries, else the August sun will dry you completely away."

The little pond was greatly mortified, but took heed to the good miller's words, and, much ashamed that she should have believed a flatterer and allowed his tale to excite her ambition and foolish pride, she made haste to get back to the place nature gave her as quickly as possible, though with considerable loss. She has never since allowed her calm and peaceful existence to be disturbed by any wild goose's cackle whatsoever.

Little ponds have just as important uses as great lakes, and little lives could no more be spared than great ones; but when they swell themselves out, and try to make folks believe that they are a great deal bigger than they are, they are usually forced back to their old places with mortification, or are looked upon as shallow, impertinent intruders. If God has made you a little pond and set you in a lovely border of flowers and grasses and shrubs, within a grand framework of hills and forests, don't allow any wild goose of a flatterer to fill your head with the ambition to be a lake or an ocean; for you may spill all your water and not be a sea; nor anything but a shallow, noisome swamp.—Liberal Christian.

A WORLD ON FIRE.

THE British Quarterly, in an interesting article on "the Language of Light," has the following striking description:—On the 12th of May, 1866, a great conflagration, infinitely larger than that of London or Moscow, was announced. To use the expression of a distinguished astronomer, a world was found to be on fire. A star, which till then had shone meekly and unobtrusively in the Corona Borealis, suddenly blazed up into a luminary of the second magnitude. In the course of three days from its discovery in this new character by Mr. Birmingham, at Tuam, it had declined to the third or even fourth order of brilliancy. In twelve days, dating from its first apparition in the Irish heavens, it had sunk to the eighth rank, and it went on waning until the 26th June, when it ceased to be discernible except through the medium of the telescope. This was a remarkable though certainly not an unprecedented proceeding on the part of a star; but one singular circumstance in its behaviour was that after the lapse of nearly two months it began to blaze up again, though not with equal ardour, and after maintaining its glow for a few weeks and passing through sundry phases of colour, it gradually paled its fires and returned to its former insignificance. How many years had elapsed since this awful conflagration actually took place it would be presumptuous to guess; but it must be remembered that news from the heavens, though carried by the fleetest of messengers, light, reach us long after the event has transpired, and that the same celestial courier is still dropping the tidings at each station it reaches in space, until it sinks exhausted by the length of its flight. Now, when this object was examined, as it was promptly and eagerly by Professor Miller and Mr. Huggins, they found to their great wonder that it yielded two spectra—the one imposed upon the other, though obviously independent. There was the prismatic ribbon, crossed by dark lines, which belongs to the sun and stars generally, but there was another in which four bright lines figured; and these indicated that some luminous gas (or gases) was also pouring out its light from the surface of the orb. Two of the lines spelled out hydrogen in the spectral language. What the other two signified did not then appear; but, inasmuch as those four streaks were brighter than the rest of the spectrum, the source from which they came must obviously have been more intensely heated than the underlying parts, or photosphere, from which the normal stellar light proceeded. And, as the star had suddenly flamed up, was it not a natural supposition that it had become enwrapped in burning hydrogen, which, in consequence of some great convulsion, had been liberated in prodigious quantities, and then, combining with other elements, had set this hapless world on fire? In such a fierce conflagration the combustible gas would soon be consumed, and the glow would, therefore, begin to decline, subject, as in this case, to a second eruption, which occasioned the renewed outburst of light on the 20th August. By such a catastrophe it is not wholly impossible that our own globe may some time be ravaged, for if a word from the Almighty were to unloose for a few moments the bonds of affinity which unite the elements of water—of the ocean on the land and the moisture in the air—a single spark would bring them together with a fury which would kindle the funeral pyre of the human race, and be fatal to the planet and all the works that are therein. It cannot but be a startling fact for us that in yonder doomed and distant world we have, probably, seen in our own day a realisation of the fearful picture sketched by Peter, "when the heavens (or atmosphere) being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat." And if we regard it as the centre of a system, it is impossible to think without horror of the fate of the numerous globes around it when overwhelmed by this sudden deluge of light and caloric.

GRUMBLERS.

A. D. MAYO, in Liberal Christian.

THE world is full of grumblers. We find them everywhere. They infest the most favoured as well as the most unfortunate lot. No circumstances are too high or too low for them.

There are grumblers in the home. A little speck of disorder shuts out all household beauty from their jaundiced eyes. One flash of temper, or one breach of duty, weighs down the fidelity of half a life, and sets them raving against the dearest friend. They are the most contemptible tyrants on earth who make the whole happiness and peace of a family wait upon their selfish pride, and change a stable household to a weathercock, blown about by their gusty whims. There are grumblers on 'Change who groan over every public improvement, and look askance at prosperity, and always are on the look-out for a panic; men who measure the condition of the whole industrial world solely by its bearing on their own private fortune. Of course, the majority of men are never growing rich, and a majority of every prosperous community is always at the mercy of one of these makers of panic. There is a whole race of political grumblers, to whom office is heaven, and to be out of office is to be in torment. In their eyes the nation is always in the last ditch, liberty and order at their last gasp, and the only relief is in calling upon them as a forlorn hope.

Then there are grumblers among scholars, who think mankind are lapsing into barbarism because their favourite study has had its day; grumblers in science, who, because they cannot discover how creation was made, declare any Creator impossible; grumblers in the school, who groan about the degeneracy of modern youth, forgetful that Plato said, two thousand years ago, a boy is the wildest of wild beasts. There are grumblers in the law, who repudiate every idea of sentiment that declines to appear before the Police Court; artistic grumblers, who cannot forgive men for not buying their new pictures; medical grumblers, who fight each other, as if their mission was to kill a rival doctor, and not to cure a suffering patient. There are grumbling philanthropists, who love their fellow-men in such a ferocious and quarrelsome way, that one prays them for a little while to let us feel the gentler touch of their hatred. And, oh, what legions of grumbling priests of all religions and races and ages and climes, have filled the temples of religion with the dreary echoes of their own morbid selfishness, set up a monster of natural depravity as man, and an infinite grumbling tyrant as God, have clouded the church windows, and changed this world to a vale of tears, and cursed the world to come with the smoke of their everlasting hells, driven away love and brought in wrath and desolated the world with the ghastliest of wars; and still they go on, grumbling and cursing and calling every man infidel in proportion as he loves to rejoice in a spirit of thanksgiving to that Love which is great enough to save even them from their mournful spiritual pride. So the earth is full of grumblers of every sort, and only now and then can we find a man whose head is far enough above this troubled realm of selfish ingratitude to rejoice in God for evermore.

A good deal of this grumbling is largely sensational. It does not represent any real despair of life, but a desire to attract attention. There is a large class of people who are unwilling to trust the legitimate path to success, and rage with the desire to become famous by some short-hand process. The speediest way to attract attention is to be the bearer of evil news. The stupidest man who should tell us that our new President was dead would become for the instant the greatest man in the city. Such a temptation is too much for the feeble virtue of many a weak brother and sister; so many a tolerably contented person becomes a maniac for the sake of becoming notorious.

A TALE ABOUT TWO BUTTERFLIES.

[We insert the following, from a privately printed copy, on account of the curious insight it affords into the workings of a child's mind. We know it to be, as it purports, the unassisted production of an American girl of not quite five years of age.]

THERE were two butterflies, flying about in the wind, who went to Heaven, and saw the sky; and Moon, and clouds. In the morning it was, and every thing there was pretty. Then they went into the Woods, and saw Autumn leaves, and Moss, and an Oke, and some Fairies were looking in at the hollow—Then they went to the graveyard where there were beautiful little violets and pinks on the graves, and some one was burying a coffin with some people in it who were going home to Heaven. Then they went back to the Woods again and saw dead leaves, and farther in there were Berres, and Fairies eating them. Then the Fairies pucked Violets and put them in their hair, so that the Butterflies should say that they looked pretty. Then they saw a Polipos,* and they flew away as fast as they could from it. Then they galloped along the grass like Horses do, and they had a cart for the two Butterflies to ride in. Then they rid home, when the Fairies told the cart to stop for the Butterflies to step down and go into their House made with handfulls of Grass.

INTELLIGENCE.

HAPTON.—At this place the Rev. James Knapton has, during his ministry there of many years, cordially allied himself with the neighbouring people of Long Stratton and district. Wishing to unite in friendly communion, the ministers and friends from Norwich, Diss, Stratton, Moulton, and Fornett had a pleasant gathering there on the 15th inst. Upon the green sward in front of the chapel and minister's house, and in the spacious marquee of the Norwich Brotherly Society, about 300 persons sat down to tea. In the evening, J. W. Dowson, Esq. presided, and addresses were given by the chairman, the Revs. James Knapton, J. D. H. Smyth, of Norwich, Mr. W. J. Knapton, of the Home Missionary Board, and by several ministers and laymen of the Independent, General and Particular Baptist, and Wesleyan churches. All seemed to be well satisfied with the way in which they had spent the day together.

MANCHESTER: ROCHDALE-ROAD DOMESTIC MISSION.—At a meeting of the congregation on Sunday last, the following resolution was unanimously passed:

"The members of the Domestic Mission Chapel, Rochdale-road, having heard of the decease of Eddowes Bowman, Esq., M.A., hereby express their high appreciation of his character as a Christian gentleman, and of the never-failing interest he always displayed in the welfare of this Institution. They desire, therefore, to convey to his brother, Henry Bowman, Esq., and his surviving relatives, their warmest sympathies."

IN REFERENCE

To WINE it is a fact that many persons are pleased if they can say "We import our own." They have an impression that by so doing they not only get it cheaper but purer; and, besides, there is the honour of importing. They overlook altogether that those Foreign Dealers who seek them out are quite aware of this amiable weakness, and do not fail to take advantage of it to add some shillings to the price. To assist the impression they judiciously insinuate that their article is purer than what usually comes to England, and thus they lull that desire for comparison which would soon dispel the delusion.
These remarks apply specially to

GERMAN WINES,

And, in proof of them, we would ask those Gentlemen who buy such Wines to compare our

Even supposing the value to be equal there is this advantage in buying here, that any quantity can be got when wanted; whereas, in importing, a quantity of money is locked up, probably for years, in an article not of every day consumption.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A great many members of the Skopzian sect, of whom we gave some account a short time ago, who mutilate themselves "for the kingdom of heaven's sake," have been brought to trial at Tambow, and found guilty. Their sentence consists in the loss of all civil rights, and banishment for life to Siberia.

The Pope is pushing on the preparations in St. Peter's for the meeting of the Ecumenical with great earnestness. A circular has been addressed to the bishops who are to attend it, enjoining them to choose coadjutors to discharge their duties in their absence. It is understood that the Council will suppress several religious orders, and many communities of women, and will also forbid religieux to accept the duties of parish priests, requiring these to be secular scholars.

Accounts from Rome speak of great discontent, arising from various causes, among others the high price of bread, and the Pope never appears in public without eliciting cries of "Santo Padre, pane, pane!" He goes about murmuring "Speriamo" ("let us hope"), but he is said to be very dejected, and constantly out of temper. The other day he inflicted a penance on the whole Court by going to the scala santa, or stairs of Pilate, and mounting to the top, like a good Catholic, on his knees. Of course all the high functionaries, old and young, slim and fat, were obliged to follow, and kneed their way up, stair by stair, with Pio Nono at their head, thankful no doubt when the topmost one was reached.

A memorial has been presented by the Catholics of Coblenz to the Bishop of Treves, their diocesan, and a similar one to the Archbishop of Cologne, signed by a large number of the professors of the University of Bonn, as well as by many barristers, doctors, and schoolmasters, expressing the fears entertained with regard to the forthcoming Council, and having for their object to obtain from it an authoritative sanction of their proposals for the total separation of Church and State, the management of parishes by vestries (or whatever is the nearest Catholic equivalent to them), the government of dioceses by diocesan synods in which the laity should have a voice, the nomination of bishops by their flocks, subject to the subsequent approval of the Holy Father, and the suppression of the Index. There is little doubt from these and other symptoms that the liberal Catholic party in North Germany will join the Bavarian Government in its efforts to obtain something like free discussion at the approaching Council. It is no secret that the Cabinet of Munich, in its religious politics, is chiefly guided by the Abbé Dollinger, High Almoner to the Court, and although it is said that the great Church historian will not personally assist at the Council, of which he has openly expressed his disapproval, still the vote which Bavaria can influence will be a considerable one. In addition to the Archbishops of Munich and Bamberg, there are six bishops, and the four mitred abbots of the Benedictine convents. Austria, Germany, France, and Italy will also be represented by prelates hostile to the pretensions of the Ultramontane party. There seem not unlikely, therefore, to be collisions of opinion, in which some dangerous sparks of heresy may be struck out.

The Staffordshire Advertiser states that last Thursday evening but one, the Rev. A. S. Prior, B.D., vicar of St. George's, Wolverhampton, assisted by his curates, celebrated the Holy Communion in unobnoxious wine at St. George's School-church. "All Christians," it is added, "are received at the table without inquiring as to the sect to which they may attach themselves, and it is understood that the service is a concession to teetotal principles."

Frampton-on-Severn, a village near Gloucester, seems to have been possessed of a gold service of communion plate of considerable value. It having been decided, at a vestry meeting, to dispose of it, and add the purchase money to the funds for the restoration of the ancient church, it realised £608. 5s., being at the rate of 75s. an ounce.

It has been stated in several Church papers that the Bishop of Lichfield had taken the Episcopate difficulty into his own hands, as far as his particular diocese was concerned by giving over Derbyshire to the care of Bishop Hobhouse, late of Nelson, making him virtually "Bishop of Derbyshire." It appears, however, that this is a mistake, and that all which Bishop Hobhouse has engaged to do is to assist Dr. Selwyn by occasional services to be performed under a general commission extending over the whole diocese.

The Guardian is informed that ever since the late Privy Council judgment the Bishop of Oxford has encouraged, by example if not by precept, the centre-of-table, back-towards-people, position of the celebrant during the whole Holy Communion service, except, of course, administration to communicants; and that his lordship meets the "before the people" requirement by holding cup and paten slightly sideways, so that the act of consecration may be seen.

The illegal practices with which the Rev. J. Purchas is charged, and for which he is before the Court of Arches, certainly look as if he had gone very far on the way towards Rome. They are as follows:

"1, a procession round the church; 2, the crucifix; 3, a large metal crucifix with a figure of the Saviour on the holy table; 4, bowing to the crucifix; 5, flowers to be placed on the table; 6, lighted candles on the table; 7, using incense; 8, rubbed black powder on members of the congregation; 9, sprinkled with holy water, candles, and the candles were held up by members of the congregation; 10, mixed water with the Communion wine; 11, administered to the communicants wine mixed with water; 12, elevated the paten and cup; 13, the same specified; 14, used wafer bread; 15, using a bell at the time of consecration and elevation; 16, introduction of 'the Agnus' in the service when not authorised; 17, elevating the Offertory alms, and, after placing them for a moment on the holy table, handing them to an acolyte to be placed on the credence-table; 18, suffering the holy table on Good Friday to be without any decent covering; 19, having holy water placed in the church; 20, sprinkled with holy water, palm branches; 21, paused in using the Prayer for the Church Militant; 22, on a Sunday (mentioned), after his sermon, gave notice that there would be a mortuary celebration for the repose of a sister; 23, placed a model figure of the infant Saviour, and on Whitsun Day a figure of a dove; 24, notices of high celebration of the Holy Eucharist; 25, making the sign of the cross when about to mix water with the wine; 26, kissing the book from which he read the Gospel of the day; 27, using a ceremony in admitting a new acolyte or choir-boy; 28, using a cope while performing part of the service; 29, sanctioning other clergymen at evening service using copes; 30, using a chasuble in the Holy Communion service; 31, sanctioning other vestments to be used; 32, wearing a scarlet stole; and, 33, suffering other clergymen to use vestments and to conduct the services not in a manner appointed by the laws ecclesiastical."

At the last meeting of the Dialectical Society, which has been taking what it is pleased to call "evidence" on the subject of Spiritualism, a lady, calling herself the Countess of Pomare, protested that it was not fair, and not consonant with the character of the Deity that all spiritual beings not Trinitarians should be considered diabolical. We conclude from this that "evidence" to that effect must have been offered. The old arguments against us we are prepared to meet, but this diabolical one, we must confess, a little staggers us.

According to the reports of the Society of Friends, laid before the last annual meeting, the members had increased 95 in the year, the whole number being 6,608 males, 7,286 females; total, 13,894. The births exactly balanced the deaths. There were 121 new members from "convincement," and 61 "resignations." Against 31 "disownments" there were 19 "reinstated." The habitual attenders not members are 3,803, being 145 more than last year. It was remarked by a senior Friend that the resignations were fewer and the convincements more than in any year since accounts had been kept. W. Tallack gave it as his opinion that the Society was never more healthy, not even in the first twenty-five years of its existence. J. Forster expressed some jealousy that in one quarterly meeting "most Friends complied" with ecclesiastical demands; and the subject was commended to the "serious attention" of the meeting for sufferings. There had been in the year 26, distraints for church-rates, 122 for tithe rent-charge, and 23 for other ecclesiastical claims; amount seized, £1,651; in Ireland, £230. A great part of the sittings was taken up with discussions on the heresies which had manifested themselves in the Lancashire and Cheshire quarterly meeting, regarding the eternity of future punishment, the authority of the Bible, the Deity of Christ, and the doctrine of the Atonement. One of the speakers having said that if a man thought it his duty to oppose the fundamental beliefs of the Society he ought to retire, W. Tallack reminded him that they "had no written creed." It was stated that theological discussions, at the institute where the lectures complained of were delivered, had been given up, and so for a time perhaps heresy may be smothered.

It sounds strange to hear of an Archbishop going to school to learn theology, yet if we may believe the Record, one at least has done it. It says: "One of the most interesting students now in the Jerusalem Diocesan School is an Armenian Archbishop named Mekkerditch, who, convinced of the errors of his Church, has left it, and is now learning English theology and literature." Our contemporary omits to tell us whether the theology is that of the High or the Low, or the Broad school, which the Eastern Archbishop is learning.

From a report of the National Society just published it appears that, so far as the Establishment is concerned, the proportion of week-day and night-school scholars to the whole population has risen since the year 1861 from one in 36 to one in 13, and that in Church Sunday-schools there are somewhat more than a million and a half of scholars. In these there has not been a similar advance, the proportion in 1831 having been one in 20, and at present it is not higher than one in 17. The Guardian tries to account for this by the difference of opinion which has existed among Churchmen as to the proper method of conducting these schools, which has done much to paralyse the efforts of clergymen, and by the extension of day-schools having rendered the instruction of Sunday-schools less valued. It adds too that Nonconformists have not scrupled in too many cases to "beguile children, by fair means or foul, from the Church schools which they have been accustomed to attend." As far as our own observation and experience go, this charge of beguiling might be brought with much more justice against Churchmen than against Dissenters.

Liverpool Protestantism is offended at the opening of a church built by Mr. Horsfall, M.P., at which high ritual is adopted, and there have been some disturbances in consequence. On Friday evening there was a crowded congregation, and when the preacher, the Rev. J. E. Bennett, of Frome, spoke of the Reformation as the first mischief which was done to the Church, and denounced Henry VIII., Oliver Cromwell, and William and Mary, many of the congregation hooted, and called out, "No Popery!" One man cried, "Out, Protestants, out!" and much alarm prevailed in the church. The police entered and quelled the uproar. On Saturday the man who shouted, "Out, Protestants, out," was taken before the magistrates and fined 20s. and costs.

The Deanery of Durham, worth £3,000 a-year, has been offered to Dr. Temple, Head Master of Rugby. The Record is grieved at the idea that such a thing is possible. But only think if the offer should be accepted! Great were the sorrow and indignation when Dr. Stanley was made Dean of Westminster, but what is that to raising one of the dreadful Essayists and Reviewers to the same dignity! These are indeed "evil days" for the Record and its friends. [Dr. Temple has, however, declined the offer, feeling that he must for the present remain at Rugby.]

The Jewish Record says that the Synod of Rabbis which has just been held has recognised three new principles—1, individual authority in religious matters; 2, the primary importance of free scientific investigation; and 3, the rejection of the belief in Israel's restoration. The synod also recommends choral services and the use of the organ in the synagogue, and musical performances on Sabbaths and festivals.

The question of the use of instrumental music in the public worship of the Scotch Presbyterian Church in England has been brought up again by the introduction of a harmonium into the Rev. Mr. Dinwiddie's church, Camden. As the Synod, after a warm organ controversy, ten or eleven years ago, passed a resolution prohibiting instrumental music, this is held to be a breach of Presbyterian order, and a flying in the face of the injunction of the Supreme Court. The offenders assert that there is nothing in the Confession of Faith against the use of instrumental music, and that there is such a strong feeling in favour of allowing individual congregations to decide the question for themselves that it would be unwise to fall back on a rule that ought to be regarded as obsolete. The subject was warmly debated till near midnight, and then adjourned to the meeting of the Presbytery in November.

Mr. Edward Stuart Talbot, Student and Lecturer of Christ Church, has accepted the office of Principal of the Keble College, Oxford, which was offered to him by the Archbishop of Canterbury on behalf of the trustees. It is expected that Mr. Talbot will be installed on April 25th, next year, being the anniversary of Mr. Keble's birth, and the college will be ready for the reception of students in the following term.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Rev. W. J. Irons, of Brompton, is a bold man. Just when the feeling of Archbishop Tillotson with regard to the Athanasian Creed, that it were well if the Church were rid of it, is evidently growing strong, the rev. gentleman comes out as the champion of it, damnable clauses and all. In a letter to the Morning Post, he contends, if we believe that people will be punished in the next world for not believing the doctrine taught in the creed, how can it be uncharitable—it is not rather the reverse—to tell them so? And he adds:

"If—which God forbid—any relaxation of the use of this creed be conceded among us, let us remember that we should be far guiltier, and may expect to be visited with far more active confusion, than the Eastern Churches, who never had that creed; and that we shall be leaving the Church of Rome in the advanced position of being the only Church which requires the full truth to be distinctly upheld as to the nature of the glorious God whom we adore. Sir, there was a time—a passing time—when the historian described the crisis of the faith as 'Athanasius contra mundum, et totus mundus contra Athanasium.' It will 'make the ears of every one that heareth to tingle,' if we should live to have it said among the churches that the divine Trinity is henceforth an 'open question' everywhere but in Rome. Yes, and that henceforth as to this divine mystery, it is to be 'Romana ecclesia contra mundum, et totus mundus contra ecclesiam Romanam.'"

In the Fortnightly, the Rev. Llewellyn Davies thus fairly comments on a concession of some leading free-thinkers:

"Professor Huxley, in the paper in which he has declared so uncompromising a determination to know nothing but natural phenomena and their laws, seems to reduce the noblest acts of duty to the precise level of the contractile agitation of the protoplasm in the hairs of the stinging-nettle. 'All thought,' he says, 'is but the expression of molecular changes in the physical matter of life. As surely as every feature grows out of past and present, so will the physiology of the future gradually extend the realm of matter and law until it is co-extensive with knowledge, with feeling, and with action.' Most of his readers cannot help feeling depressed by such a prospect, and would at any rate take it to be discouraging to moral appeals and exhortations; but Mr. Huxley, with his unsparing severity, when he has excited their fears, proceeds to laugh at them as foolish; and he himself seems to consider the identity in nature of action and contractility as positively suggesting with peculiar emphasis a moral conclusion. 'Why trouble ourselves,' he asks, 'with anything beyond natural phenomena? We live in a world which is full of misery and ignorance, and the plain duty of each and all of us is to try to make the little corner he can influence somewhat less miserable and somewhat less ignorant than it was before he entered it.' The plain duty of each and all of us! Where in the world, we are inclined to ask, does Mr. Huxley find a place for plain duty amongst his molecular changes? Nevertheless, we see that he does acknowledge a plain duty for all and each; and this plain duty he declares to be to strive against misery and ignorance. Well; any man who does that, in the eye of the Christian, is doing God's will; if he is responsible for doing it, he is really responsible to God. Mr. Huxley is a physiologist, and goes a little aside from his own professional line in making this appeal to our consciences. But when we see the warmth with which such moralists as Mr. Mill, say, or M. Comte, treat moral questions, the enthusiasm with which they desire the improvement of the human race, their indignation against wrong, their reverence for goodness, the profound sense of responsibility they would cultivate in themselves and others, we cannot but say, these men live by faith more than most Christians, and their faith is in—what? In what we, speaking for ourselves, should most certainly name God."

The Madrid correspondent of the Daily News considers the appointment of Zorilla to the department of Grace and Justice as of the utmost importance. He is the author of all the chief decrees which have from time to time been issued secularising education, and taking it out of the hands of the priests. Formerly no school could be conducted except under clerical surveillance. The priest must sanction its opening, certify to the fitness of the teachers, inspect and approve the class books used, and visit it at fixed or unfixed hours, to see that it was being conducted on good Catholic principles. Now, thanks to Zorilla, the priest has no power to enter a school unless he is sent for—no right of interfering whatever. Zorilla is also the author of the decree for the inventories of cathedrals and monasteries, which has already brought to light not only rich treasures of silver and gold, but still richer ones of literary and historical interest. From the secret recesses and cob-webbed corners of these old religious buildings rare archaeological treasures have been dragged to light, which when arranged and catalogued, as Zorilla is now having them done, will doubtless tempt many members of our English learned societies to visit Spain in their search after the antique and the interesting. In the fine old city of Toledo alone, the home of the Goth, the Hebrew, and the Moor, and principally in its rare old Gothic cathedral, so many objects of this nature have been discovered, that they are to be preserved in the city itself in a museum specially decreed for the purpose.

Sir J. Coleridge had some reason to feel indignant at the treatment which his University Test Bill received at the hands of the Lords. He said if the majority who voted against it were unaware that demands of this kind ought not to be subject to contemptuous rejection, they were the only persons in the kingdom who laboured under such ignorance.

Referring to the subject, the Star thinks the House of Lords has been true to its instincts in siding with the owls and bats. There was an opportunity for being illiberal, and they seized it. Some of the Peers talked of compromise. They would open half of the fellowships to Dissenters. It is only the old story, "Let us keep for ourselves and our order as much of the money as possible, and while prating for principle, let us chaffer for pence." The Liberals, on their side, may now well insist on being done with small measures. Why should we not have the rewards of the universities and colleges, in all the three kingdoms, absolutely free to every citizen, of whatever creed or faith, before the date when the Irish Church Bill is to take effect? People are weary of compromise and half measures with unteachable Peers.

"Seven Fellows of Colleges" have also published a protest against the treatment which the Bill has received from the House of Lords, on which the Fall Mall remarks:

"The proposal, as the writers of the letter point out, is no new or rash one, such as to afford the slightest pretext for the sort of supercilious surprise with which some noble lords were pleased to receive it. It is a proposal which has not only long been mooted, but which has long received the assent of the most active and progressive part of the working body of either university, and of the whole of liberal opinion outside the universities. It is, moreover, of the nature of a compromise; it is a permissive, and not a compulsory proposal, and as such has gained the suffrages of many persons not generally in sympathy with Liberal opinion. It is a proposal to put an end to a state of things which may roughly, but faithfully, be summed up thus. All Christian believers not belonging to the Church of England, but who differ from members of the Church on no single essential of religion, are by the present system of university tests excluded from university offices and college fellowships. Of persons belonging nominally to the Church of England who are in various stages of religious doubt, who are not Christians at all, or whose Christianity does differ in essential points from that of the Church of England, those who hold themselves justified in subscribing to these tests, as to an unmeaning form, are admitted to offices and fellowships; those who do not hold themselves so justified are excluded from them. This simple statement of the case shows how injurious to one class, and how demoralising to the other (and that men of intellect belong to both classes no one will deny) the present regulations are. The evil is a crying one. The House of Lords recognises no evil; no prominent member of the Conservative ranks in that House, with the exception of Lord Carnarvon, thinks the subject worthy of his wisdom. This is, perhaps, not the time to exacerbate the differences between the House of Peers and those members of society who are not peers. But it is impossible to pass over without recognition such a symptom as is afforded by the letter to which we have drawn attention of the esteem in which certain intelligent members of society regard the policy of the House of Lords on this point."

The Spectator regrets to acknowledge that the Archbishop of Canterbury, in the closing debate on the Irish Church Bill, really gave some show of plausibility to the Rev. J. Baldwin Brown's suggestion that he cherishes a sort of desperate loathing of voluntarism, such as St. Paul before his conversion felt for Christianity, and expends that surplus of fanaticism which the conditions of an establishment do not permit him to exhale in the form of religious heat in political denunciation of the voluntary principle. We are not voluntarists (the Spectator continues), but his Grace of Canterbury's remarks seem to us thoroughly intolerant, and all but indecent in the head of a national Church, who is bound to treat all the less favoured religions with courtesy. He spoke of those who desire the voluntary principle as "infatuated," and grounded his hope for the future of the disestablished Irish Church entirely on the two facts that it is to retain a moderate endowment, and that "the clergy who will first have to administer the concerns of that Church will have been brought up in a totally different system from the voluntary system." Surely his Grace was almost beside himself? Has he any reason to believe that the first Christian Churches were "quite unlike those fostered on the voluntary system?" If not, of course our Lord and his disciples would have utterly "despaired" of them. Or, perhaps, Dr. Tait would despair of all merely spiritual help, although divine, without solid money to back it?

In a notice of the July number of the Theological Review, the Spectator, speaking of Mr. Tayler's article on "The canon of Muratori"—the last from his pen—adds:

"There were often occasions on which Mr. Tayler's theology seemed to us faulty and his criticism erroneous. We have always argued, in particular, against the views which he held, and which in this article he repeats, about the authorship of the Fourth Gospel; but it was always a pleasure to deal with an opponent so learned, so wise, so full of the rarest candour and of boundless charity."

AMERICAN NOTES.

One of the complaints of the day is that the ministry is declining in power and influence, and many and various are the remedies offered for it. The Liberal Christian prescribes a small dose of common sense. It says:

"We hear it said, every few days, that the profession is running out, and that only the poorer sort of minds are entering it, and entering it because they have not brain enough to succeed elsewhere. We have heard the same thing said, and just as strongly, for twenty-five years. A venerable friend assures us that sixty years ago he was told that the ministry was declining; and at the first association meeting that he attended the question debated was, 'What ought we to do in view of the declining condition of the ministry?' We read that at the beginning of the eighteenth century the New England clergy 'greatly bemoaned the low estate into which the ministry of Christ's Church in these colonies had fallen.' Fuller thought the clergy of his day had sadly degenerated. Bede is grieved that the Church is so poorly served. Indeed, almost every ecclesiastical writer through the Middle Ages is troubled by the falling off of the ministry in mental force and moral fitness. A profession that has been declining for fifteen hundred years, and yet shows such vigour as the ministry does to-day, like the physician 'whose sands of life have nearly run out' these fifty years, is good for another generation or two.

"It sometimes seems to us that the wish is father to the thought in this matter of a declining ministry, or that men resort to this cheap accusation as an excuse for not attending church. Those who believe in the Church as an institution and attend its services regularly, do not observe the symptoms of the intellectual consumption which is preying so fatally upon the vitals of our modern preachers. The great dailies are glad to fill their columns every Monday with reports of what this profession, which is tottering on its last legs, had to say the day before. On every great occasion some minister is brought forward, usually as the orator to utter what all men feel, because he can do it better than any one of the organs of the public mind and conscience. The best public speakers in this country to-day are preachers or lecturers, and every successful and respectable lecturer is a preacher who has not been ordained. The work of the ministry is entirely different from what it was, but it is more direct and popular in its character than ever before; and though here and there are ministers who do not understand the altered condition of things, and adapt themselves to the new circumstances of these new times, for men who do understand the wants and catch the spirit of the age, there is nowhere else so vast an opportunity of usefulness and influence."

Henry Ward Beecher having said "no one is born virtuous," the Liberal Christian remarks:

"This profound observation is undoubtedly true as that no one is born with a knowledge of mathematics or of music or of any of the dead languages. But the remark, with sentences which precede and follow it, shows how easy it is to say one thing and give people an impression that you have said another. Virtue, being an acquisition, just as much as the art of singing or a knowledge of astronomy, of course no one can possess it at birth. But this is very different from innocence, which every one has at birth, Adam's transgression and total depravity to the contrary notwithstanding. Those who give up the latter as an old wives' fable without so much as a peg in human nature or history or Scripture to hang upon, never claimed that the infant is born with a stock of virtue, any more than that he was born with a stock of self-adjusting clothes suitable for every age and condition of his subsequent life, and an innate Latinity, and all the transactions of the philosophical societies written on his brain. They simply claim that every child is born innocent; that no taint of ancestral guilt rests upon his conscience; that no sin of Adam or anybody interposes a bar to his moral progress and shuts him away from the love and care of God; that he is responsible for nothing that took place before his birth, and will never have to repent of anybody's wickedness but his own; that he is born innocent, pure as the infinite Paternity from whom he came, but capable of virtue and vice, of goodness and of guilt, of angelhood and devilhood. We do not try to shut our eyes to the actual depravity in the world, nor deny the fact that, in most instances, the innocence of childhood is of short duration. So Adam is said to have been created "holy," but he tumbled into transgression, according to the account, very much sooner than most children do. We do not expect the rose to preserve its perfect whiteness very long by the roadside, where the dust blows upon it and the cinders from the locomotive drop into it. We have not the social and moral conditions to preserve innocence a great while. But though there is very much less virtue in the world than there might be if all men understood their duty and felt the importance of doing it, yet we are persuaded that there is far more of it than those who harp continually upon human depravity represent or even dream."

Writing to the Methodist Recorder, the Rev. W. Morley Punshon says:

"Affecting news has reached us from the Saskatchewan neighbourhood. We recently commenced a mission to the Blackfeet Indians, the fiercest and most warlike of the tribes of the Rocky Mountains. Among the Crees we have been long at work, and with considerable success. Among the most notable converts was a noble old chief called Mas-ke-pe-toon. This fine old man some years ago went into a hostile camp unarmed, with only his Bible in his hand, and returned unhurt, leaving a blessing behind him. About the middle of April he started on a similar errand to the camp of the Blackfeet, hoping to arrange for a lasting peace between the tribes. As he was approaching the camp, bearing a white flag in one hand and carrying his Bible in the other, a ferocious Blackfoot, known by the name of the Swan, rushed forward and shot him, which was the signal for a general slaughter, and seven of the Crees who accompanied him were literally cut to pieces. The death of the chief is regarded as a national loss. He was staunch in his Protestant principles and his love for the white man, and exerted more influence than any other chief east of the mountains. Our missionary, the Rev. George McDougall, feels his loss acutely. He had arranged to meet the chief at a camp-meeting in the month of May, but Mas-ke-pe-toon has gone to swell the martyr's noble host."

In connection with this Mr. Punshon mentions a noteworthy event in the eastern province of Canada:

"Some 400 Iroquois Indians, for some time dissatisfied with the priest of the Church of Rome in their village, have done their utmost formally to abandon her communion. I say 'done their utmost' advisedly, because in the present state of the law in the province of Quebec they are regarded as infants under guardianship, and there is some doubt as to their legal capability to act for themselves. A young French missionary has been with them for some weeks to counsel and encourage them. It was thought at the Conference that an older minister should be entrusted with the charge, but a remonstrance was sent to me, one of the most original, I venture to say, ever addressed to a stationing committee, praying that the one who had gained their affections might be permitted to remain. This remonstrance now lies before me. It is written in French, and is to this effect: 'There is to-day great consternation and pain in our poor village, and we will apprise you of the reason of our sorrow. We have learned to-day by the newspapers sad tidings, that we are threatened, and that it is almost decided that we are to lose our minister—the well beloved of our Iroquois. It is therefore that we, chiefs of the Iroquois nations or tribes, do make our humble request and supplication that he may be retained and stay with us, to share our sorrows and our labours. In testimony of which we sign our names.' Then follows the chief's signature, 'the Swan,' and after his the names of thirty-seven men and thirty-seven women. Strange, that within a day or two, from opposite points in the field, one chief 'the Swan,' should butcher unoffending Christians, and another chief, 'the Swan,' should be thus thirsty for the retention of a messenger of the Word of Life."

THE SANDEMANIANS.

WE make the following abridgment from an account of this expiring sect which appeared in a recent number of the Christian World.

At no time an influential denomination, they are less than ever likely to become so now. The late Professor Faraday was one of their elders, and for a time conferred on them a little of his world-wide reputation; but one swallow does not make a summer, nor does one great man confer greatness on a Church. But Faraday is gone. And now they may be described as a very plain and humble folk, aiming at keeping up in their own hearts Christian love, and in their own circle primitive practices, rather than at aggressive movements, without which no Church or denomination can expect in this busy age long to live.

There is one Sandemanian church in London, up in Barnsbury, at the corner of one of the streets running out of the Roman-road. The original church was founded in the Barbican; but, four or five years ago, City improvements necessitated its removal to its present site. It was in the old chapel that Professor Faraday used to take his turn in preaching. In the new chapel his widow is still one of the worshippers. It is a neat, simple structure, of white brick, with no architectural pretensions of any kind. It only differs from other places of worship in having no board up announcing to what denomination it belongs, nor the name of the preacher, nor the hours of assembly, nor where applications for sittings are to be made, nor to whom subscriptions are to be paid. Indeed, the only reference at all to an outside world seems to consist in the putting up a caution intimating that the building is under the guardianship of the police, and persons evilly disposed had better mind what they are about. They have service twice on Sunday, in the morning and afternoon, and a week-day meeting on Wednesday evening. They have no Sunday or day school, no tract distribution, no district visiting, no minister, and no other means of acting on the world or forming religious opinion. Indeed, they seem averse to anything of the kind. "We are utterly," says one of their publications, "against aiming to promote the cause we contend for either by creeping into private homes or by causing our voice to be heard in the streets, or by officiously obtruding our opinions upon others." Even if you enter their place of worship there is no pew-opener to show you to a seat. They claim simply to obey the commands of the Bible implicitly, to be a Church founded for mutual edification and love—nothing more. The stranger who for the first time attends will be struck with the absence of the pulpit, instead of which he will find two large desks, one above the other, in which are seated three or four elderly persons; with the attention which is paid to the reading of the Bible; the illiterate way in which those who preach and pray do so; and the length and dullness of the service.

In England they have, it is believed, only one place of worship, in Scotland three or four, and perhaps somewhat more in America. The chapel in London will seat from three to four hundred, and is always nearly filled with respectable people; of the really poor they seem to have none at all.

The Sandemanians originated in Scotland, in 1728, as a kind of reaction against Presbyterianism and Calvinism. Mr. John Glass, a minister of the Kirk, left it on account of his views as to faith, which he defined as simple assent to the Divine testimony concerning Jesus. A Mr. Robert Sandeman, one of his elders, however, by his numerous writings left on the new organisation the impress of his name. In these days, when metaphysical speculation has little encouragement amongst Christians, the Sandemanians tell us they have no formal creed or confession of faith—that they simply follow Scripture practice, and that is all. For this purpose they meet together on the first day of the week, not only to read and hear the Word, but particularly to break bread or communicate together in the Lord's Supper; to pray, which is done by several in turns; to listen to an exhortation from one of the elders. They are a sort of Christian republic. At the conclusion of every prayer—whether pronounced by the elders or the brethren—the whole church say, Amen, according to what is intimated in 1 Cor. xiv. 16. In the interval between the morning and the afternoon service they have their love-feast, of which every member partakes, when they salute each other with a holy kiss. The children are all baptised, on the plea that if one of the parents believes the children are not unclean but holy, and because it is written in Acts, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved and thy house."

They deem it unlawful to eat flesh with its blood; they wash each other's feet; they hold all things in common so far as the claims of the poor and the church are concerned; they forbid no amusements but those connected with the lot, such as cards or dice; their elders are chosen from amongst them on account of their piety and character, and all ordained by prayer and fasting, and laying on of hands. A deacon is elected in the same way, minus the fasting. Any one who appears to understand and believe the truth may be admitted into their fellowship. When a person is excommunicated the act takes place in the presence of the whole church. In every church transaction, whether it be receiving, censuring, or expelling members, or choosing officers, or in performing any other business, unanimity is deemed indispensable. If there is a dissenting brother, after the reasons of the dissent have been stated and judged unscriptural by the church, he is expelled. The Sandemanians allow neither government by a majority nor a representation of minorities.

The writer of this account thinks nothing was ever more uninteresting, nothing ever more calculated to alienate from religion intelligent young people, than the services conducted by the Sandemanians. The elders and deacons, excellent men undoubtedly, are singularly deficient in preaching power. They cannot even read the Bible in an impressive and edifying manner, nor is their psalmody much better. They have a literal version of the Psalms, and they sing them through, a couple of verses or so at a time. This is a specimen:

"Moab I will My wash-pot make,
O'er Edom cast My shoe;
Do thou, O land of Palestine,
Triumph because of Me."

The modern hymnology, of which all sections of the Church are justly proud, exists in vain for them. Their Church seems utterly destitute of intellectual vigour; and when, as in these days, brains are beginning to rule, the piety that rejects or ignores them is in danger. There is a relation between the Bible and modern thought of which the good people who preach dull sermons and make dull prayers up in Barnsbury seem to have no idea.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, JULY 30, 1869.

WHAT AILS "THE PEOPLE AND THE PULPIT"?

WHAT is wrong with the ministry? We mean not the ministry of the State, but the ministry of the churches. There are some people who are never tired of inveighing against its weakness and inefficiency; some even of its own members who are always restless under the sense of being in some way "cribbed, cabined, and confined" by its usages and limitations. They speak contemptuously of everything clerical, endeavour to make believe that they don't belong to it, treat it as an effete institution, that is almost "played out," and generally are in a state which is disquieting alike to themselves and their congregations.

We are afraid that the Rev. J. F. W. WARE, of whose spirited and interesting address to the Alumni at Cambridge, U.S., Divinity School, we gave a resumé last week, must be classed among these restless spirits. He gives very forcible expression to his sense of the defects of the present ministerial order, and with much of his clever criticism it is impossible to help sympathising. Yet, after all, we cannot accept either his diagnosis or his specifics.

Mr. WARE thinks that there is a widespread "revolt against the institutions of religion." We altogether doubt it with regard to England, and we are glad to find that the Liberal Christian, as will be seen in our American Notes, takes just the same view as we do for the United States. There are, certainly, very many who are adrift from them, but very few who have any positive dislike or disapproval of them. The shifting and migratory character of the population in our cities, and still more in America, accounts, we believe, for the greater part of this class. The real question is—are there fewer now than there were in former times, who are united by a bond of real religious attachment to the institutions of religion? We do not think so. But, in old times people grew up and lived amid associations which kept them in nominal attachment to churches or chapels, even though they cared nothing about them, whereas, for several generations, vast numbers have been constantly passing out of the hold of such associations, and consequently, unless attracted by new ones, have remained adrift. In old times, these attended church whatever its services, whatever its ministers. Now, they do not. Only services and ministers with real life in them can gain a hold on them. Yet, is this to be regretted? Is this a sign which should dishearten us? Surely not.

The encouraging fact is, that services with real life in them and ministers with a living faith and any faculty of uttering it, always do win men back to the churches. And this is a fact which tells against Mr. WARE's special negative remedies. With his positive requirement we thoroughly agree;—"Give us men," he cries, and quotes RUSKIN's saying, "We want not only noble teaching, but noble teachers." True; but when was it ever otherwise? Or indeed what work in this world involving more than the merest mechanical toil, but wants the same? Was there ever a time when true, strong, manly men were not needed in the ministry? Yet was there ever a time when a fairer proportion of ministers were such men? But in the old times clerical weaklings and dummies were tolerated, and now, society is growing more intolerant of such, year by year. And moreover, no outward contrivances will make them tolerated. If they are intolerable in the clerical garb, they will not be more tolerable out of it. If they cannot interest men from a pulpit, they are not likely to interest them from a platform. On the other hand, give us really manly and earnest ministers, with something to say, some positive living faith in them, hearts devoted to their work, and some faculty of speech simple and to the point, and they will take hold of men's hearts. We are not speaking of men of exceptional power like GEORGE DAWSON, SPURGEON, or HENRY WARD BEECHER. Such men will always win a hearing, though never a more splendid hearing than in the present day. But we refer to men of average power; such men as can never look for great conspicuous successes; such men as ask but for the homely standing place in the midst of ignorance, worldliness, and sin, and in the midst, too, of struggling, toiling men and women, which the pastorship of some ordinary congregation gives them, and we unhesitatingly say that such men have now-a-days as good an opportunity to do a fair work—a work to thank God for—as ever they had. And it will not matter very much whether they use or eschew ministerial conventionalities. They may live and dress pretty much after the staid fashion which has come to be regarded as clerical, or they may break out into carnal raiment and try to appear as much as possible like laymen; they may preach from a pulpit or from a platform; they may read their sermons or speak them—if they have the quickening Spirit in them they will do a true work, and men will own them as ministers, however obtrusively they disown the "Reverend." We believe the effect of these small clerical usages is very much exaggerated, alike by some who use them and by all who eschew them. It is quite a mistake to suppose that people in general like a minister the better for being eccentric or unministerial. Manliness they do like; but, given that, they rather prefer the minister who shows for what he is, does not appear any way ashamed of his vocation, and, accepting the usages that men have come to associate with it, reserves his protests for those greater matters of which a sincere Christian will always find sufficient, in which the world must be withstood and unpopular principles upheld at all hazard. And this protest will usually go furthest in great things when made by one who has not earned a character for habitual antagonism by singularity in small things. No! we feel with Mr. WARE, that the present is a transitional period, and one making peculiar demands upon the ministers of religion, though not upon them alone, but upon all who are actuated by strong religious convictions, and who would see Christianity exalted to its true place among the higher agencies of human life. But it is not some new way that is wanted, but simply greater faithfulness and more complete self-devotion in the old way of faith, love, piety.

THE IRISH CHURCH ACT.

THE final passing into law of Mr. GLADSTONE's bill for disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church must be a subject of sincere rejoicing to most of our readers. It is not often that both parties are pleased by a measure of this kind, so that it was truly refreshing to find on the morrow of the recent compromise that while the Liberal press was thoroughly satisfied, the Herald regarded it as the "capitulation of the Liberal party." For ourselves we can only say that we should have rejoiced to have got rid of "Establishment" even if the disestablished church had got off with more of the national property, which it has so long monopolised as to have believed it its own.

The Times thinks it cannot really be so great a loss that the Irish Church has no longer to sustain the hollow pretence of being the Church of the Irish people. That miserable imposture has tainted every title, and honour, and dignity—nay, even every virtue and merit, possessed by the Church. Its eloquent preachers, its clever writers have all suffered the disparagement that they were not really what they pretended to be, and that while they professed to be shepherds their sheep knew them not, and would not hear their voice. This semblance has disappeared. It is true that prospects have been "blighted," as it is called, and expectations have been reduced to sober limits. The long lives of expectants supposed to depend for promotion on episcopal favour or clerical mortality have been disappointed. But every Irishman worth his salt can easily make his way in this country, if only because the circumstances of his Church have naturally directed attention rather to preaching than to what are called pastoral duties. If an Irish clergyman is not a good preacher—and he generally is—he is nothing. It may be readily supposed that a voluntary and self-governing body will not waste much of its funds on bishoprics and stalls. It will soon find either that fewer men can do the work, or that, if the numbers must be kept, they need not be paid quite so handsomely. The Times predicts the rise of a better feeling between the Irish clergy and their congregations; that they will see more of each other, and speak more kindly one of another. Moreover, the relations with the other communions cannot but be made easier by the removal of a false assumption which barred friendly approach and made confidence impossible.

The Standard says that, resigned to a fate which was not to be averted, the Irish Anglicans will gather courage and determination to strengthen their Church as much as possible. But if anything could keep alive the sense of wrong and the indignation which it engenders, it would be the peculiar kind of paternal counsel and affectionate consolation now being addressed to them by the Times and others. It should be enough for the Radicals and their organs that the Church has been humiliated and plundered. There is no occasion to insult her and her indignant sons with flippant protests that she has not been wronged at all, and ought to be rather thankful than otherwise for "the precious boon" of disestablishment and "the tender mercies" of disendowment. The Standard points out that this sort of argument leads to an obvious conclusion. If disestablishment and disendowment are such mighty instruments for promoting the efficiency of a Church, why was the beneficent remedy withheld from the Church of England? But if it was an instrument of strengthening and healing designed for the building up and strengthening of the Protestant Church in Ireland, upon what ground are English Protestants to be excluded from similar favours?

We thank the Standard for the suggestion. We also think that the conclusion is obvious.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

WE rejoice to be able to announce that the committee of Manchester New College, after very careful deliberation, have invited the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A., to undertake the professorship left vacant by the death of the Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A., and that Mr. DRUMMOND, after some weeks of anxious consideration, has accepted this important post.

The subjoined correspondence will be read with deep interest and satisfaction throughout our churches:

MEMORIAL ADOPTED AT A MEETING OF THE CROSS-STREET CONGREGATION ON SUNDAY, 11TH JULY, 1869.

Reverend and Dear Mr. Drummond,—We, members of Cross-street Congregation, have heard, with mingled feelings of rejoicing and regret, that you have received from the Manchester New College a very urgent invitation to undertake the duties of a professor in that institution.

We are unaffectedly glad to think that so honorable a call has been laid upon you,—you whom we know so well, and of whose character, powers, and influence, we, of all who cherish English Presbyterian piety, earnestness and freedom, are perhaps the best able to judge.

We own with satisfaction our own belief that the College Committee made a wise choice when it proposed to you to enter upon the office left vacant by the death of the late Rev. John James Tayler.

We admit the gravity of a summons at the instance of such a body as the trustees of the College, to take charge of the training of ministers, to whom the rising generation throughout the country are to look for guidance and encouragement in their endeavours after religious life, in their search after the highest truths, and in all strife for the most faithful service.

We must say that if you should decide to enter upon the important field of duty which this invitation opens to you, our own loyalty to interests which seem weightier than those of any particular Congregation, and our deep sense of your own peculiar fitness for such a charge, would compel us to sympathise with you in the effort to lay down your relations with ourselves, and to assume the responsibilities of the Professorship; while that effort would add one more occasion to the many in which you have won our respect and regard.

In accordance with these views, we will not attempt to complicate your consideration of a question of duty, which must, we know, present itself to you with singular difficulty, by intruding on you now with that personal appeal which we should feel it to be our pressing duty and our great pleasure to lay before you, not only on our own account, but for the sake of our older and long-loved friend and minister, Mr. Gaskell, were the conflicting claims merely those of your old and of a new congregation.

Only we will venture, before you have made your decision, to tender you the assurance at once of our sincerest acknowledgment of what you have hitherto done with us and for us; and of our confidence that whatever step you may think it right to take, will be taken in obedience to that single-minded regard to duty, which you have ever so faithfully preached and practised amongst us.

We sincerely hope that this expression of our respect and trust, and of our grateful and affectionate regard, far from being an embarrassment in the way, will be an assistance to you in the exercise of a judgment, which we, as we know you, would wish to be unbiassed by the tenderest personal associations.

Should you, upon mature consideration, decide upon continuing to undertake the active duties of the ministry amongst us, we shall unfeignedly rejoice; for we can think of no arrangement so likely to promote intelligent and religious life amongst ourselves and our children, and our neighbours in this province, as one which should afford to you and to us the opportunity of a prolonged intercourse, and a steady development of your great powers and influence as a preacher of the good news of the Kingdom of God.

GEO. STANLEY DARESHIRE, Chairman.

MR. DRUMMOND'S REPLY.

1, George-street, Cheetham Hill,
July 20th, 1869.

My dear Friends,—The time has come when I must reply to the memorial which you have addressed to me. In the midst of conflicting thoughts, and the endeavour to solve correctly a very difficult problem, it has given me much comfort to receive such an assurance of your confidence and regard. I deeply appreciate the delicate consideration with which you have abstained from pressing upon me your own claims, and have expressed your willingness to accept the decision which duty may seem to require. I am sure you will believe me that I am not inensible to the urgency of those claims. I can never forget the generous confidence with which you elected me as one of your ministers when I had not yet quitted my academic seclusion, or the universal kindness with which you welcomed me among you. I cannot be sufficiently grateful for the friendships which I have formed, and the experiences which I have gained during my connection with you. Nor may I omit all reference to your older minister, whose unvarying kindness relieved the anxieties, and lightened the labours of the otherwise too trying years of my early ministry.

I am aware also of the great importance of endeavouring to maintain, in such a city as Manchester, a theology at once liberal and spiritual, a piety answering to the deepest Christian needs, yet not antagonistic to the reforming movements of the day, and a philanthropy as wide in its sympathies as the community in which its activity is exercised. To these considerations must be added my own personal attachment to the active ministry, and the acute pain which I feel at the prospect of quitting the pulpit for the chair.

All these thoughts have weighed upon me, and made it extremely difficult to arrive at the conclusion which I have at last formed, to accept the offered professorship. I need not trouble you with the various lights in which the work of the professor has presented itself to my mind. I am accepting the office in the simple hope that I may be enabled to render better service to the churches. We are living, as I believe, in the very midst of a struggle between old and new principles in which even our little Non-conformist academy has a grave responsibility laid upon it, and in which, if our congregations faithfully support it by supplying students of the highest culture and ability, it may yet give important help in guiding the religious life of our country. A false step now might be fatal to the hopes which we all entertain for its usefulness; and though I should never have thought of offering myself as one in any way qualified to assist in directing its future career, yet, when its committee have with singular unanimity selected me as the proper man to fill the vacant chair, I have not considered it right to decline their invitation. The future alone can decide whether I have formed a wise determination. Certainly I have not consulted my own interests in the matter. I am to leave a known and much-loved sphere of usefulness for an unknown, and one which in some of its aspects is less congenial to my tastes; and though many hopes press upon my mind, it may be that only failure and disappointment await me. In a choice which at present gives me almost un-mixed pain, and not least because it occasions some sorrow and anxiety to you, may I not rely upon your sympathy, and ask you to add your prayers to mine, that this our joint-offering may help to promote a deeper religious life in the churches with which we are more immediately connected, and may in some small measure aid the progress of freedom, truth, and goodness in our country.—Believe me to remain, ever your sincere friend,

JAMES DRUMMOND.

ROUGH NOTES OF A HOLIDAY VISIT TO SOME ENGLISH CATHEDRALS, &c.

NO. I.—YORK, LINCOLN, AND PETERBOROUGH.

MY visit to YORK MINSTER was made under very favourable conditions,—a short and pleasant run from Harrogate—charming weather—and cheerful and intelligent companions. Twenty-one years had elapsed since I first saw this magnificent creation of the piety and art of the middle ages. To-day we walked round it and through it in a leisurely way, with the advantage of some previous study of its component parts, their relative situation, date, purpose, and architectural peculiarities. This Minster is simply a realised dream. A minute description of it can be attempted only by the boldness of genius, or the presumption of conceit; and having not the first, nor caring to incur the imputation of the second, I shall say only that its vastness, richness, elegance and beauty, far transcended all my anticipations. We attended evening service, which was literally performed, and that by no means in a spirit congenial with the profound reverence and skill displayed in every portion, almost in every decorated stone, of this great structure. Only by a straining of language could it be called common prayer, and the music was but “indifferent well.” Indeed it can be little better than a travesty of the original intent of the founders of this superb Minster, to employ its great resources for no purpose, so far as I could see, beyond that of enabling some thirtysinging men and boys to chant a service, each morning and afternoon, to about the same number not of worshippers so much as of listeners. To me it seemed that the fretted roof, the lofty aisles, the sublime magnitude and admirable proportions of the building, appealed far more powerfully to the reverent imagination, and far more efficiently touched the springs of devotional feeling, than the voices of heedless choristers and drawing readers. The sooner that “disestablishment” comes the better, to English as well to Irish Churches; for then, surely, the munificent piety of the dead will shame, if it do not stimulate to worthier effort, the slumbering and inert consciences of the living.

Availing myself of the earliest express, I reached LINCOLN by half-past nine a.m. The morning was resplendent, and the country looked enchanting. Nothing could be finer than the moors on the Sheffield line, unless it were the rich, fat pastures of the level district about Retford, where additional interest is given to the general appearance of things by the prevalence of red-tiled, Dutch-looking houses and other buildings. I kept a sharp look-out for the CATHEDRAL as we neared Lincoln, and was delighted with its grand and imposing situation, capping the only elevation to be found in this level country. At a glance I noted its great length, its superb towers (two western and one central), and its transepts. Before climbing up to examine it, however, I resolved to look through the lower part of the city, which I knew afforded an interesting illustration of a practice that Conqueror William and his fellow-freebooters were addicted to, viz., to take possession of the higher and better parts of the towns they subdued, and send down the poor Saxon natives to grovel at the base. To this cause it is owing that the worst parts of old cities are often richest in Saxon remains; and Lincoln is particularly so. The Church of St. Peter-at-Gowts here presents a rare specimen, quite entire, of a Saxon tower. Close by is a house of about the same date. In the High-street, St. Mary's conduit attracted my attention—a charming specimen of a Gothic public fountain, wonderfully superior to the perpendicular troughs we have in Manchester, whether “presented” or otherwise. Up “Steep-hill” I then toiled, and none was ever more appropriately named. As I passed, I looked carefully at one or two of the old city gates, and also at the quaint building known as the “Jews' House.” And now to the Cathedral. I was struck first with the thoroughly Norman character of the style. The West door, of enormous height, was wide open, affording an uninterrupted view of the nave, the organ-screen, the choir, and the stained windows in the Lady Chapel beyond. Whilst sauntering about, a semi-clerical official presented himself, and inquired very much in the tone and with the manner of a gentleman, whether it was my wish to see the Cathedral? He took me in tow, and a very intelligent and agreeable cicerone he was. We had several little discussions as we went along. Amongst others, we talked about the spaces over the triforium (the tier of arches between the clear-story and the lowest range) along which you may walk (if you ever get up there) all round the interior of the structure. I adduced various theories, such as that the monks used them for promenades; that from them banners could be suspended, and garlands thrown across, &c. His own speculation was that, on great festival days, the fair nuns were allowed to gaze down from the giddy height, at processions and other ceremonials. There is a superb window, 800 years old. The organ-screen, a splendid specimen of carving, is of about 1330, and the gates opening into the choir were made at least 600 years ago. The ceiling is of solid stone, averaging 2 feet 6 inches thick. How in the world was such a great number of pieces hoisted 200 feet high, and then fitted so exquisitely? Near the remains of an altar to “Our Lady,” that was at one time very celebrated, is a place in the stone flooring, over which thousands of pilgrims had slid, drawing their feet slowly along as they bowed their reverences, and which is thus scooped out to a depth of a couple of inches or more, presenting now the appearance of a little trough. Several other marked indications of Roman Catholic times and practices were shown: confessionals, lavatories in which the priests washed the sacred vessels, and their own hands before celebrating, &c. The cloisters, three sides of the quadrangle remaining perfect, are exceedingly fine; and in one corner is a specimen of Roman pavement, which must have been first put down some 1,600 years ago. My guide was so clerical-looking that I almost feared to wound his gentlemanly feelings when I offered him a florin, but he survived the shock! I then sauntered for an hour about the Close. Here the neighbouring houses seem to nestle up to the Cathedral, and sleep in its mighty shade. Embowered in roses; with lovely gardens; through half-opened windows they show the passer-by such glimpses of ease, and quiet, and elegance, as might make him envious, unless he were the most contented of men. There is no doubt “snug lying in the Abbey;” and it is but a fitting complement to the pleasant living in the Cathedral Close.

THE CATHEDRAL at PETERBOROUGH is there the sole object of interest. Its nave, of almost gleaming whiteness, is grand in its massive simplicity and fine proportions. It dates from about 1117; is much less ornate than Lincoln; and has but little stained glass, except in the choir. The roof of the nave is flat, and made of wood, painted with elaborate devices. The architects of this period dared not to venture on the wide expanses in stone of a later date, such as is seen in the exquisite fan-shaped roof of the Lady Chapel of this same structure. The vista of the side aisles is very good; clear, open archways, of massive solidity, that have defied, and will yet defy, the destroying hand of centuries. In general plan, Peterborough is not unlike Lincoln. I heard the greater part of the evening service, which was sung to about forty well-dressed people; much the larger proportion here, as in all the Cathedrals I visited, being ladies. The poor are conspicuous only by their absence,—English Cathedrals have apparently no Gospel for them.

H. R.

TRADITION OF THE ELDERS.

W. E. MANLY, in Liberal Christian.

IN the Gospels there are frequent references to the “tradition of the elders.” There is no express definition of what is meant by this phrase; and so we must determine its meaning by inference. It really has much to do with the correct exposition of the four Gospels. When we understand its full import, we shall see a beauty and harmony in many passages that before will seem ambiguous, not to say absurd.

One who cannot tell us what is meant by the tradition of the elders, can easily see that something is denoted by it that was not approved of by the Saviour. He speaks of this tradition in terms of reproach and condemnation. By it the Pharisees made void the law of God. It was in vain that they worshipped God, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. The New Testament not being in existence, the law of God, which was made void by the tradition of the elders, was obviously the Old Testament.

The charge of making void the law was not made at random, or without sufficient reason. The Saviour follows it up with illustrations and proof. The law had said, “Whosoever honoureth not his father or his mother, let him die the death.” But the Pharisees had said, “Whosoever shall say to his father or his mother, it is a gift by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me, he shall be free.” Or, to express the idea more clearly, the law of Moses required that children should honour their parents, and provide for them in old age. Whoever did not do this “cursed” his father and mother, and should surely be put to death. But the Pharisees adopted a traditionary interpretation of this law, which made them teach that whoever would make to the Lord a gift (corban) of that property by which his parents might be profited in the decline of life, should be free from his obligation to provide for them, and the penalty should not be inflicted.

There is a reference to this same tradition in the fifth of Matthew, where expounders have been involved in great difficulty by not perceiving this fact. “Ye have heard that it was said by them of old times; but I say unto you” thus and so. This kind of language has been construed to mean that the Law and the Gospel are directly opposed to each other; that Jesus here denies what the former taught, and lays down different principles. This is a great mistake, and it is especially unfortunate, as taking away the beauty and harmony of the Scriptures.

When Jesus refers to the Law of Moses, contained in the Old Testament, he more commonly says, “It is written,” or “Moses says.” He does not say, “Ye have heard that it was said.” The latter expression applies to verbal tradition, not to written documents, and the reference is to the very tradition of the elders (them of old time), about which we are speaking. And with this reference it is not surprising that Jesus should deny its accuracy, and lay down different principles. True, there is a reference to subjects treated of in the law, but this is explained by the fact that the tradition of the elders was itself an exposition of the teachings of the Old Testament. But though the subjects to which there is reference, are contained in the law of Moses, such as murder, adultery, swearing, loving our neighbour, &c., yet no such language as the Saviour here controverts, nor precisely such principles, can there be found. The law contains proper regulations relating to murder, but it says nothing in that connection about calling a brother "raca," "fool," &c. And though the passage is so construed, in our version, as to put these words into the mouth of the Saviour, a true construction would make them a part of the tradition which he condemns. The law has something to say about swearing, but the tradition had made such additions and modifications as tended to weaken and destroy the effect of the original statute. The law had inculcated love to one's neighbour; the tradition had added the unwarrantable demand to hate one's enemy. It was against the perversion of the true law that Jesus uttered his rebukes, and not against the law itself. And, besides this, he would show the Jews that, while he sanctioned the law, as far as it went, and condemned only its perversions, he went farther than the law did, and made sin to consist in the intentions and motives as well as in the act of sin. Hence, when speaking of adultery, he shows that he went farther than either the law or the traditionary rendering of it. It is plain that what Jesus calls the tradition of the elders the Jews denominated an Oral Law, and maintained that it was as old as the written law, and was given at the same time by God to a set of men called elders, to be preserved along with the written law, through all ages, and was to be relied on as a true and faithful exposition of the same. In fact, however, it was no older than the Captivity, and was invented to give some countenance to the doctrines which the Jews had learned from the heathens.

HENRY CRABB ROBINSON'S "DIARY."

III.

AFTER calling on an old friend, in September, 1815, Mr. Robinson writes:

"She began interrogating me about my religious opinions. This she did in a way so kind and benevolent that I could not be displeased, or consider her impertinent. I was unable to answer as I could wish. However, I did not refuse to declare to her that such orthodoxy as Mr. N——'s would deter me from Christianity. I cannot wish to have a belief which excludes from salvation such persons as my own dear mother, my uncle Crabb, and a large portion of the best people I have ever known."

In September, 1816, we have this account of wholesale christening:

"Strolling into the Old Church [now the Cathedral] at Manchester, I heard a strange noise, which I should elsewhere have mistaken for the bleating of lambs. Going to the spot, a distant aisle, I found two rows of women standing in files, each with a babe in her arms. The minister went down the line, sprinkling each infant as he went. I suppose the efficacy of the sprinkling—I mean the fact that the water did touch—was evidenced by a distinct squeal from each. Words were muttered by the priest on his course, but one prayer served for all. This I thought to be a christening by wholesale; and I could not repress the irreverent thought that, being in the metropolis of manufactures, the aid of steam or machinery might be called in. I was told that on Sunday evenings the ceremony is repeated. Necessity is the only apology for so irreverent a performance of a religious rite. How the essence of religion is sacrificed to these formalities of the Establishment!"

On the appointment of Gifford, afterwards Lord Gifford, to the Solicitor-Generalship, in 1817, H. C. R. writes:

"Gifford's father was a Presbyterian grocer at Exeter. He was himself articled to an attorney, and was never at a University. He was formerly a warm Burdettite! On the other hand, I believe he has long abandoned the conventicle, and has been quiet on political subjects, if he has not changed his opinions. . . . My only concern is that a man hitherto universally beloved should thus early in life be in danger of making bankrupt of his conscience, which Lord Bacon says has been the fate of so many who have accepted the offices of Attorney-General and Solicitor-General."

The following entries, in July, 1819, relating to two of our worthies, are interesting:

"We kept up a conversation with very little disputation. Belsham (and I joined him) defended Church Establishments, which he thought better than leaving religion to make its way alone. [He published three sermons in support of this view.] He said, I think my Church ought to be established; but as that cannot be, I would rather the Anglican Church should be maintained, with all its errors and superstitions, than that the unlearned should be left at large, each man spreading abroad his own errors and absurdities. Kenrick opposed him, and had on some points the best of the argument. Jardine, and indeed all the party were against Belsham and myself."

"July 8th. Mr. Kenrick breakfasted with me. I was much pleased with him; he has been, and indeed still is, tutor at the Manchester New College, York, and is going for a trip in Germany to improve in philological studies. He is a staunch Unitarian, with a deal of zeal, but is mild in his manners, a tenacious disputant, but courteous—a very promising young man."

In a note, written in 1851, Mr. Robinson adds:

"He is now the most learned of the English Unitarians, and has taken the lead in the free investigation of the Old Testament, presuming to apply to it, notwithstanding its sacred character, the rules of profane criticism."

This refers specially to Mr. Kenrick's work on Primeval History.

In a letter of Southey's, written to a friend of Mr. Robinson's, March 2, 1819, we have the following passage:

"O sir! religion is the one thing needful; without it no one can be truly happy (do you not feel this?), with it no one can be entirely miserable. Without it, this world would be a mystery too dreadful to be borne, our best affections and our noblest desires a mere juggle and a curse, and it were better, indeed, to be nothing than the things we are. I am no bigot. I believe that men will be judged by their actions and intentions, not their creeds. I am a Christian, and so will Turk, Jew, and Gentile be in Heaven, if they have lived well according to the light which was vouchsafed them. I do not fear that there will be a great gulph between you and me in the world which we must both enter; but if I could persuade you to look on towards that world with the eyes of faith, a change would be operated in all your views and feelings, and hope and joy and love would be with you to your last breath—universal love—love for mankind, and for the Universal Father into whose hands you are about to render up your spirit."

To this may be added the following, under date January 9, 1826:

"He [John Joseph Gurney] read to me some letters from Southey. In one Southey thus expressed himself: 'I cannot believe in an eternity of hell. I hope God will forgive me if I err, but in this matter I cannot say, Lord help thou mine unbelief.'"

Scattered through the Diary are several interesting notices of Mrs. Barbauld, whose acquaintance Mr. Robinson made, and was "reasonably proud" to make, in December, 1805. This is one:

"Mrs. Barbauld bore the remains of great personal beauty. She had a brilliant complexion, light hair, blue eyes, a small elegant figure, and her manners were very agreeable, with something of the generation then departing. She received me very kindly, spoke very civilly of my aunt Zachary Crabb, and said she had herself once slept at my father's house. Mrs. Barbauld is so well known by her prose writings that it is needless for me to attempt to characterise her here. Her excellence lay in the soundness and acuteness of her understanding, and in the perfection of her taste. In the estimation of Wordsworth she was the first of our literary women, and he was not bribed to this judgment by any especial congeniality of feeling, or by concurrence in speculative opinions. I may here relate an anecdote connecting her and Wordsworth, though out of its proper time by many, many years; but it is so good that it ought to be preserved from oblivion. It was after her death that Lucy Aikin published Mrs. Barbauld's collected works, of which I gave a copy to Miss Wordsworth. Among the poems is a stanza on Life, written in extreme old age. It had delighted my sister, to whom I repeated it on her deathbed. It was long after I gave these works to Miss Wordsworth that her brother said, 'Repeat me that stanza by Mrs. Barbauld.' I did so. He made me repeat it again. And so he learnt it by heart. He was at the time walking in his sitting-room at Rydal with his hands behind him; and I heard him mutter to himself, 'I am not in the habit of grudging people their good things, but I wish I had written those lines.'"

'Life! we've been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather:
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear,
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not Good Night, but in some brighter clime
Bid me Good Morning!'"

BIRMINGHAM: LAWRENCE-STREET MISSION.—There were special services on Sunday, 18th instant, in connection with the opening of the organ, which superseded the harmonium hitherto in use. The congregations were large both morning and evening, and included several of the subscribers to the Mission. As the money needed for the organ was already made up, the collections, amounting to between £5 and £6, will be applied to the purchase of hymn books and music. The sermons were preached by the Rev. John Wilson.

TO REV. H. W. C., ON HIS LEAVING GLASGOW.

THE strong age grows from truth to truth always,
Full-limbed, swift-eyed, and brave with triumphs won;
And no day dies among the by-past days,
But gives sweet revelation to the sun
In blowing buds, clear wisdom, higher praise.

Long joy may earth have, and the merry wind
Sing freely whirling through the burdened corn;
Her true sons labour for the keener mind,
To crush the shadows which they bravely scorn,
And give wide sight unto the narrow blind.

From thee an echo of the morning song,
A whisper of a beauty truly seen,
Came with the flashing words to make us strong
In pure nobility, and manly clean
In busy life, purged from all petty wrong.

Thou, as our Teacher, with thy mission free,
Unfolding to us kingdom of bright truth,
To banish jealous cherubim, and see
Our paradise with fearless eyes of youth,
And smite with flaming sword for liberty.

Thus lovingly you led us to clear climes,
Where some sweet thought would thrill and make us glad;

A word of power, a deed of grace, from times
Long past, but great to point the might they had—Urged with the moving music of true rhymes.

Then glad fair days were widened to bold years,
And with them came the summer of your aims,
The Teacher's honour, when his thought appears
In blossoms near him, and his work hath claims
To mould the musings of the soul that hears.

Fresh words come to us in rich moments of rest,
The first warm promises of freer praise
To some love-seeking spirits, hate-oppress,
Blinded with dry dust on the beaten ways,
Which made them braver in their righteous quest.

Joined in all sympathies which praises seek,
Or proud in working for the people's weal,
Or when the sunny hearts in laughter speak
Down by the long wash of the sea, or feel
The windy freedom of the mountain peak.

And now you leave us and our happy hours,
For other hearts and hands and other scenes;
May they cling to you warmly, when your powers
Strive for the worthier ministry, which gleams
Truth for the living souls, and loves the flowers.

You go, and with you truth and love, they tell
The soul they live in to be firm and dare—
Our hearts are full of trust, and longing dwell
On fadeless days, now, sighing low, we bear
The long sweet wish—God bless you, and farewell!

REVS. J. J. TAYLER AND R. B. ASPLAND.

WE translate the following notice of these two valued friends from Le Lien, the organ of the Liberal party in the Protestant Church of France:

"English Unitarianism has just been sorely tried by the death of two of its most eminent members. The Rev. John James Tayler was the Principal of Manchester New College, London, and held the chair of history and theology in that Institution. A distinguished scholar, with a candid and eminently liberal mind, Mr. Tayler, by his ability as a professor, his remarkable writings, the depth of his convictions, his respect for the opinions of others, and his earnest and never-varying goodness, had won for himself the admiration and ardent sympathy of all who knew him. His influence, during nearly fifty years, on several generations of students, has been from every point of view most marked and most salutary. Called with justice the English Schleiermacher, he was convinced like Neander, that it is the heart that makes the theologian,—pectus est quod facit theologum. This truly religious and learned man has published a great number of books, pamphlets, and sermons. One of his last and most remarkable productions is a 'Critical Essay on the Authenticity of St. John's Gospel.' Having been invited last year to take part, as the representative of English Unitarians, in the celebration of the tercentenary festival of the foundation of Unitarianism at Torda, he published a very interesting account of his journey in Transylvania, from which the materials are drawn for the article further on (in Le Lien).

The Rev. Robert Brook Aspland, a liberal thinker, and eloquent preacher, was one of those zealous and indefatigable workers who are always in the breach: a man of action, in every sense of the word. He has rendered incalculable service to the cause of Unitarianism, both as Secretary of Manchester New College and of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. For more than nineteen years he found time, in spite of all his work, to edit the Christian Reformer, which he did with ability and success. Like his associate, Mr. Tayler, he was deeply interested in historical researches, and acquainted with the most minute details of the ecclesiastical history of England. On this last subject Mr. Aspland had become quite an authority. For him, as for Mr. Tayler, all the English Unitarians mourn together as one household."

WAITING.

BY S. D. ROBBINS.

Yes, I can wait the hour sublime
When love shall triumph over time,
When truth's bright banner, all unfurled,
Shall banish error from the world.

Yes, I can wait the appointed hour
When right shall be enthroned in power,
When every form of wrong shall cease
And rainbows span the earth with peace!

Yes, I can wait till, darkness past,
The brilliant dawn shall break at last,
Fair herald of that better day
When evil shall be done away.

Yes, I can wait, for in His hand
All things are safe, by whose command
The harvest never cometh late!
Patience, my spirit, work and wait!

SALT LAKE CITY.

We cull the following particulars of the Mormon capital from "Ten Thousand Miles of Travel, Sport, and Adventure," just published, by Captain F. Trench Townshend, B.A.:

His first impressions of the city were derived from the balcony of his hotel. From there he could only see a broad street shaded by acacia and cottonwood trees, with a stream of fresh water running at each side, and one or two houses enclosed by orchards. Above the trees rose the beautiful snowy peaks of the Wahsatch mountains, while the sun shone brightly and the air felt warm and soft, after the rigorous climate of the elevated regions over which he had been travelling. It is, no doubt, owing to the dangers and difficulties of the journey, and the bleak and sterile aspect of the plains and mountains which have to be crossed before reaching the Salt Lake City that such a high opinion is generally formed of it. From Camp Douglas, two miles distant, the view is certainly lovely, reminding the traveller of Damascus as seen from the slopes of Anti-Lebanon.

The city is built at the foot of the great snowy range of the Wahsatch mountains, which with the Oquir mountains form a circle round the plain. Through this flows the Jordan river, which unites the fresh waters of Utah Lake with the briny waters of the Great Salt Lake. The latter is 15 miles from the city, and about 100 miles long by 60 broad. The water, when evaporated, yields about one barrel of salt to three of water, and is so buoyant that, as in the Dead Sea, the human body does not sink below the waist. The two lakes have another point in common; each of them has a good-sized river flowing into it, while no water flows out of one or the other. Salt Lake is, however, more than 4,000 feet above the sea, while the Dead Sea is 2,000 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. From the Lake rise two mountain islands, which, though many miles from the main land, seem almost to join the surrounding mountains.

The Mormons of Salt Lake Valley are looked upon by the people of the United States as little better than the original inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, and should a similar fate overtake them it would at least relieve the American Government from a serious difficulty.

The city contains a population of over 20,000, and covers an area of about nine miles. The streets run in straight lines, east and west, north and south, dividing the city into squares of equal size. Fresh water flows through nearly every street, and the sides are shaded by fine trees. Almost every house is situated in its own little orchard of peach and other fruit trees, giving the city an appearance very different from most others.

In Maine-street are all the large Gentile stores, banks, and hotels, and a large and increasing trade is carried on. The proprietor of one of the chief stores informed Capt. Townshend that his annual sales amounted to more than a million dollars. In this street the Gentiles have succeeded in establishing a bar, which is the only public place where spirits can be drunk. At the other hotels, tea and coffee alone are to be had. Many of the principal stores are kept by Jews, who here, by a strange perversion of names, come to be called Gentiles.

The city is divided into wards or sections, each of which is under the direct supervision of Bishops. Under them are two Councillors and Teachers, part of whose business is to look after the welfare of every family in their several districts, and report to Brigham Young, to enable him to know the exact condition of every Mormon family in the city.

"The President," as he is always styled, lives in an enclosure, surrounded by a high and roughly-built wall, originally raised as a protection against hostile Indians, within which are his private residence, offices, and houses, in which the greater number of his wives and children dwell. He is now 68 years of age, but looks fully ten years younger. In appearance he resembles an English farmer or provincial tradesman, and has a broad face and honest countenance. He must possess the greatest tact and executive ability, as his power is supreme and unhesitatingly obeyed, though he is only head of the church, and no longer governor of the territory, as he was formerly.

The theatre is a fine building, capable of holding 1,800 people. In the stalls, below where Captain Townshend sat when he visited it, were the principal elders with their wives and children. In the centre of the pit was placed a rocking-chair, which is sometimes occupied by Brigham Young. On this occasion he was seated in his private box in the proscenium. The piece was "The First Night," and one of his daughters took part in it. A number of his children were present, and if he has to pay for their admission it must come rather expensive—taking 48 children to the play.

Any infraction of the seventh commandment on the part of a Gentile and Mormon woman, is punished by the death of the former. The women in general are remarkably plain, both in looks and dress; and have a subdued air about them, and a way of looking down as if they were ashamed of themselves. They do not appear to be treated by the men as at all equals, but rather as beings whose duty it is to serve their husbands. A favourite occupation with them is embroidering gloves, much in the style of the Indian work so common in Canada. Beaver skin is fastened on to the end of some, thus making a handsome pair of gauntlets.

The Tabernacle is a huge hideous structure, capable of containing 15,000 persons. It is 215 feet long by 132 wide, inside the walls, and surmounted by an enormous wooden dome. An immense organ is being erected, and in front of it, raised on a platform, are the seats of the President, the Bishops, and the Apostles. The body and gallery are occupied by hard wooden benches on which the rest of the congregation sit. The foundations are laid of the magnificent temple on which they have been seven years at work, but the walls are as yet only level with the ground. The length of the building is to be 187 feet, and its breadth 119. There are to be three towers at each end. The height of the main building will be 100 feet, and that of the highest towers 200 feet. If the plan be carried out it will resemble a handsome Christian cathedral.

Brigham Young encourages the cultivation of the grape, from which a sweet and not unpalatable wine is made; and he is also trying to promote the culture of the silk-worm, in order that the Mormons may themselves manufacture silk.

Utah has already more than sufficient population to become a State, but the question of the plurality of wives interferes with their desire to enter the Union; and the general idea in the States seems to be that Young will have a divine revelation limiting the number of wives to one, otherwise, as a Yankee remarked, he "guessed Brigham Young would have to move on."

Though Captain Townshend thinks that an educated Christian can look upon the Mormon religious system as nothing but falsehood, blasphemy, and the grossest immorality, still the impression left on his mind by what he saw and heard in Utah was that the Mormons were either far superior to their system, or that their system is not so badly adapted to a country where the immense number of children which a man may obtain by a plurality of wives, are literally as "arrows in the hands of a giant," and where the man is happy "who has his quiver full of them." No anxiety as to their future need oppress him where millions of acres of land now lying desolate wait but the labour of man to make them a fruitful garden; and where the greater number of believers born, the less will they be ashamed "to speak with their enemies in the gate." The sobriety, industry, and perseverance shown by the Mormons have met with the success these qualities must ever command; and Brigham Young may be excused if he quotes the words of Scripture, "By their fruits ye shall know them," and then points to the undoubted success of Mormon faith and works in Utah.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL TALKERS.

It is always a risky business, in addressing children, to indulge in what rhetoricians call the question of appeal, as is demonstrated by the following anecdote, which appears in an American paper.—The pastor of a popular church, one Sunday evening, at the Sunday-school concert, said: "Boys, when I heard your beautiful song to-night, I had to work hard to keep my feet still; what do you suppose is the trouble with them?" "Chilblains, sir," said a six-year old boy.

This, however, is hardly as suggestive as the experience of one of our good Boston deacons, who began a dedication address as follows:—"Dear children, since I came into this beautiful chapel I have been tempted to break one of the commandments. Can any of you tell me which one it was?" Of course they could. His question was met by a very emphatic repetition of the seventh commandment. Brother C. had wit enough to extricate himself from his somewhat precarious position. Shouting, as soon as order was measurably restored, "No children, not quite so bad as that—it's the tenth commandment, 'Thou shalt not covet,'" he sailed on before more prosperous gales.

We remember seeing another brother equally good, but less gifted, utterly swamped in a similar sea. He had been visiting a prison, and in giving his impressions to the Sunday-school the following dialogue ensued:

Bro. T.—Now, don't you suppose those prisoners felt bad? Didn't their consciences trouble them?

School.—Yes, sir.

Bro. T.—What made them feel bad?

School.—Because they'd committed murder.

Bro. T.—Yes, and because—

School.—Because they'd stole.

Bro. T.—But I feel bad sometimes. Now, why do I feel bad?

Few adventurous spirits.—Because you've committed murder.

Bro. T.—Oh: no, dear children, I never murdered anybody—

School, with great unanimity and emphasis.—Then you've stole!

The logic of the infantile mind, enforced as it was by the merriment of the congregation, who remembered that the good brother was a pedlar, was altogether too much for brother T., and he dropped, with manifest embarrassment, into the nearest chair. Those who are in the habit of addressing Sunday-schools can probably make their own application.

INTELLIGENCE.

CROOK.—The anniversary of the Unitarian Sunday-school was celebrated on Sunday last, when Mr. James Watson, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, conducted the services morning, afternoon, and evening. The children recited and sang a variety of pieces, and the chapel was crowded each time. On Saturday, the 17th inst., a tea party was held, which was well attended. The whole of the proceedings were a complete success.

ROCHDALE: CLOVER-STREET.—On Sunday, the 11th inst., the Rev. J. Freeston preached his farewell sermon to this congregation, whence he is removing to Blackley. On Tuesday evening, the 12th inst., at a tea meeting, Mr. John Healey, on behalf of the congregation, presented him with a timepiece, as a token of esteem and respect, for which Mr. Freeston returned thanks.

NEW SWINDON.—On the evening of Sunday, July 18th, the Rev. F. R. Young gave the seventh and concluding one of a series of monthly lectures on the Scriptures. The subject of the last one was "Christian Principles of Criticism and Interpretation in their application to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures," and it excited so much interest that it is reported at length in the North Wilts Herald. Confining himself to principles rather than rules, Mr. Young, in a clear and lucid manner, pointed out those which might be appreciated by an audience unused to critical niceties, and such as would serve to guide them in their search after Christian truth.

NOTTINGHAM: CHRIST CHURCH.—The teachers and friends of the Sunday-schools connected with this church gave the scholars their annual treat on Monday last. They formed in procession and walked to the grounds of the St. Ann's Horticultural Society, where they enjoyed themselves in a variety of games until five o'clock, when they returned to school, and about 260 sat down to a good, substantial tea. When tea was over they again proceeded to the grounds for the rest of the evening. A taste for the beautiful in nature is specially cultivated by the minister and teachers in these schools, and it is worthy of notice that without any special desire or request whatever, almost every scholar carried a beautiful bouquet. The schools are now quite full, well supplied with efficient teachers, and in a most healthy state.

THE COMING WEEK.

Chowbent.—On Sunday, morning and afternoon, sermons by the Rev. M. C. Frankland.

ABOLITION OF THE IRISH CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT.

At a Special Meeting of the Executive Committee of the SOCIETY for the LIBERATION of RELIGION from STATE PATRONAGE and CONTROL, held July 30th, 1869, it was RESOLVED as follows:

With feelings of profound satisfaction, and of devout gratitude, the Executive Committee record the fact, that, after 25 years of patient effort, the objects of the Society have been realised in one portion of the United Kingdom, by the abolition of the National Ecclesiastical Establishment which has existed for centuries in Ireland, and the consequent enjoyment of religious equality by the inhabitants of that country.

In the passing, by peaceful and constitutional means, of the "Act to put an end to the Establishment of the Church of Ireland," they recognise the result of various concurring causes, and of the labour of many individuals, both in and out of Parliament, who, either in past years or at a recent period, have sought to awaken in the mind of the nation a sense of the injustice inflicted by the Irish Establishment on the Irish people.

While gladly acknowledging that the successful issue of those exertions is due, in no small degree, to the co-operation of Liberal Episcopalians, the Committee attribute to the firmness of the great body of Nonconformists the adoption of a policy of impartial disendowment, as opposed to one of indiscriminate endowment; their protest against the latter having been aided, to an important extent, by the refusal of Irish Roman Catholics to participate in any redistribution of the revenues of the Establishment, or to accept of any other endowment from the State.

The Committee desire to express their strong and lasting sense of obligation to the Right Honourable William Ewart Gladstone, M.P., for the courage and decision with which he undertook the settlement of this great controversy; the distinguished ability, and the conscientious consideration, with which he has grappled with its many difficulties, and the unwavering adhesion to right principles which has marked his conduct of the measure which has now become law. They have also regarded with admiration the efficient aid afforded to the Prime Minister by his colleagues in both Houses of Parliament, as well as the ardour and fidelity with which the Government has been supported by the Liberal party in the House of Commons.

Disclaiming, in the prosecution of their aims, all narrow and sectarian motives, the Committee express their earnest hope that the beneficent effects of this memorable act of justice on the part of the Imperial Parliament will speedily be seen in the contentment, union, and prosperity of the population of Ireland. More especially, they trust that the members of the Disestablished Church may be so strengthened and guided as that, wisely using the liberty of action now accorded to it, their church may, by its vigour and efficiency, become an example to the religious communities still established by law, and beget in them a desire to enjoy the like freedom.

IN REFERENCE

TO WINE it is a fact that many persons are pleased if they can say "We import our own." They have an impression that by so doing they not only get it cheaper but purer; and, besides, there is the honour of importing. They overlook altogether that those Foreign Dealers who seek them out are quite aware of this amiable weakness, and do not fail to take advantage of it to add some shillings to the price. To assist the impression they judiciously insinuate that their article is purer than what usually comes to England, and thus they lull that desire for comparison which would soon dispel the delusion.

These remarks apply specially to

GERMAN WINES,

And, in proof of them, we would ask those Gentlemen who buy such Wines to compare our

Even supposing the value to be equal there is this advantage in buying here, that any quantity can be got when wanted; whereas, in importing, a quantity of money is locked up, probably for years, in an article not of every day consumption.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Wesleyan Conference is holding its 126th annual session at Hull. On Monday, the 26th ult., and following days, the preparatory committees assembled, viz., the Educational Committee, the Chapel Committee, the Sabbath Committee, the Theological Institution Committee of Review, the Missionary Committee of Review. These committees, unlike the Conference itself, are composed partly of laymen, and many of the leading laymen of Wesleyanism find in them an opportunity of bringing a strong lay public opinion to bear on the "legal hundred." The Conference proper opened on Thursday, July 29th, when about 600 ministers were present. The Rev. Dr. Jobson was elected president. We shall make fuller reference to the proceedings next week.

German papers state that the nun recently released from a Carmelite convent in Cracow was found in a dark and unhealthy cell, where she had been confined for twenty-one years. She was without clothes, had a wild look, and had almost lost her senses. The Cos of Cracow announces the sudden death of the confessor of the nunnery, the principal witness in the affair. This man, who is called Father Lewkowicz, lately visited the parish priest of Trzebinia, in a state of intoxication, and betrayed the secret. The priest, who is a very worthy man, made it immediately known to a cousin of his own in Cracow, and the latter wrote the anonymous letter by which the police were first informed of the matter. They were assisted in their investigations by several ecclesiastics, among others by the Bishop of Cracow, who overwhelmed the abbess and the nuns with reproaches, and asked them whether they were women or furies. He also thanked the magistrate for the energy and tact he had displayed, and suspended the chaplain of the convent. The released nun has been taken to a lunatic asylum, but the medical men despair of her recovery.

The following works have been placed on the Index Expurgatorius at Rome:—"The Bible in India," "Life of Jesus Christ," by Louis Jacoliot, Paris, 1869; "Questions Contemporaines," by Ernest Renan; "St. Paul, par Ernest Renan; avec une carte des voyages de Saint Paul, par Kiepert, de l'Académie de Berlin." The decree also enumerates several Italian works, and the "Annual of the Canadian Institute" for 1868.

The Irish clergy are already moving towards the adoption of an organisation for their new free Church. A large meeting of ministers has just been held in the Molesworth Hall, Dublin, with the Archbishop in the chair. The Archdeacon of Dublin was for at once proceeding to call into action the "National Synod of the Church, according to the 100th canon," but some of the more cautious urged that they had better be quite sure "what a synod actually was," and the motion was withdrawn. Dr. Tresham Gregg brought down the house by saying that the title of the Prayer Book should be at once altered—that the Union was repealed—that it was no longer the Prayer Book of the United Church of England and Ireland. The best thing that was brought forward was the consideration of the necessity of lay co-operation, which was ably advocated by the Rev. Mr. Streane and the Dean of the Chapel Royal.

It is said the Bishop of Lichfield will contribute £500 a year to the Sustentation Fund for the support of the clergy of the disestablished Irish Church, and that the English bishops generally will appoint a day for collections in aid of the same object.

It is estimated, says the Dublin correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, that the 12 per cent. bonus given to the Presbyterian body, as well as to the Episcopalian, when commutation takes place under the Church Act, will amount to an addition of £60,000 to the value of the capitalised life estate in the Regium Donum. It is said that a special meeting of the General Assembly will immediately be held to make definite arrangements for the organisation of an entirely new system of ecclesiastical finance.

The John Bull says:

"The Ritual Commissioners have adjourned to the autumn, when they will draw up their final report. Considerable surprise has been felt that their recommendations for the revision of the Lectionary, which have been in print some time, has not been published. Since then it is, however, to be feared that the Commissioners have almost converted themselves into revisors of the book of Common Prayer. We hear with regret that vital rubrics have been tampered with, and that the Athanasian Creed itself has only been retained by a narrow majority. Indeed, if it was not in the hope that before the final report iterations may be made, one of the most distinguished Commissioners would, it is said, have resigned."

The same paper learns "that the feeling in the Select Committee on Clerical Discipline in the House of Lords was very much in favour of any measure, however stringent, that would lead to what are called extreme men leaving the English Church; and it is even rumoured on what is thought good Roman authority, that the Ecumenical Council will pave the way by allowing the Roman secular clergy to marry under certain restrictions. We mention these things before the recess that Churchmen may know how serious a prospect is before them, and resolve on greater unity among themselves."

The London Missionary Society has purchased a Buddhist temple at Pekin for a medical dispensary. An excellent conversion this.

The Rev. Dr. Rowland Williams, the author of the article "Bunsen's Biblical Researches," in "Essays and Reviews," advertises in the Rcord for a curate to take part of the large parish of Broadchalke, of which he is vicar. "Desired," says Dr. Williams, "a good preacher, with musical skill, and nothing odd in doctrine. Rational or ritual eccentricity objected to." Pretty well, that, for one who himself only escaped deprivation for "rational eccentricity" by the skin of his teeth!

The Rev. Charles Voysey, in a private letter to a friend of ours, dated August 2nd, says: "I find myself suddenly inhibited from all duty in the diocese, pendente lite. This proceeding has never been adopted except in cases of gross immorality. So I am numbered among the transgressors." He adds that Sunday next is his last day of duty for the present.

More movements for union! The Clerical Journal is saddened by the intelligence that the "Primitive Wesleyans" of Ireland are in danger of being united with or "absorbed" by the Irish Wesleyan Methodists. It seems the Primitive Wesleyans are not our "Primitive Methodists," and the Clerical Journal says they are, in fact, members of the Church of England, and are "the only true Methodists in the world," strictly adhering to John Wesley's rule of communicating at church, and holding no service in church hours.

Correspondents in the English Independent are advocating an amalgamation of the Congregational and the United Methodist Free Church, one writer suggesting the name "Free Churches" as more expressive than "Congregational." It is curious to see in this proposal an illustration of how completely Calvinism, once a subject of fierce controversy between Methodism and Independency, has faded out of the real thought of the Independents.

The Dundee Advertiser gives the following instance of a delicate scent of heresy. The pastor of an Independent church, not a hundred miles from Glasgow, was formally charged with teaching erroneous doctrine, a few months ago, for quoting in a sermon, preached on "The Cities of Refuge," the following passage from the writings of Bishop Patrick: "Two students of the law were to accompany him (the manslayer), that if the avenger of blood should overtake him before he got to the city, they might endeavour to pacify him by wise persuasions." For quoting this passage the pastor of an Independent church had to leave his charge. The accusation of heresy was made in the pastor's absence, and so disgusted were the most intelligent members that they left the church.

The new Roman Catholic cathedral in Rochester is to have the largest chime of bells in the country. The tenor bell will weigh three tons, and the aggregate weight will be twelve tons.

Things are still in a curiously uncertain state about the forthcoming Ecumenical Council. One week we hear that the Pope is pushing on all preparations, the next everything is at a standstill. The fact appears to be that the prospects of unanimity and discreet silence and subserviency to Rome are not found to be entirely satisfactory as the time draws nearer.

The schismatic bishops of the East persist in their refusal to attend the Council, and the patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem have returned the Pope his brief of invitation. The brief of invitation has been retained by the Bishop of Bethlehem, the Armenian patriarch, and the Jacobite bishop, but they state that they regard it as a private communication. The Vatican affirms that the bishops have acted under pressure from Russia. There is hope, however, for the Council, as the Anglicans are going to help by their prayers! Mr. George J. Murray, treasurer of the A. P. U. C., writes to the Guardian:

"There seems a general call for some form of prayer in regard to the Council about to assemble in Rome. The President of the Association for Promoting the Unity of Christendom has prepared one for the use of the members, which will be sent to those whose addresses are known. I shall be most happy to forward copies to any one who will send me a directed and stamped envelope."

An informant of the North-west Whig who attended service in one of the churches of Belfast on Sunday last states that the portion of the service usually devoted to the Queen was omitted, and that one of the worshippers in his excitement shouted out "No surrender."

At the meeting of the Wesleyan Conference on Tuesday a letter was read from Sir F. Lytett offering to subscribe £300 a year for the maintenance of two Wesleyan ministers in or near the metropolis, to labour in West-end districts which at present are not included in any Wesleyan circuit.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

A correspondent of Notes and Queries says: "The Swiss Protestants never call their places of worship Churches. They are always called 'temples.' The Catholics say that such a name is paganish, but the response always given is that the "Church" is the congregation, and not the building where they assemble. A just distinction, it seems to us.

With regard to caste in India, the Daily News says:

"The Brahmins are prohibited, under pain of the forfeiture of every social privilege which they hold dear, from crossing the sea, which they therefore, not without reason, designate kala puwanee, or 'black water.' According to the Times of India, only six Brahmins of the highest caste have ventured upon this experiment, and they have paid the penalty of the Hindoo law. Time, however, works wonders, and the Brahmins are beginning to discover that there is a good deal of absurdity in their superstitious horror of the melancholy ocean. Mr. Moljee Thackersey visited England several years ago, and on his return to India he soon learnt to his cost that he had been expelled from his caste. But Mr. Thackersey did not fling himself under the wheels of Juggernaut, or even retire into solitude. He simply exercised faith in his own rectitude, and in the ultimate common sense of his countrymen. The result is that he has re-visited this country, accompanied by six or eight of his brethren of the strictest sect of Brahmins. But this is not all. When Mr. Thackersey and his companions went on board the steamer, they were cheered by hundreds of 'castemen' who have learnt the folly of superstition and its incompatibility with the superior claims of modern civilisation. Another fact, which is in its way equally significant, is that two native ladies have applied for admission into the entrance examination of the University of Calcutta. It is clear, from many facts which are now transpiring, that Hindooism is passing into that stage in which reformers, if they are courageous and enlightened enough, will find their work comparatively easy."

The Pall Mall Gazette, in noticing the life and letters of F. W. Faber, a Catholic priest who began life as an Anglican clergyman, quotes the following illustration of the extent to which some go while still nominally Anglicans:

"Faber, it appears, settled down upon a college living—Elton, in Huntingdonshire. At Elton he persuaded a good many of the parishioners to come to confession to him, and set up a society of 'his most promising penitents.' The members met at twelve o'clock every night at the rectory, and spent an hour or so in prayer, on great occasions prolonging their devotions for three or four hours. (On Fridays, and throughout Lent, they used 'the discipline'—i.e., flogged one another on the bare shoulders. 'Upon which,' says the biographer, 'it would seem these vigils excited the anger of the evil spirits, for mysterious noises used to be heard in the house at the time, often apparently just outside the door of the oratory where the members were assembled.' When the astonished devotees rushed out with lights, and searched all over the house, nothing human was, of course, to be seen. Whereupon it was decided that the noises were the work of sundry irritated and obstructive devils."

The Spectator holds that the true policy for the new Irish Free Church is to make the laity participate at once, not merely on administrative and financial matters, but also on ritual, and even theological subjects. A single chamber, in which the bishops, and clergy, and laity might all sit together, would be found far more really efficient for this purpose than a convocation which makes the bishops into a separate assembly, and puts the clergy and laity into a single lower chamber to consult together, the votes however, being taken by tribes, as it were, i.e., the laity delivering one vote and the inferior clergy another. What is, above everything, wanted is as complete as possible a sense of unity. Nothing will effect this so much as the presence of the bishop among the laity and clergy, where his leadership—if he is able to lead, and some at least, of the Irish bishops are anyhow able enough to lead—will be infinitely more felt than in the dignified seclusion of an "upper house." Moreover, the centralisation of the church into a single visible body cannot but add to the spirit and the responsibility, as well as to the gravity of the debates. In starting a church of this kind everything should be postponed to life. With life, all is possible; without life, nothing is possible; and the danger in this case is undoubtedly a want of life.

The Freeman (Baptist) speaking of the value of the Irish Church settlement to Nonconformity says:

"It is difficult to estimate the full value of our gains. The Parliament of the United Kingdom has accepted the principle of disestablishment. For the first time in the history of Great Britain it has been authoritatively declared that it is desirable and expedient to separate church and state. Bishops in Ireland will never again be appointed by the Crown. The English church there will be self-supporting and self-governing. Voluntarism has triumphed. Other, and scarcely less important, precedents have been created. The property enjoyed by the National Church is acknowledged to be the property of the nation. Royal grants are held to be no more than the grant of the enjoyment of the income from certain lands during the pleasure of the Legislature. A distinction, it is true, is drawn between private endowments and national property set apart for ecclesiastical purposes. But the Archbishop of Canterbury thinks that he has made a good bargain with the State in securing £500,000 as the price of all the private endowments included in property valued at £15,000,000. The most gratifying fact of all is the growing conviction that the State should not interfere with religion, that the Christian Church does not need the pay or the patronage, and should not submit to the control and rule, of the civil power. Great Britain has opened a new chapter in her ecclesiastical history."

A correspondent of the same paper, taking up the question of the consequence of the measure to religion in Ireland, writes:

"That it will give facilities for missionary work, there can be no doubt. The Roman Catholic Church hardly expects to profit by the overthrow of its rival. In a conversation which I had with a priest in Ireland last month, he candidly acknowledged as much. I said to him 'An intelligent layman belonging to your communion said to me a short time since if the Protestant Church in Ireland had kept clear of the State 300 years ago there would have been a hundred Protestants by this time for every Catholic! Do you believe this?' 'I believe every word of it,' was the priest's reply. Of course I do not expect the speedy falling away of large numbers from the Roman Catholic Church. The priests will resist 'Protestant heresy' as stoutly as ever; but disestablishment and disendowment must weaken their influence, since they will deprive them of the most powerful weapons which they have ever wielded against Protestantism. In spite of all that may be said to the contrary, the Irish people regard the Government measure as an expression of good-will on the part of England, and a pledge of righteous legislation for the future. The present Government is looked upon as the friend of Ireland. The people are disposed to regard the two most prominent members of the Cabinet as being invested with something like superhuman attributes. 'If Mr. Gladstone were to make his appearance among you,' said I to a sharp-witted Irishman, 'what would you do?' 'Faix,' said he, 'we would take him on our shoulders, and carry him through the country, and he would never touch the ground till he reached the Giant's Causeway.'"

Few expressions of opinion on the Irish Church Act have more interest for us than that of the Guardian, which has throughout taken a moderate and fair—for a High Church organ, very fair—tone. Our contemporary writes:

"Let us say frankly that we record the settlement of this great question with sincere satisfaction, by no means unalloyed with pain. To us the bill has not been what it is to a multitude of persons whose judgment we respect and with whom we generally agree—a wicked and sacrilegious piece of spoliation, not only dangerous to property, but certain to be injurious to far higher and more sacred interests: if it were, we should not be reconciled to it by anything that has been either done or attempted in the House of Lords. We have seen, and see, in it a measure directed to remove a real grievance, to put an end to a state of things which has always seemed to us incapable of defence, and to do what (had it been done in another country, had the Church disestablished been Roman Catholic, and the population Protestant) every one would have welcomed as a great act of justice—a measure honestly and carefully framed, relentless in working out its principle, but otherwise friendly to the Church. Our desire has been that the hardships inseparable from such a change should be mitigated as much as possible; and we have differed from the Government as to the amount of concession compatible with a substantial adherence to principle."

There are some things in the Earl of Dalhousie's recent speech at Abeyon, on the "Free Church of Scotland," which it will do some of our Unitarian friends good to read. Combating the assertion that the Free Church is declining, he said:

"Look on what the Free Church was originally, and what it is now. It came out with about 474 ordained ministers. Of these 270 were parochial ministers, the remainder being ministers of those churches which were in status, although not in emolument, equal to parochial churches. From 474 ministers we have swelled to upwards of 800. Is that any symptom of decay? We have built upwards, I believe, of 800 churches. We have added to that 800 schools, and we have, out of the poverty of our land, gathered an amount of money to sustain the great cause which we advocate, which speaks well for the vitality as well as the stability of our Church. It has been said that the Church is going too fast, by some of those who belong to it. It has been said that in being too forward in the way of church extension we have run the risk, and have actually committed the fault, of lowering the stipends of the fixed ministers of congregations. I deny that this has been done to any extent. It may have been done to some small extent; but who shall gainsay church extension?—who shall tell me that is a real church which is not a missionary church? I honour the saying of Mr. Chalmers, when he told the people that commerce and religion were conducted on two totally different principles. In commerce the demand must precede the supply; in religion the supply must precede the demand. But it is in vain to tell me that a church can do its duty that does not plant itself in the midst of barren ground—that does not till the ground till it makes it a smiling field, and gathers into it a congregation which did not exist."

"The Son of a Cornish Vicar" appeals in the Church Times for help in the Church work of the county, which he laments over as being "a perfect hot-bed of Methodism and Dissent of every kind," and solicits help "to stem the tide of Dissent and irreligion." "Let me again beg any priests able and willing to fight a hard battle for our dear Lord and His Church to send a mission among the rustics and miners of this only half-civilised region." We commend this fact to the Archbishop of Canterbury as suggesting some interesting questions in connection with his peculiar hobby of the value of an endowed and established Church. Which made Cornwall an ever half-civilised region? Establishment or Voluntarism?

The Pall Mall Gazette points out how the actual proceedings of the Church of England show its utter indifference to what were once the most essential restrictions of that creed, of which the Rev. W. L. Irons, of Brompton, has just come out as the defender:

"With the anathema of the Prompston doctor against all who doubt the infallible truth of every portion of the Athanasian Creed still sounding in our ears, it is not a little suggestive to ponder over the proceedings of the Anglo-Continental Society, patronised by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and the Bishop of Exeter. Under the auspices of this society one of the fundamental dogmas of this same creed is being quietly set aside, as of no practical importance whatever. The society is taking under its special protection that ancient oriental Nestorian Church, against whose one distinguishing tenet the clause in question is directed. To the ordinary Englishman the subject is, perhaps, of little practical interest. The extraordinary subtleties which shook the Christian world 15 or 16 centuries ago seem barely comprehensible to an age which delights in science and criticism, and regards 'dissimulation' as the great religious question of the day. A new neo-platonic creed like that which is falsely attributed to Athanasius would be about as possible an invention as a parliamentary adoption of spirit-rapping for the settling of antiquarian difficulties. And the striking fact is that while on certain Sundays every clergyman is bound to anathematize the Nestorians for holding that there were two separate 'persons' in Jesus Christ, a society for equating with the actual Nestorian Church is established at the offices of the Gospel Propagation Society in Park-place, St. James's Street. The truth is that if Churchmen could wake up one morning to find the Athanasian Creed vanished from the Prayer Book they would all rejoice with unaffected joy."

"A beneficed Clergyman and Conservative," who at the last election voted for the Conservative candidates, writing to the Manchester Guardian, says:

"In common with other churchmen, I feel that the conduct of most of the bishops during the passage of the Irish Church Bill through the House of Lords has been such as entirely to shake my confidence in their manliness and honesty as politicians. The only ground for retaining bishops in the House of Lords has been that they might protect the interests of the Church. But what have they really done for the Church? Some of them have voted for her disendowment and disestablishment; some have not had the courage to vote at all; some have shown a miserable spirit of time-serving. Nor has their conduct in other great questions been such as to commend their wisdom or courage in legislating for the Church. Year after year the poison of Romanising ritualism has been allowed to circulate, alienating vast numbers from the services of the Church, and engendering strife and contention. There is not a bishop on the bench who has boldly faced the difficulty or brought forward any measure for putting an end to the anarchy which pervades the Church. Meanwhile the bishops complain that they are overworked, and make attendance in Parliament a scapegoat for neglecting many useful works in their dioceses. It is time that churchmen should speak out and complain loudly. The remedy is easy, and the advantage would be great. Let the bishops cease to sit in the House of Lords, and devote themselves wholly to the work of their dioceses. The Church would lose nothing, and she would gain much. Peers of the realm may need incomes varying from £4,200 to £11,000 a year; but bishops who are not peers would be amply remunerated with £1,000 a year, and with the money saved we could have the episcopate increased and many of the miserable pittance of the poor livings increased."

THE WORKING OF IRISH CHURCH ACT.

The Pall Mall Gazette gives a clear statement of the changes which the new statute will introduce into the ecclesiastical aspect of Ireland.

The immediate results of the Act are neither many nor conspicuous. For the next 17 months the framework of the Irish Church will be substantially unaltered. The parliamentary union between it and the Church of England will continue to subsist, ecclesiastical corporations will retain their accustomed status and possessions, the ecclesiastical courts will exercise their accustomed jurisdiction, and the Irish bishops will take their accustomed turns in the House of Lords. There are, however, three exceptions to this rule. First, all property vested on the 20th of July last in the ecclesiastical commissioners for Ireland passed on that day to the "commissioners of Church Temporalities in Ireland." Secondly, on the occurrence of any vacancy in the Irish Ecclesiastical staff during the next 17 months the Act makes certain temporary provisions with regard to appointments. If an archbishop or bishop is vacant the Crown is empowered to nominate a successor—in the former case, on the requisition of any three bishops of the province; in the latter, on the requisition of the archbishop or any three bishops of the province. If a benefice of any kind falls vacant, it may be filled up by the same person who would have been qualified to present to it if the Act had not passed. But in no case will the bishop or incumbent so appointed succeed to the temporalities of his new preferment. These will vest at once in the Commissioners of Church Temporalities, free from all liabilities in respect of the new appointee, except that they are authorised to pay him for the unexpired residue of the next 17 months a sum equal to the annual income of his new benefice. Thirdly, the clergy and laity of the Irish Church will enjoy during the same interval entire freedom of synodical action. They may meet in synod by such representatives as they shall appoint, and they may frame regulations for the general management of the Church, and for the future representation of its members.

The intercalary period expires on the 1st of January, 1871. At that date the ecclesiastical revolution will be complete. The union with the Church of England will come to an end, the entire mass of Church property will pass to the Commissioners, every ecclesiastical corporation will be dissolved, the ecclesiastical courts will be abolished, and Irish bishops will be seen no more in the House of Lords. From that day forward the Irish Church will be relegated to the position of a voluntary religious association, possessed of absolute liberty to define its own doctrines, to manage its own affairs, and to spend its own money. Supposing it to take no immediate steps to constitute a representative body for itself, the ecclesiastical law, and the articles, doctrines, rites, rules, disciplines, and ordinances, which were in force in the Irish Church at the date of the passing of the Act will remain binding on its members "in the same manner as if such members had mutually contracted and agreed to abide by and observe the same." These existing laws, however, will in all respects be subject to "such modification of alteration as after the 1st of January, 1871, may be duly made therein according to the constitution of the said Church for the time being." The object of the provision is simply to give the disestablished Church a framework to start with, not in any way to hamper it in reconstructing this framework hereafter. If on the 2nd of January, 1871, the clergy and laity like to convert themselves into Presbyterians or Baptists, there is nothing in the Act to prevent their doing so. In case, however, of their determining upon any violent changes, an element of possible disintegration is introduced by the saving clause that no alteration in the articles, doctrines, rights, formularies of the disestablished Church shall be binding on any ecclesiastical person so as to deprive him of any annuity or compensation to which he may be entitled under the Act who shall within one month signify his dissent therefrom.

The formation of a representative body of some kind is not likely to be long delayed, since until this step is taken none of the property granted by the Act to the disestablished Church can possibly be made over to it. The indispensable preliminary to such transfer is that it shall "be shown to the satisfaction of her Majesty that the bishops, clergy, and laity of the said Church . . . have appointed" some "persons or body to represent the said Church, and to hold property for any of the uses or purposes thereof." When once the representative character of this body has been made clear to the Crown, it may be incorporated by Royal Charter, and may make all the applications and receive all the payments specified in the Act. These are as follows:—The representative body may apply to the Commissioners for any church in actual use at the time of the passing of the Act, stating that such church is required for religious purposes; and for the sum of £500,000 in lieu of private endowments. These applications must be made before the 1st of July, 1871. Further, and without any limitation as to time, the representative body may apply for ecclesiastical residences actually occupied at any time during the six months before the passing of the Act by any ecclesiastical person attached to any church vested as aforesaid in the representative body, and for the additional land which under the 28th clause may be held with the residences in question. The moveable chattels belonging to or held in right of any see or benefice will vest in the representative body immediately upon incorporation, without any application on their part. Lastly, the provisions for commutation of life interests contained in the 23rd clause can only take effect "in the event of a representative corporate body being constituted to represent the said Church."

The mention of commutation leads to the consideration how far the position of the existing Irish clergy is affected by the Act. As regards houses and lands, they are to remain in possession of the present holders of the see or benefice in right of which they have hitherto been held, for their respective lives. As regards income, however, the clergy will in future look to the Commissioners, whose business it will be first to ascertain the amount in each individual case, and then to pay it to the holder of the see or benefice so long as he lives and discharges the duties of his office, or any duties which may be substituted for them by the representative body with his consent, or shall be prevented from discharging them by age, sickness, or permanent infirmity. In estimating an incumbent's income the Commissioners will deduct the salary paid by him to any curate, provided that a similar deduction has been made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the five years preceding the 1st of January, 1869. Permanent curates will be compensated in the same way. Any ecclesiastical person having a life interest under the Act may, with the consent of the representative body, apply to the Commissioners to commute his annuity, in which case its then present value will be paid over to the representative body charged with the payment of the annuity so long as the annuitant requires such payment, but with power to the representative body to make such arrangements with him upon this point as they may think fit. As soon as the value has been thus paid over all claim of the annuitant under the Act will cease, and his interest in any ecclesiastical property will immediately vest in the Commissioners. An additional inducement is offered to prompt and general commutation by the provision that if before the 1st of January, 1873, three-fourths of the ecclesiastical persons in any diocese have agreed to commute their life interests a bonus of twelve per cent. on the commutation money will be given to the representative body.

ROUGH NOTES OF A HOLIDAY VISIT TO SOME ENGLISH CATHEDRALS, &c.

NO. II.—ELY AND NORWICH.

On a splendid Sunday morning, and with a sky of deep, unbroken blue, I started in good time for morning service at ELY CATHEDRAL. I approached it through beautiful park-like grounds, in which were some very fine old beeches. Service was held under the Central Tower, where open benches were placed, to which, like other folk, I walked, and selected my place on the "free and open system."

Of course it was simply fortunate that my position commanded a good view of the choir, with the exquisite reredos, and the splendid east window beyond. The music was fine, but so purely scientific that none of the congregation could possibly join in it—which, I presume, was neither expected nor required. What in this matter alone excited any admiration, was the subdued and prayerful manner in which were sung the responses to the commandments. The service was rather high. Everybody turned eastward at the recital of the creeds—(some day they will turn their backs upon them)—everybody bowed at the name of Christ, though not at that of his God and ours; and there were candles on the altar-looking table, unlighted certainly, and therefore destitute of any true religious symbolism. The lessons appointed for the day were but indifferently read—one of them, however, quite as well as it deserved. It was a bloody tale of savage retribution, taken many hundred years ago by a tribe of barbarians on the representatives of one of Israel's kings, who had himself betrayed his destitution of honour and good faith. It must be difficult to find anything less edifying and adapted for public recital in the course of Christian worship at the present day! When the preacher made his appearance, I augured well from his intellectual head, and the decision and force with which he uttered his opening sentences. But his sermon was slight and unsatisfactory after all. I could only suppose, for I was sure Dean Goodwin had ability, that he reserved his powers for the editing of Greek plays, and didn't care to waste them on a Cathedral congregation. One of the vergers arranged with me that he would, by chance, be near the south door, half an hour before the beginning of evening service, and that he would then take me through the building. I certainly thought that this magnificent interior surpassed all that I had hitherto seen, grand and wonderful though it had been. For extent, for lavish richness of decoration,—(the fine shafts of Purbeck marble combining beautifully with the white stone work in the eastern end, containing two tiers of high lancet-shaped windows,)—this choir must be unequalled in the world. The organ front is inconceivably beautiful, a miracle of the designer's art! The stained glass,—the carving, alike in wood and in stone,—the exquisite marbles and splendid workmanship of the reredos, why attempt to describe them? My fee secured not only this entrancing inspection and the illustrative comments of my guide (an intelligent and obliging man), but together with a favoured few besides, a seat during the service in one of the stalls, whence I could gaze my fill at the glories of this sanctum sanctorum. This choir is of great extent. It was the custom of the Normans to build an apse at the termination of the nave. So it was originally in Ely; but this apse was taken down, and in its place, first three arches of Early English, and then six of Decorated, were built, making a choir of nine arches, and a marvellous product it is! The music was yet more elaborate than at the morning service. We had three psalms hand-running, so to speak, all sung to the same chant. If one of them had been omitted, a certain choir-seated worshipper would certainly have raised no objection. If we were enjoined in the New Testament not to bless but to curse our foes,—if we thus taught our children, and exhorted from our pulpits,—it might be consistent and edifying that, in the solemnities of public Christian worship, we should (as in one of the Psalms we sang), invoke unspeakable horrors on the head of our enemy,—and pray that "he may grin like a dog, and go about the city!" At the anthem, in accordance with a not very obviously wise custom, we all stood. The quality of the voices was not particularly excellent.—I left this splendid Cathedral with great reluctance. As I walked slowly out down the nave, the organ pealing in the distant choir, the sunlight shining gloriously through the stained glass, and dyeing the marble pavement here and there with purple and gold-amethyst and ruby, I thought that though the architect of this marvellous structure might care little about his place of burial, he would surely here have found a noble portal, through which his departing spirit might take its flight from this gorgeous creation of his genius, to the more immediate presence of its Divine Originator and Inspirer.

I travelled through what was once upon a time the Isle of Ely—some forty miles on my way to NORWICH. The fen country is a wonderful illustration of what industry and skill can accomplish in rescuing land, that now grows rich harvests for man, from the stagnating waters that for centuries wrung his frame with ague, and sent him prematurely to the grave. The people of this district are more suave in manner and speech than our Lancashire folk, whose energy and enterprise, however, they warmly admire. I had long desired to see Norwich on many accounts. There was a time when it occupied an almost unequalled literary position, and from its eminent writers and great thinkers was called "the eye of England." The numerous and gifted family of the Taylors; of the Martineaus, whose birthplace it is; the distinguished ministers who have preached at "The Octagon"—Dr. William Taylor, Dr. Enfield, Mr. Madge, Mr. Robberds, and others; and last, but not least, the fact that it was the native city and favourite abode of my lamented friend TRAVERS MADGE—all conspired to invest it with a deep, strong interest. I had the privilege of enjoying the society of those he loved so dearly, and of staying in the home that was his earthly paradise. During the day I saw the house in which he was born, the schoolroom in which he had laboured, the grave where lie the mortal remains of a frame all too feeble for his eager, fervent spirit, and from which, three years ago, it received its "letters of release." A beautiful spot it is—in a cemetery called "The Rosary," from the profusion with which the rose there flourishes. As I sat by his head-stone, the hand of loving and tender remembrance was watering the green sods and trimming the flower-bed that covers him. He lies in the place where he was fondest of walking while his strength lasted; and though from the overshadowing of the willow that weeps by his grave the rose has hardly sunlight enough to favour its growth, no spot is greener, or in the early spring-time more brightly decked with the flowers he specially loved. Fit resting place indeed for TRAVERS, "the Unitarian Saint," as he has been designated by an orthodox but friendly pen. And (in my humble judgment) he was never more a saint, and never more useful or happy, than when he held by the doctrines and enjoyed the communion of our so-called heterodox Church.—From the Castle, built on a mound raised by the Normans, I had some fine views of the city, which covers a wide area and contains seven-and-thirty churches. Whence did they ever get worshippers, and when? The CATHEDRAL, almost wholly Norman and founded in 1094, is a very fine edifice, remarkable for its elegant tower and lofty spire. The west front is plain enough—the arcading and the pinnacles testifying clearly to its origin and date. The nave is long, but somewhat narrow, and has a fan-traceried stone roof, which must, of course, be of later date. I remarked that in the nave the triforium was lighted, whereas it is generally blind, as it is termed. On mentioning this to the vergers, he told me that Queen Elizabeth was fond of coming to Norwich; that on one of her visits to the Cathedral she complained of the insufficient lighting of the building, on which the obsequious Dean of that time ordered windows to be put in—caring less for the manifest design of the architect than for the whim of his royal mistress. However, he was happily the last of the race of sycophantic Churchmen! There is a fine west window in memory of good Bishop Stanley, whom I remember well as one of the most popular and instructive of the lecturers we sometimes had at the Manchester Mechanics' Institution, when he was rector of Alderley. Over his grave is an inscription so elegant in its language and (better still) so true to fact, that I couldn't but copy it. "In the faith of Christ, here rests from his labours, Edward Stanley, 32 years Rector of Alderley; 12 years Bishop of Norwich;—buried amidst the mourning of the diocese which he had animated; the city which he had served; the poor whom he had visited; the schools which he had fostered; the family which he had loved; and of all Christian people with whom, however divided, he had joined in whatsoever things were true and honest, and just and pure, and lovely and of good report." The choir is not particularly fine, and, in defiance of all good taste and propriety, both it and the chancel are crowded with pews of anything but ornamental construction. The evening service was fairly performed. The Dean (Dr. Goulborn), a fine, dignified looking churchman, read one of the lessons. I again admired nothing more than the solemn stillness observed for a minute or two after the closing Amen:—a practice which some Nonconformist churches would do well to adopt.—By good fortune, I met with a friend well and widely known among us for the active and intelligent interest he has long taken in our Sunday-schools, especially those in London. He kindly took me in hand for a visit to the "Octagon" Chapel and the Free Public Library; and for a delightful ramble in the evening, which closed a very agreeable and interesting day.

UNIVERSITY REFORM: TOO LATE FOR COMPROMISE.
